Ignorance will be the ground upon which many who lived in time past will be forgiven the sin of making the Lord's holy Sabbath a secular day; but light has come, the time of ignorance is fast passing away, and those to whom the light has come cannot be excused on the same ground. The Judgment is at hand; and men will be weighed in the just balances of the law of God. The gospel will save those who have repented of their sins, found pardon through Jesus Christ, and have followed the example of Him who said, "I have kept my Father's commandments." Jesus is soon coming. The signs of the times, which are the fulfillment of the predictions of Jesus, prophets, and apostles, declare it in language too plain to the believer to be misunderstood. The Jews were condemned as unbelievers, because they did not discern the signs of their times. Christians of our day will have their faith tested also on the signs of the times. Faith in Christ embraces the promise of his return, and accepts the fulfillment of the signs he promised, and which have been fulfilled. It is becoming too late to say, It makes no difference whether we believe his promise and the fulfillment of the signs he gave, on the fulfillment of which he bids us know that his advent is at hand, even at the doors. The inquiring, observing Christian lacks no evidence on this point. Nothing but stubborn unbelief can find much longer excuse itself from believing, saying, "It makes no difference, if we are only prepared." It will be found too late, by many, that that excuse is only a hiding place for unbelief in the words of Jesus, and that it is vain to hope to be prepared for his coming while having no real confidence in his words. Yes, it will make a vast difference whether we be found in faith or unbelief. "Here are they that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." R. F. COTTRELL.

TODAY.

"VERILY I say unto thee to-day, shalt thou be with me in paradise." Luke 23:43. I make this promise unto thee to-day, while I am suffering the pains of the crucifixion. And this moment, while the visible church and its wise men and its prelates are adding to my burdens and pains by their scorn and abuse, thou, a poor penitent criminal, art causing in my heart an unalloyed joy, and a holy pleasure, in the midst of my dying agony, as I realize in participation the ineffable joys I shall confer upon thee, and such as thou art, penitent, and made free in my future kingdom. In the sweet language of confession, thy words, just falling from thy lips, convey to my heart an infinite pleasure and comfort; they seem an earnest of other scenes in the future, when the truth shall reach distant nations, and future ages and untold numbers, shall, like thee, repent in sorrow and bitterness and pain; and, like thee, shall reap a rich harvest, in my future kingdom; therefore, to-day I do promise unto thee a place in paradise.

Yes, on this memorable day, the last of my earthly life, a day made memorable by the woes and pains I suffer, and by the crimes of my murderers, some of whom, like thee, will repent and find mercy, to-day I promise to thee a place in paradise.

To-day, while forsaken of my friends, and tormented by my foes, and almost forsaken of my God, almost alone, on the terrible cross, my hands and feet pierced by the cruel nails, and my spirit bowed down beneath the sins of a world, yes, to-day, it affords me an infinite pleasure to give pardon and peace to a repentant sinner.

To-day, as the earthquake rends the solid mountains, and darkness veils the sun, and earth hides her face in the darkness from the strange scene; to-day, while the Son of God suffers the agony of the atonement, and while wicked men and vile spirits gather around to insult and wound their Redeemer, thou, O penitent thief, art, in this thine hour of trial, a model of sincere and godly repentance; thou art free, and wise, and upright, in this thy final judgment and conclusion; therefore, to-day I set thee free from thy load of sin, and assume thy case at the bar of the Judge of the universe.

To-day, the last day of the Mosaic dispensation, to-day, as I by my death rend the veil, and abolish the forms and ceremonies of the earthly temple, and assume the priesthood in my own person, I begin the work by an act of pardon and clemency to thee, O repentant and dying sinner. "Turn you to the strong-hold, ye prisoners of hope; even to-day do I declare that I will render double unto thee." Zech. 9:12. JOS. CLARKE.

MAKING HER DESOLATE.

In Rev. 17:16 we read that the ten kingdoms should hate the harlot, the papacy, and make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh and burn her with fire. The following facts show how this scripture is receiving its fulfillment, and this desolating process is going forward. Under the heading of "Persecution in Germany," the Home Journal, a Roman Catholic paper, published in Detroit, Mich., says:—

"The following letter appeared in the London Times of Tuesday, Jan. 25, 1876:—

"SIR: Will you allow me to call attention to the present condition of the Catholic clergy in Germany? A committee consisting of Lord Petre, Lord Arundel, of Warquer; Lord Howard, of Glossop; Lord Emly, Monsignor Pater-son, the Rev. H. J. Coleridge, Mr. T. W. Allies, Mr. John Young, Jr., Mr. J. H. Pollec, M. W. H. Lilly, and myself, have been engaged for some months in making inquiries on the subject, and we are now in a position to state the following facts:—

"1. By the law of April 22d last, an annual sum of between £135,000 and £150,000 has been withdrawn from the Catholic church of Prussia.

"2. This sum, the due payment of which had been solemnly guaranteed by concordats between the Prussian government and the holy see, was by no means a State subsidy to the Catholic church, but an allowance made in consideration of sequestered ecclesiastical property of far greater annual value.

"3. The number of priests whose income is thus stopped, either wholly or in part, is about 10,000.

"4. The only terms on which the clergy are entitled under the law of the 22d of April to claim the resumption of the payments thus stopped are by entering into a written engagement with the government to 'obey the laws of the State,' among which are the 'Falk' laws.

"5. The Falk laws are simply incompatible with the practice of the Catholic religion, providing as they do, inter alia, that the education of the clergy shall be conducted in State universities in which anti-Christian principles are openly taught; that no disciplinary power shall be exercised in Prussia by the pope; and that bishops may be deposed by the sentence of a purely civil court, the Royal Gerichtshof. The clergy have therefore been called upon to choose between beggary and apostasy. They have chosen beggary.

"6. But this is not all. In many instances the exercise of purely spiritual functions has been punished as a criminal offense; the ordinary public worship of the church, the administration of the sacraments, even the burial of the dead have been treated as crimes. Six bishops and a very large number of priests have been deprived of their personal liberty; some are confined with, and treated as, common criminals, and thousands of the faithful are without pastors and spiritual consolation.

"7. Nor is it possible for the Catholics of Prussia to do much for the support of the impoverished clergy who as yet have not been thrown into prison. It was stated in a telegram which appeared in your columns on the 10th of May last, that 'orders had been sent to the district administrators, according to which collections were made, without the sanction of the governor of the province, to compensate Catholic priests for the penalties inflicted upon them, constituted offenses punishable by law.' We are in possession of evidence that in many provinces the order is being enforced, and that in the poorer parishes, especially in rural ones, the clergy are suffering the greatest privations, which their people are unable to relieve. A very high authority states that in the dioceses of Treves, Hildesheim, Limburg, Fulda and Culm it is utterly impossible for the faithful to support their priests, and any protest by the laity, through the public press or otherwise, against the policy of the government, is repressed by fine and imprisonment.

"In such circumstances it appears to us that an appeal may confidently be made on behalf of these sufferers for conscience' sake. Acknowledged to be men of exemplary lives and entire devotion to the duties of their sacred calling—the only crime alleged against them being their refusal to submit to the dictation of the State in matters of religion—they are entitled, as it seems to us, to the respect, compassion, and active sympathy of all Englishmen.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,
"E. M. NORFOLK."

A CHEERING REPORT.

FROM a private letter to Bro. Canright from a brother in Memphis, Mich., we have the liberty to give the following cheering report to the readers of the REVIEW:—

"The Lord is blessing the church very much. One week ago last Sabbath [March 25], Bro. Lamson baptized thirteen, and yesterday [April 1], he baptized seven more, and quite a number of others united with the church. One brother who had kept the Sabbath for years, but had never been baptized, went forward, and was very much blessed.

"In the afternoon we all met at the church, and celebrated the ordinances. It was a precious season. The youth took hold, and some said they never were so happy in all their lives; others, that they would not give their peace of mind for all the pleasures of the world. Nearly every one of the children of our brethren and sisters have made a start, and others will be baptized in a few days. One brother said that he had looked for a great work to be done, but that it had gone beyond all his hopes, and he felt like praising God for his goodness."

GLEANINGS BY THE WAY.

THE COMING STRUGGLE BETWEEN FRANCE AND PRUSSIA—TESTIMONY OF A FRENCH SOLDIER.

As we were crossing France on our way to Switzerland, we fell in with a French soldier who had served his country in her late struggle against Prussia, and who was well qualified to give a true statement of the real feelings of the French toward the Prussians, and the prospects of a coming conflict between those two nations. He said:—

"We all expect that another war will break out between the two nations in less than six years, and we are preparing for it. We did not have a fair trial in the late struggle. We were shamefully sold. In the coming struggle, we will count on our valor as French soldiers, and the Prussians will be unable to stand before us."

As we see this storm gathering, God grant that we may not be indifferent in our efforts to persuade men to enlist and serve under the banner of the coming King, that they may be the happy subjects of his peaceful kingdom.

AN OBJECTION ANSWERED.

Should Europeans regard the darkening of the sun, etc., of 1780, and the shower of falling stars of 1833, as signs of the end?

But some will say: As the phenomenon of May 19, 1780, and that of Nov. 13, 1833, were confined to America, they were not sufficiently extensive to constitute so important a sign as the special sign of Christ's coming. To this we reply:—

1. It is not simply in America that the sun has been supernaturally darkened, and that there has been an extraordinary display of falling stars or meteors. Who has not heard of the remarkable darkness that occurred in Scotland only a short time after the dark day in America?

Tuesday, Sept. 3, 1839, there was a display of falling stars in England which seemed to be equal in splendor to that witnessed in America in 1833. It commenced about 10 o'clock P. M. and continued two hours, and toward morning the spectacle became still more wonderful. The fire engines were horsed, and galloped toward the supposed scene of destruction, followed by carriages, horsemen, and vast mobs. The same phenomenon was witnessed in America, but to a less extent than the described appearance in London. —New York Commercial Advertiser, Sept. 4, 1839.

Again, who is not familiar with the fact that in 1866 there was a wonderful display of falling stars in Europe, North Africa, and Asia? But

2. Were it even true that these phenomena were witnessed only in America, the objection under consideration would not be a valid one. The star that constituted one of the signs of Christ's first coming was seen only by a few wise men or astronomers in the land of Palestine, who did not even belong to the Jewish nation. Did the Jews therefore do right in asking Christ for a sign, and in rejecting the true Messiah?

But what if God has seen fit to give Americans the priority on one of the signs? What if it could even be shown that Americans alone had had the privilege of being eye witnesses of one of the signs of the end? Must the people living in other countries reject this one sign because they did not see it? What would Europeans say of Americans if they rejected the striking evidences of the end, as seen in the history of the papacy which is made up of events of which only a portion of those living in Europe could be eye witnesses? There are many historical and geographical facts that we have to receive at second hand, i. e., through the testimony of others. For example: Everybody believes that such a city as Paris exists, yet there are but a few comparatively who ever saw Paris.

God has spoken, and has fulfilled his word. Let the world take warning and prepare for the coming of his Son.

"THE LIGHT-HOUSES HAVE APPEARED!"

Such was the language of the sailors and passengers on board our steamer as we were nearing the coast of England, after a very rough and dangerous passage from New York. Joy beamed on every countenance, and all longed for the light of morning, and when it came, all were especially cheered at the sight of land, which seemed all the more precious for our having been deprived of it. As we looked back to our dangers amid the angry and surging waves, deliverance seemed very precious. We thought of the glorious deliverance of the saints beyond the trials and perils of the brief future. Can it be that final victory is so near. It is even so. "The light-houses have appeared." They are still in sight. They have been erected by the arm of Omnipotence, and are as firm as the pillars of Heaven. They show us our dangers, and that we are about to enter the haven of eternal rest. May the language of each heart be: Let perils and trials come, if victory is so sweet. D. T. BOURDEAU.
Locle, Switzerland, March 1, 1876.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. SMITH: The Bible Student's Assistant gives the complete use of the words soul and spirit in the Bible, with the different renderings of the Greek and Hebrew words from which they come. The word "pit" in Isa. 14:15 and 38:17, 18, is not from sheol but bohr.

J. HILTON: The Bible does not forbid the use of tobacco by name, and it would not have been consistent to do so; for it was not known when the Bible was written. But the Bible lays down principles that clearly condemn its use. It is one of those "foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition." 1 Tim. 6:9. Being a species of intemperance, its use is one of the works of the flesh enumerated in Gal. 5:19-21, of which it is said that "they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Our bodies are the temple of God. 1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19. By such an indulgence as the use of tobacco, which benumbs and stupefies the sensibilities, and wars upon the vital economy, this temple is defiled; and if "any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy which temple ye are. Let no man deceive himself." 1 Cor. 3:16-18. The same reasoning which would make the words of Christ in Matt. 15:11, justify the use of tobacco, would make them also justify the use of whisky, brandy, and other intoxicating liquors; for these liquors are taken in through the mouth. But they certainly defile the user; for no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God. 1 Cor. 6:10. Christ was speaking of articles of food, which tobacco, whisky, &c., are not, and rebuking the hypocrisy of the Pharisees, who were so scrupulous lest they should partake of something adjudged by the ceremonial law to be unclean, while their hearts were full of uncleanness and every evil.

From all of which it seems evident that the Bible condemns such indulgences as the use of tobacco, and that it is therefore a proper matter for discipline.

H. H. BRUNSTETTER: The righteous are judged during the investigative Judgment, before Christ comes; the wicked during the succeeding thousand years. This subject and Rev. 20:10, are explained in "Thoughts on Revelation."

WAITING FOR CHRIST.

We wait for Thee, all-glorious One!
We look for thine appearing;
We hear thy name, and on the throne
We see thy presence cheering.
Faith even now
Uplifts its brow,
And sees the Lord descending,
And with him bliss unending.

We wait for thee, through days forlorn,
In patient self-denial;
We know that thou our guilt hast borne Upon thy cross of trial.
And well may we Submit with thee
To bear the cross and love it, Until thy hand remove it.

We wait for thee; already thou Hast all our heart's submission;
And though the spirit sees thee now,
We long for open vision;
When ours shall be Sweet rest with thee,
And pure, unfading pleasure,
And life in endless measure.

We wait for thee with certain hope—
The time will soon be over;
With child-like longing we look up Thy glory to discover.
Oh, bliss! to share
Thy triumph there,
When home, with joy and singing,
The Lord his saints is bringing.

IS THE END NEAR?

BY ELD. D. M. CANRIGHT.

Text: "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." Matt.

The end will come sometime; the Judgment will set; probation will close; Christ will return. God has promised it. We believe it. Do you? Why may it not be? Somebody will live to see it. Why not we? Do you say that you see no signs of its coming? Have you watched for them? Have you thought upon this subject? Do you know what the signs are to be? If they should come to pass, would you recognize them? Have you studied the Bible upon this point? or have you been so intent upon other matters that you have given this subject no thought? Or, if you have thought of it, has it been with anxiety and effort to ascertain the truth? or does not force men to see and believe the truth. His promise is to those who are watching, and searching, and praying. The popular churches can give you no light upon this subject; for they are in the dark themselves. The advent of Jesus is ignored and scoffed at by them. We warn you to be careful that that day does not come upon you unawares. In Daniel 2, God has given a prophetic outline of the story of the world under the image of a man. Commencing with Babylon, there are to be four great kingdoms, the last divided into ten parts. Then the end of the world should come. Please read that chapter. This prophecy is now all fulfilled, accepting the end, as you must know if you have examined the subject at all. The great prophecy of the 2300 years of Daniel 8:14, pointing to the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, which is the work of the Judgment, also ends about this time. See Scott, Hatcher, and others upon this question.

There are ten distinct chains of prophecies in the Bible, each one pointing to the end of time and the setting up of God's kingdom. A slight examination of these must convince any one that we are in the last link of each of them. Now notice some of the New Testament prophecies. In answer to the question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the world?" Matt. 24:3, Jesus says, "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come," Matt. 24:14.

He does not say that all nations shall believe the gospel, be converted by it, and have a thousand years millennium before the end. No; it is simply to be preached to all nations for a witness against them. Then, not a thousand years after, shall the end come. Is this prophecy reliable? Do you believe the words of Jesus? Well, have they not been fulfilled? Do you not know that the whole world has the gospel preached to them to-day? There is not a nation who has it not. Listen to the following testimonies upon this point. The editor of the Christian Union says, "The whole world has been ransacked and explored; there is not a corner on the globe where Christianity is unknown." The Bible has been translated into about three hundred languages. Every nation has now heard the gospel. The prophecy of Jesus is fulfilled. Will his promise now fail? No, never. Then the end is at hand.

Another fact has a strong bearing on this question. The light of God's truth commenced in Eastern Asia, as far back as the days of Abraham. Steadily it has been making its course westward, till, like the sun, it has gone around the world. Asia had it first; next Africa stretched out her hands to God; then Greece and Italy were lighted up by the labors of Paul and his successors; soon the heart of Europe was warmed by the great Reformation, in the days of Luther and his successors; next the pure gospel under Wesley came West, not only to England, but it shone across the waters of the Atlantic, and lightened up all America. And now, quite across this continent, yea, among all the islands of the Pacific, this light is shining clearly. The end has been reached, the globe has been girdled, all nations have heard, God's appointed time has come,—the harvest of the Lord. Come to Judgment, ye nations of earth. Your allotted race is run.

Another fact has a strong bearing upon this question. It has been the faith of the church that at the end of the six thousand years the end would come. This faith has been well founded. There is something peculiar in the number seven in the Bible. Six days of creation; the seventh, the Sabbath of rest. Six years the Jews were to till their land; the seventh it had to rest; and so in many other instances. Just so we believe that after six thousand years, the seventh will be a thousand years of rest to the earth. Jesus will come, take his saints to Heaven, destroy the wicked from the face of the earth, and then it will be entirely desolate a thousand years, and thus enjoy its Sabbath. That the six thousand years are now just closing is agreed by all. Of course no one can tell just the year of the end, but that it is not far from this time is evident. This strongly indicates that the end of the world is at hand.

As a definite sign of the end, and that the last generation has come, the Lord has foretold that the sun and moon should be darkened, and that the stars should fall. This sign is made very prominent in the Bible, every time in the same order, with the same events following. See Joel 2:10, 11, 30, 32; Joel 3:13-16; Matt. 24:29-34; Mark 13:24-30; Luke 21:25-32; Rev. 6:12-17. Please read these scriptures, as I have not space to quote them. You will find them very plain. All three of these signs have been remarkably fulfilled. May 19, 1780, the sun was darkened according to the prophecy. Beginning to grow dark about the middle of the forenoon, it became so dark at noon that persons could not see to read without lighting their lamps. The legislature of Connecticut, being in session, had to adjourn. It was so dark that the fowls went to roost; cattle came lowing to the barn-yard; frogs began to peep, the night hawks came out, and everything bore the appearance of gloom and night. The uncommon darkness lasted fourteen hours, or till after midnight. It could not have been an eclipse of the sun, as a total eclipse lasts only about five minutes. Scientific men have never been able to give a reason for it. So remarkable was this day that Noah Webster has noticed it in his dictionary, as the "DARK DAY." See Explanatory and Pronouncing Vocabulary of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary. That night, though the moon had full the day before, was so dark that white paper could not be distinguished from the blackest velvet a few inches from the eyes. One writer says it was so dark that the darkness could be felt. The general impression was that it was a sign of the day of God, and that the Judgment was at hand.

Nov. 14, 1833, the stars fell. Thousands are now living who witnessed that remarkable shower. Prof. Olmstead, the celebrated astronomer of Yale College, says, "Those who were so fortunate as to witness the exhibition of shooting stars on the morning of Nov. 13, 1833, probably saw the greatest display of celestial fireworks that has ever been since the creation of the world."

So remarkable was the falling of the stars that it is put down in books on physical geography, natural philosophy, and astronomy, as the most wonderful ever known. They fell thick and fast like snowflakes in a heavy storm. It looked as though the very heavens were raining balls of fire. This is just what the prophecy foretold. The Lord says when you see these things, know that the end is near at hand.

Modern spiritualism is another marked sign of the end. If I had space I could quote many scriptures plainly foretelling spiritualism, as the last sign just before the end. Here is one: "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. Behold, I come as a thief." Rev. 16:13-15.

When is this to be? When Jesus is just about to come as a thief in the night, and when the battle of that great day of God Almighty is at hand. Then the prophet says the spirits of devils will go every where over the world, working miracles to deceive the people. To the same effect see Matt. 24:23, 27; 1 Tim. 4:1-3; 2 Thess. 2:8-12.

Spiritualism arose in 1848. In about a quarter of a century it has made 10,000,000 converts and it is spreading with wonderful rapidity. It does do miracles. It performs wonders. It claims to be the work of spirits. The Bible says it is the spirits of devils, and that it is a sign of the end at hand.

Wonderful storms by sea and land, and earthquakes, are to be another sign of the end. See Luke 21:25; Rev. 11:18, 19; Rev. 16:17-21. Every observer must be aware that the last few years have been remarkable in this very respect.

Of the frequency of earthquakes the Christian Statesman, of July 17, 1875 says, "The continued occurrence and great severity of earthquakes has distinguished the period in which we are now living above all others since the records of such phenomena began to be generally preserved."

The New York Observer says, "There has been a perfect epidemic of sad disasters by storm and flood during the present summer."

Look at the terrible fires, destructive floods, fearful storms of thunder and lightning, which have occurred in the last few years. These are only precursors of the wrath of God which is soon to destroy a guilty world.

Just before the end the earth was to be morally corrupt, as in the days of the flood. See Matt. 24:37; Gen. 6:5, 12. That the world is becoming fearfully corrupt is testified to on all hands.

Says the Scientific American, "It is admitted by all parties that crimes of the most outrageous and unprecedented character abound throughout the country, and probably throughout the world, to a degree wholly unparalleled."

Testimonies like these may be read from almost any paper. Lying, cheating, forgery, stealing, adultery, murder,—these are the order of the day, and rapidly increasing. Look at the corruption of our great cities. If God overthrew Sodom for its crimes how much longer can he spare these cities?

A spirit of war, and great preparations for war was to be another sign of the end. See Rev. 11:18; Joel 3:9-15. Now look over the world. See the vast military camps. Not less than five millions of soldiers are in arms. See the wonderful preparations for war everywhere, the terrible weapons of destruction which are being formed. They are preparing for the battle of the great day.

Religiously, the professed church of Christ is in just the condition foretold in the Bible, as another sign of the end near. See 2 Tim. 3:1-5. Particularly love of money, love of pleasure, formality, etc., were to be prevalent sins among those professing godliness. This was to be the condition of things. Alas, the picture is but too truly filled up. The old simplicity and the power of God has died out of the churches. They are asleep, dreaming of a temporal millennium. Their pastors are fattening on high salaries, and feasting with the ungodly, while they are mocking at the coming of the Lord. But hark! what do I hear? All over this land, in every city, through the villages, out in the country, everywhere, is heard the solemn message of warning, "The Lord is coming; the Judgment is at hand; the day of wrath is near." For nearly forty years this solemn cry has been sounding through the land, though hated and disbelieved by the great mass, just as Jesus said it would be. See Matt. 24:37. I repeat my text again, "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." "Can you not discern the signs of the times?"

Reader, stop; open your eyes, and give attention. Look at this subject. We warn you, if you do not, you will soon repent of it. Are you ready? Are you reconciled to God? Are you prepared to meet your Judge? In the words of the apostle we warn you, "Beware therefore, lest that come upon you, which is spoken of in the prophets; behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish; for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you." Acts 13:40, 41.

A PASTOR visited one day a person who pretended that he could not believe. He tore a leaf from his memorandum book and wrote these words: "I do not believe that Jesus Christ is my Saviour!" "There, sign that," said he, handing him the paper. "No, never, I will not sign that," replied he with energy. "You see, then, that you do believe in Christ, but were afraid to acknowledge it to yourself."

er work wonders in any cause;—why use these agencies in God's good work?
The Tract Society brings the good discussion in close brotherhood with the rich man who perhaps has not so good ability to distribute tracts; thus one furnishes the other with the other works in visiting and distributing tracts.
The Tract Society furnishes the printed materials at wholesale prices, and, by its extensive influence and membership, scatters the light evenly over the world; and by the experience and ability of its leaders, it is able to instruct its members in the wisest ways of doing good.
The man who works alone is more exposed to the enemy's guns, and often he spends much time and labor to no account, or at least may find his work nearly fruitless; but in association with the hosts of the Lord, he will find results to be victory and peace.
All may work in harmony and union.
The carnal mind is ever at cross-points with the new man in harmony with the work of God. Let us then seek for a whole consecration of heart to his work.

QUARTERLY MEETING OF N. Y. & P. A. T. & M. SOCIETY.

This meeting was held at Ulysses, Potter
Co., Pa., March 25 and 26.
Owing to the circumstances, and the fact that the district in which the meeting was held is not centrally located, the attendance of directors was small, but all the districts furnished reports, and the attendance of the members in the locality was good. The following is the report of labor for the quarter:—

Quite a number of those to whom the VOICE was sent last year were reported as having subscribed for the REVIEW or the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and several were reported as having embraced the truth from reading the VOICE.

A good degree of courage is manifested on the part of the members of the Society, and special efforts will be made during the coming quarter to increase the circulation of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES and REFORMER.

“BABYLON IS FALLEN.”

I AM more and more convinced that the popular time-serving churches of our day are mentioned prophetically in the Bible, and that the language found in Rev. 14:8, and placed at the head of this article is now prophetically true. Every child of God within the pale of such religious organizations should know it and “come out” as all are plainly told to do in chapter 18:4.

The following extract, taken from the Gouverneur Times, published in St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., is significant, showing how the churches with their ministers join in with the world in fun and frolic.

At a spelling-school in St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., “a committee of three ladies were chosen to decide who was the homeliest man—and their united decision placed the Rev. R. J., D. D., of Richville, N. Y., in possession of the prize, whereupon he was named as a committee to pick out the handsomest woman. After passing once around the room, he put on his ‘spectacles’ and went again, amid the hearty laughter of all present, and the prettiest looks of many anteasing fair ones.

“And true to the taste of all old men, the Dr. selected a young lady, and the exercises closed by a promenade between them. The Rev. Dr. representing one extreme, and his fair companion representing the other, walked side by side, making a pleasant and interesting finish.”

I will only add that the Rev. D. D., mentioned above, opposed the work of proclaiming the “third message” last winter, and made a statement in public (on a funeral occasion when I was not at liberty to make any reply) that we had no Sabbath in this dispensation, and he could find a good many passages of Scripture where Sunday was called the Lord's day.

THE T. & M. LOOKING-GLASSES.

THE demand for these, in Ohio, during the last three months has been quite good.
Some districts in the State returned to the State quarterly meeting one of these “Reports of Labor” for every member of the Society in the district. This is just as it should be. When every member shall have learned to report quarterly, according to the rules of our organization, we shall then feel that one important step has been made in the direction of efficiency. One district that made no report at all the first quarter came forward nobly the second quarter, presenting a report from every member; and what was better still each report represented a donation; that is, every member made a donation. Every district was represented, and each did well.

It seems to me that we cannot be otherwise than profited by a frequent examination of ourselves in the light of the T. &
M. Looking-glass, and as we seat ourselves at the end of each three months before this mirror to make out our report of labor in the Lord's vineyard, we do certainly bring three months of our life in review.

Let the demand for these mirrors increase, and let each director see to it that each member has one upon which to represent his labor every quarter. We are much encouraged in the good work; for progress is manifest.

WALK IN THE LIGHT.

[The following article was written for “The Gleaner,” and read before our Tract and Missionary Society at Adams Center, N. Y. MARY L. BROWN.]

“Walk in the light, so shalt thou know
That fellowship of love,

God calls upon us as his followers to walk in the light. As he is the light of the world, so are we the children of light if we walk in his footsteps; but if we follow not him, we become the children of darkness.
And again, if “we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.” Oh, the unspeakable privilege of being cleansed from all sin! This preparation of heart will only be attained unto by overcoming everything unholy, impure, and wrong, in the sight of God; and we are able to do this by keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Shall not the thought of standing without fault before the throne of God inspire us cheerfully to suffer and toil on in the work of overcoming? Is it not sufficient to make up for all our tears and trials? Let us remember, “He that overcometh shall inherit all things.”

When we walk in the light and are keeping God's commandments, we do not feel like standing still and doing nothing, but we have a desire to move forward, and feel we must make advancement in the work of the third angel's message; and the more we work the more of the Spirit of God do we feel in our hearts. Each of us has some work to do. We cannot, as followers of Christ, remain with our hands folded and have the favor of God. The Tract and Missionary Society opens before all a means of doing good. The highest in rank may be approached (and perhaps with less offense than by any other method) by sending them a few tracts. The Holy Spirit can go with and bless the smallest effort for souls, and has often used the feeblest instruments for bringing about the most glorious results. May we all feel the worth of souls, and realize the shortness of time, each feeling anxious to do something that may benefit others and glorify God; then his blessing will surely follow; and if faithful unto the end, beauty and bliss untold and unending, shall be ours.

SCOLDING.

SCOLDING is mostly a habit. There is not much meaning to it. It is often the result of nervousness and an irritable condition of both mind and body. A person is tired, or annoyed at some trivial cause, and forthwith commences finding fault with everything and everybody in reach. Scolding is a habit very easily formed. It is astonishing how soon one who indulges in it at all becomes addicted to it and confirmed in it. It is an unreasoning and unreasonable habit. Persons who once get in the way of scolding always find something to scold about. If there is nothing else, they fall to scolding at the mere absence of anything to scold at. It is an extremely disagreeable habit. It is contagious. Once introduced into a family, it is pretty certain in a short time to affect all the members.

People in the country more readily fall into the habit of scolding than people in town. Women contract the habit more frequently than men. This may be because they live more constantly in the house, in a confined and heated atmosphere, very trying to the nervous system and the health in general; and it may be, partly, that their natures are more susceptible and their sensitiveness more easily wounded.
The proper remedy for the habit, if formed, is to experience an endowment of that divine love shed abroad in the new heart by the Holy Ghost, the characteristics of which are that it “is not easily provoked,” “thinketh no evil,” and “beareth all things.”—Bible Banner.

ANOTHER WITNESS TO THE DARK DAY.

THE following item will most likely be of interest to the numerous readers of the REVIEW:—

In this county, and four or five miles from this place, lives a colored man, Joseph Gunn, who claims to have reached the ripe old age of 110 years—his age, as he says, being on record in the Bible of his old master who died long since. From the incidents that he is able to recollect, we presume he is not mistaken. He was born a slave to Thos. Foster, in Maryland Co., Va. He was taken from Va. to North Carolina, and brought from North Carolina to Missouri by Thos. Gunn, deceased, about fifty-four years ago. He says he has seen Gen. Washington often, and recollects many of the incidents of the Revolutionary war, being a good-sized boy at that time, large enough to carry water to the soldiers,
as he claims to have done.

He says he remembers the dark day very distinctly, being engaged in hauling wood from a clearing at the time, when it became so dark that he could not see his oxen.
His impression was that the great day had come, and he hastened to the house where he found all the family of the same impression. He says it remained dark until late in the evening. He says he was also a witness to the falling stars, being at the time camped out on the way from North Carolina to Missouri. His master hearing a noise where the horses were fastened waked him up to go and see what caused it. He returned and told his master that the stars were all falling, and that the Judgment must be at hand.

This old man claims that his physical powers are good with the exception of his eyesight, which is poor. He says he can walk several miles without tiring, and is able to work about the premises. He says he is a Methodist and was converted early in life. He seems to be of a very religious turn, and sensible in his conversation.
Who knows but this old man may live to see the Saviour come? How earnest ought we to be in the work of giving the last warning message!

THE DAY IS AT HAND.

My night is far spent, my day is at hand.
The wilderness is nearly traversed; Canaan and Jerusalem are almost within my view;
the summits of the everlasting hills are already appearing. What manner of person, then, ought I to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God!

I must press forward; and so much the more as I see the day approaching; I must be consistent and heavenly-minded, so walking worthy of my calling, and setting my affections on things above. For what have I, who have a crown in prospect, a kingdom in reversion, to do with the vanities or pleasures of this poor and passing world?
My eye is above; my treasure is in Heaven; shall not my heart be there also? If I am in Christ, I must seek to be like him, and to follow him more and more closely, as the night is hastening to an end, and the day about to break. If I am in sorrow, I shall call to mind that weeping endureth but for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

If I am in comfort, I must see that this prosperity which God has given me is making me a holier man, and a more self-denying worker for Him who loved me and washed me from my sins in his own blood. If I am poor, I shall rejoice that my day of wealth is just at hand. If I am rich, I shall take this gold which my Lord has given me, and lay it all at his beloved feet. Mine must be no half discipleship—no service of two masters—no divided heart. The night is far spent, the day is at hand. What remains of this brief life of mine must be given wholly to the Lord.—H. Bonar.

A JEWISH rabbi of Chicago is anxious to have a legal settlement of the question, “Is Christianity a part of the common law of this country?” He has written a letter on the subject to the Albany Law Journal.
He asks American jurists to investigate his question, to let Jewish citizens know how far the practical application of legal Christianity may possibly go, and to take proper steps for the abolition of the un-American principle of established Christianity. But whatever any lawyer may have told this Chicago rabbi, his question is one which he should not have been under the necessity of asking. He should have known, as an intelligent citizen, that the Christian religion forms no part of the common law, or of our legal system, any more than it does of our political legislation or constitutional system.
There are men who desire the adoption of an ecclesiastical amendment to the Constitution making Christianity the recognized religion of the country. But the mere fact that such an amendment would disfranchise more than fifty thousand Jewish citizens and voters who must refuse to take the oath to support and maintain it, is itself conclusive evidence that it could not be adopted. The Jews are perfectly safe in the enjoyment of all their religious and political rights.

To every one man who reads the Bible, there are one hundred who read you and me. Remember that fact. We are known and read of all men, and if we would preserve God's kingdom on earth we must become living witnesses of its power to save the world and to ennoble the hearts of sinful men.

Obituary Notices.

FELL asleep in Jesus, the 29th of March, 1876, at his father's residence in Washington, N. H., Bro. Albert F. Ball, aged twenty-seven years. His disease was consumption. At the time Bro. and Sr. White were at that place, eight years ago last February, he, with thirteen others, commenced to serve the Lord. Of this number three have now fallen asleep, and rest in hope. Bro. Albert has ever manifested that evenness of character which is so commendable in a Christian; also a willingness to bear such responsibilities as the providence of God indicated that he should. His last words to his mother were, “Be faithful.” He was asked when dying if all was well; he whispered: “All is well.” He leaves a wife and child to mourn their loss, but not without hope.

“He sleeps in Jesus—peaceful rest—
No mortal strife invades his breast;
No pain, nor sin, nor woe, nor care,
Can reach the silent slumberer there.”

Remarks at the funeral, from 1 Thess. 4:13-18,

DIED, in the triumphs of a living faith, of consumption of the bowels, at Omaha, Neb., March 16, 1876, John Whitlock, in the 65th year of his age. Father Whitlock embraced the faith of Adventists about sixteen years ago in Munoy, Pa.
He embraced all the commandments of God two years ago while living in Rock Island, Ill., under the personal labors of Eld. R. F. Andrews, and kept the Sabbath faithfully up to the time of his death. He was a firm believer in the soon coming of Christ, and longed for that event. He leaves a wife and six children. “Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth.”

THEO. F. KENDALL.

DIED, of Paralysis, Feb. 16, 1876, at Albert Lea, Minn., our dear mother, Diadama Squier, aged fifty-nine years. Mother embraced present truth three years ago this winter, under the labors of E. H. Ellis, and H. F. Phelps, and has lived it ever since, and loved it, though she had to keep the Sabbath alone during the last year and a half of her life. She sleeps in Jesus, awaiting the resurrection morning. She leaves five sons and four daughters, and many friends, to mourn the loss of her good counsel.

DIED, probably of a rupture of a blood-vessel in the head, after an illness of less than two days, at Lodi, Columbia Co., Wis., April 5, 1876, Etta M., youngest daughter of N. M. and F. L. Jordan, aged three years and nine months. We mourn our loss, but she sleeps in peace. Funeral service by Eld.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE OHIO T. & M. SOCIETY.

THE fifth annual meeting of the Ohio Tract and Missionary Society was held on the camp-ground at Norwalk, Huron Co., Ohio, Aug. 14, 1876. After the usual opening exercises, it was moved that the President appoint the nominating committee. The committee was appointed, and the meeting adjourned to call of the Chair.

SECOND SESSION.

This session was opened with prayer by Eld. James White, after which report of previous meeting was read and accepted. Report of past year's labor was as follows:—

Membership, 230; No. of families visited, 1000; No. of letters written, 357; No. of pages of pamphlets and tracts distributed, 341,424; No. of almanacs, 1,426; No. of periodicals, 1,975; No. of new subscribers obtained, 399.

The report of Committee on Nominations was presented and accepted, and the following persons were unanimously elected: President, H. A. St. John; Vice President, R. A. Underwood; Secretary, M. E. Underwood; Treasurer, M. E. Guilford. Directors: Dist. No. 1, J. W. Lucas; Dist. No. 2, A. M. Mann; Dist. No. 3, R. A. Underwood; Dist. No. 4, George Smith; Dist. No. 5, J. J. Boardman; Dist. No. 6, Wm. F. Crouse.

Next in order was the reading of an essay, "Rise and Progress of the Ohio T. & M. Society" by the secretary.

Voted, That the essay be furnished to REVIEW AND HERALD for publication.

Voted, That the secretary prepare another essay for our next annual meeting.

Brief remarks were made by Eld. James White relative to our publications as being the right arm of our strength.

Adjourned, sine die.

[The following extract from a private letter shows the effect the truth has on minds in various parts of the country. The writer is a brother, living in Catawba Co., N. C.]

Yesterday I took some of the tracts you sent me and went to my neighbor's house, where several were assembled for work. I distributed them, all seeming anxious to read. The effect as yet I cannot tell; however, I think, yea, I know that it will do some good. While they seem slow to practice, I have never found but one of our best-informed farmers who did not seem half convinced that Saturday is the Sabbath; and if I were to speak my mind in full, I would say they are altogether convinced so far as the Bible is concerned. Tradition seems to blind them, yet the work is beginning, and I believe the Spirit of God is with it; if so, it will have its effect in spite of traditional doctrines. May God help his children to join heart and hand in this great work of reform.

The people here are generally poor, but hospitable; generally ignorant, yet they manifest a desire to know the truth. I think this truth should be preached in every city and town, and not only so, but in every church and school-house, and in every other convenient place over this broad land; and I believe the time is here when it should be done. With this impression continually upon my mind, I can scarcely retain the plow handles.

"WHY STAND YE HERE ALL THE DAY IDLE?"

ARE there not many of us alone simply because we are idle? Christ says, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in Heaven." Little do we know what good may be accomplished by a single effort in the right direction. We no doubt feel lonesome and well-nigh discouraged at times. Very often we think if there could only be a course of lectures where we live, much good would be done. Now we should live in such a way that all true Christians will want to investigate our faith.

Perhaps it might encourage others to know what success I met with in reading Nos. 3 and 4 of the present volume of the REVIEW to my neighbors, and comparing with the Bible. It resulted as follows: One brother, fifty-four years of age, who has belonged to the Baptist church thirty-five years, has been keeping the two last Sabbaths with me. His mother, over eighty years of age, who has been a member of the Methodist church sixty years, kept the last Sabbath. His daughter has also promised to keep the Sabbath with her father.

We will do what we can to get others to keep the Sabbath, and look to God for assistance. Pray for us, that our feeble efforts may result in some good; and may God help us to see our own faults and overcome them.

A WELCOME VISITOR.

WE usually prize very highly the weekly visits of a dear friend who comes to our homes, not only bearing good news, but bringing to us those things which are necessary to sustain life. We should feel very sorry to have him discontinue his calls were we going to sustain such a loss. Two dollars a year would be a very small sum for us to pay to insure the weekly calls and benefactions of such a friend.

Such is the REVIEW. It makes us a visit once a week, bringing us good news from far countries, and presenting before us that kind of food which is calculated to sustain spiritual life. It tells us of the dangers that beset our pathway to the glorious city, and admonishes us to be faithful in living out the truth, that we may gain an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of God.

Truly I can say that the REVIEW is next to my Bible, and it is a great wonder to me how so many of our people can let the REVIEW cease making its calls when two dollars would secure its weekly visits for one year. Brethren and sisters, the REVIEW needs your help, and certainly you need the strength and encouragement which it will give you. Look at the Progress Department; can you read the good reports from the workers in this cause and not be stirred up to greater diligence yourself? Is it not a feast of fat things? Does your heart beat in unison with this work of the third angel's message? If so, how can you let the REVIEW pass you by, when all that it calls for is two dollars for one year? Let us do our duty in the fear of God, and his blessing will rest upon us.

ANOTHER WITNESS OF THE DARK DAY.

A SHORT time ago, I had the privilege of meeting Mr. James Bowlby, now one hundred and six years of age. Hearing of this aged pilgrim, I traveled some distance to see him. As we drove into the yard, Mr. Bowlby, with hoe in hand, was on his way to the garden. With a quicker step than often carries those of threescore years, he advanced to meet us. I note the following brief sketch of his past life, as given by himself, in the conversation which followed:—

He was born in March, A. D. 1770, near Hampton, New Jersey, and was brought up by his parents on a farm and in a grist mill. He spent some time in the U. S. navy. He also taught school in Ohio, Louisiana and Arkansas, his last term being in the winter of 1873-4.

I inquired if he remembered the dark day of May 19, 1780. "Oh, yes," said he, "I shall never forget that day. On account of the darkness which prevailed, work was suspended, and the young people came together. In company with others, I took a boat ride and was capsized on the mill-pond."

Mr. Bowlby says that from youth it has been impressed upon his mind that he shall not die, but live to see the King in his glory; and I see no reason why his expectation may not be realized. He bears the appearance of one who has hardly passed the allotted age of man. His eye is not dim and his hearing is good.

For many years he has been a member of the Baptist church. Efforts will be made by a brother who accompanied me to call his attention to the Sabbath truth. May this light burst upon his vision, and he be spared to join that company who shall exclaim: "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us."

TO MAKE A HAPPY HOME AND VIRTUOUS FAMILY.

1. LEARN to govern yourselves, and to be gentle and patient.
2. Guard your tempers, especially in seasons of ill-health, irritation, and trouble, and soften them by prayer, penitence, and a sense of your own shortcomings and errors.
3. Never speak or act in anger, until you have prayed over your words or acts, and concluded that Christ would have done so, in your place.
4. Remember that valuable as is the gift of speech, the gift of silence is often much more so.
5. Do not expect too much from others, but remember that all have an evil nature, whose developments we must expect, and we should forbear and forgive, as we often desire forbearance and forgiveness ourselves.
6. Never retort a sharp or angry word. It is the second word that makes the quarrel.
7. Beware of the first disagreement.
8. Learn to speak in a gentle tone of voice.
9. Learn to say kind and pleasant things whenever an opportunity offers.
10. Study the character of each one, and sympathize with all in their troubles, however small.
11. Do not neglect little things, if they can affect the comfort of others in the smallest degree.
12. Learn to deny yourself, and to prefer others.

Obituary Notices.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth."

DIED, in South Kingston, R. I., July 22, 1876, of quick consumption, sister Mary A. Collins, aged twenty years, eleven months, and fourteen days. She loved the present truth and lived a consistent life for several years; but she deeply deplored her unworthiness before God, sought earnestly for acceptance in Jesus' name, found peace in believing, enjoyed his pardoning love, and so fell asleep in hope of a better resurrection, and that soon. She left a testimony to her friends and young associates not to leave a duty undone, but to walk in all the commands and ordinances of the Lord faithfully. Discourse by the writer from Rev. 14: 13 to a company of attentive hearers.

SABBATH IN BATTLE CREEK.

WHILE cheering reports come to us from all parts of the field, telling of the progress of the cause and of the way God is preparing openings for the reception of his word, and blessing his servants who faithfully do his work, we want to tell what the Lord is doing in Battle Creek.

We are having excellent Sabbath meetings. Two weeks ago last Sabbath, Bro. White preached two sermons. He had passed a restless night, and the morning found him hardly able to be up. After presenting his case to the Lord he felt impressed to go to meeting and try to speak to the people. He selected the eighteenth chapter of Matthew as his subject. The chapter is a beautiful discourse in itself; but the wonderful connection of its different parts and the touching and instructive lessons to be learned from it were so clearly brought out by the speaker that the words of the Master seemed to arrange themselves in living sentences of light before our eyes.

We never saw Bro. White more free. The Lord blessed him in speaking; and when he had finished his discourse in the afternoon, he said that he had been improving in physical strength all day.

Much has been done in planning and executing improvements at the College, in regulating the affairs of the Health Institute so that they present a more promising phase than ever before, and in setting things in order in the church; and the heft of this labor has rested upon Bro. White.

Sister White is keeping all hands busy with her pen, and Bro. White is hard at work several hours each day in arranging the manuscript for publication in a book, and at the same time selecting portions of it to be printed in several pamphlets. The presses are kept busy. Everybody here has enough to do, and God blesses in doing his work. He sustains his servants in their arduous labors wonderfully.

Last Sabbath, Nov. 4, Bro. White preached upon baptism and the necessity of walking in newness of life, putting on those qualities without which none can be a child of God. The Lord gave great freedom; and as the speaker closed his discourse, the blessing of God rested upon him with great power. The place seemed sacred, and we were loth to leave the house as the assembly dispersed.

The Lord is good, and in doing his will there is joy. If it is pleasant to work hard in his cause, what will it be to rest in his kingdom?

BATTLE CREEK.

TWENTY-ONE years since the REVIEW AND HERALD press was moved from Rochester, N. Y., to Battle Creek, Mich. Here we have battled for truth, and the manifestation of true and undefiled religion among our people for more than a score of years. Here we have witnessed the growth of our publishing work with deepest interest. Here we have seen the establishment of our Health Institute and the planting of our first College. And we are happy to record that prosperity attends all these institutions.

At Battle Creek there is a large membership with whom we have during the last seven months enjoyed the happiest days of the past twenty-one years. We have never enjoyed so great freedom in preaching the word to this people or to any other, as to the Battle Creek church since our return from California last April. This church has had trials, and has made mistakes. But having acknowledged those wrongs, and having entered into a most solemn covenant to stand unitedly for the right, the blessing of God has been returning, and last Sabbath morning was the best and happiest service we have ever enjoyed with this people.

The Battle Creek College was never as prosperous as at the present term. There are about one hundred and fifty students in attendance. And we shall be disappointed if this number be not increased to two hundred and fifty for the winter term. There should be a class of not less than one hundred at the Biblical Lectures the next term. Eld. Smith is eminently qualified for this important work. All our State Conferences should be represented in his classes by those who have the ministry in view.

from bad management, so bad that we have refused to be a director the past two years; but with the change of physicians we have taken hold again with perfect confidence that the Institute will see better days, and rise to the position which God designed that it should occupy in his cause. Our publishing work has not been so seriously affected by unfortunate changes as our other institutions have. This grand institution has been doing its work with prosperity and efficiency.

A prosperous and happy era for our institutions and cause at this post has come. The wonderful blessing of God has come upon his servants and upon his cause in standing fearlessly and firmly for the right, and in dealing with wrong and sin with a prompt and decided hand. And as an act of justice to this church, we here state the fact that nearly all the obstacles which have been thrown in the way of the cause here at head quarters during the past four years and nearly all the disgrace that has been brought upon the cause here during this time have been by those who have come here from other States under the profession of helpers of the cause. If the Battle Creek church failed in the past to stand with those whom God was leading—and no one acquainted with the facts in the case will deny this—then those who fell under the power of Satan so soon after coming to the rescue, and turned their hands to tear down the ones they professed to have come to help, made a terrible failure.

Many things in the past have been very unpleasant and harmful to the cause. And some movements which seemed necessary, and which partook very much of the nature of experiments, have been pretty clearly demonstrated. And the result strongly impresses our mind that the members of the Battle Creek church are entitled to our confidence as fully as those of any other church on the Continent. There was a time when we suffered much from this church. But as the members fully cleared themselves from the wrongs by confession, and as the Holy Spirit has been poured out upon us and the congregation as we have spoken the word of God to the people, our union is stronger to-day than it could have been had we suffered no injustice at the hands of this church.

We would not represent those who came to Battle Creek as helpers, and who made a failure, and now refuse to see, and neglect to acknowledge, their wrongs, as correctly representing their brethren in the several States from which they came. And yet, no doubt very many of our brethren in the several States know so little of the trials which Satan presses upon us who stand at head quarters of the cause, that should they come to Battle Creek as helpers in the work here they might fall under the power of Satan, and make greater failures than others have made. But few of our people understand anything of the labors, trials, and sacrifices of the Battle Creek church. And we settle here, after seeing what we have seen, and knowing what we do know, that there is more practical experience, power of endurance, and real moral reliability, in the Battle Creek church than can be found in the same number of persons composing whole churches in any of the States. Some will say that we state this matter in too strong and decided terms. They may be correct. They doubtless think they are. But should they pass through what we have, they might view this matter as we do. This, however, we may safely say, that as things have been working out for a few years past, complaints come with an ill grace from the other States against the Battle Creek church, which has redeemed the past, and is now coming up to the help of the Lord.

The good news of prosperity and freedom at the very heart of the work will send a thrill of joy through the entire body. God is working for our cause here and elsewhere gloriously; and our weary heart revives, and our spirit is triumphant in the mighty God of Jacob.

We soon leave this dear people to return to the Pacific Coast, where we shall probably remain over two winters. The Lord sent us to Battle Creek in early spring last; he has been with us in power on the complete circuit of the camp-meetings east of the Rocky Mountains, and has given us the strongest consolations of his grace and power while laboring to set things in order at head quarters. We have labored as never before, even in our more youthful strength, and are in better health and heart to labor than at any time during the past ten years. God has wonderfully sustained us under a tremendous pressure of care and toil at Battle Creek, and we feel that we honor God and do justice to this dear people in the foregoing frank statements.

Mrs. W. and the writer are growing old, and without special advantages and care from our people, it would be preposterous for us to undertake the round of all our camp-meetings for 1877. And as we are well aware that but very few of our people have a just idea of the strain of care and of labor of one-third of the whole year in camp-meetings at our age of life, we decide to rest from this kind of labor one year, and if it please God, we hope to visit the camp-meetings for 1878, refreshed by the Pacific climate and that rest which change gives. And as we are about to leave the seat of battle, these words press themselves up from the depths of the soul, "If I forget thee," O Battle Creek! Here we have spent twenty-one years of the very strength of life. Here we have fallen low beneath the pining stroke of disease. Here we have felt the slight and oppression of those we loved. Here the hand of God has lifted us up. Here we have known the joys of forgiving and being forgiven. And here we have felt that inexpressible satisfaction and holy, confiding joy that is the fruit of divine grace, which more than heals, in our feelings at least, all the errors and sorrows of the past. God bless the church at Battle Creek.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-Ninth Paper.—The Seven Last Plagues.

We have now brought our investigation of this subject down to the time when all cases have been examined and decided. The investigative Judgment in the most holy place has then transpired. The mystery of God is finished. Christ is no longer an intercessor. Probation has closed. We have endeavored to anticipate and answer all queries that properly arise in reference to this subject thus far; and we now turn our attention to what follows the work of this awful moment in which are concentrated the bliss and the woes of an eternity.

When Christ ceases to plead, and steps out from between God and rebellious and incorrigible man (for such are all those who at this time stand unreconciled to God), there is nothing to longer stay the vials of long-merited judgments from the shelterless heads of the wicked. Then can be fulfilled the punishment threatened by the third angel's message against the worshipers of the beast, which is the visitation of God's wrath with no mixture of mercy; Rev. 14: 10; and then we can have, as described in chapter 15: 1, the pouring out of those vials in which is filled up his indignation. Neither of these could be fulfilled while a divine mediator stood between God and men. For so long as God regards the pleading of his Son, which he will do so long as he pleads at all, he could not visit judgment upon men in which no mercy was mingled, nor pour out any vials filled up with wrath alone. This is proof that the third angel's message is addressed to the last generation of men; for on no others can the punishment threatened be visited.

We now propose to show that these judgments are the seven last plagues and that they immediately follow the close of our Lord's work in the sanctuary above.

In the 15th of Revelation, verse 5, John speaks of the opening of the tabernacle of the testimony in Heaven. This is the opening of the most holy place of the sanctuary, as elsewhere explained. After this, seven angels come out of the temple having the seven plagues, represented as seven golden vials full of the wrath of God. They go forth to pour these out upon men, and the temple or sanctuary is filled with smoke, so that no man, or no being, as it might be translated, is able to enter therein, or carry forward a work of ministration there, till the seven plagues of the seven angels are fulfilled.

In verse 1 of this chapter it is said that in these plagues is filled up the wrath of God, which shows that they are poured out after probation is ended, and the sun of mercy has withdrawn its last warning ray from this apostate earth.

The statement of verse 8, that no one was able to enter into the temple till the seven plagues are fulfilled, is another proof of the same point, and if possible still more positive. For ever since Christ commenced his work in Heaven, there has been some one in the sanctuary. So this scene has not transpired in the past, and it is certain that the seven last plagues have not yet commenced to be poured out. And until Christ closes forever his service as priest, there will be some being in the sanctuary; for there is no break in this work from beginning to end. So the scene of verse 8 cannot transpire till the sanctuary work is done.

The prototype of this scene is found in Ex. 40: 34, 35: "Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. And Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because a cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle." This was at the commencement of the typical work here on earth, the scene described in Rev. 15 is at the close of the real work in Heaven. Thus this work, far as man has to do with it, is bounded at its beginning and close with an overpowering manifestation of the glory of God. He takes sole possession of his own dwelling place, and thus seals his seal to the work which has been accomplished therein.

Thus as we pass out from the sanctuary, we are called upon to look at the effects of the close of this work in scenes to transpire here and there. A full dissertation upon the subject of the plagues is not called for here. See the subject discussed more at length in Thoughts on Revelation, chapter 16. We only glance here at simply the most prominent features.

As we have shown that these plagues are a probation, so there is just as clear evidence that they will be literal. The first falls upon men who are guilty of that sin which the message is warning the world against to-day. A sore, noisome and grievous, more corrupt than the leprosy, more stinging than black more painful than boils, breaks forth upon them who, contrary to light and warning, have received the mark of the beast, and worshiped its image.

The second vial throws the sea into the most infectious and deadly condition that can be conceived of; it becomes like the blood of a dead man. If this applies to the oceans of our globe as we see not why it may not, we leave one's imagination to grapple with the problem what the condition of the earth would be in three quarters of it enveloped in this deadly substance.

The third plague strikes at a still more vulnerable spot, and the rivers and fountains become blood; as if the earth in her last agony was pouring forth blood from every aperture, even as it oozed from the Saviour's pores, as he wrestled with the world's sin and darkness in lonely Gethsemane. This plague, as perhaps the preceding, will probably be of short duration, as it would seem that none could long survive should this cup of blood be pressed continually to their lips.

The fourth plague lights up the sun with an unwonted flame. Vegetation withers beneath its scorching rays; the streams evaporate; the heat burns to the very bones of men; and an air of desolation spreads over the face of nature. We now have the woes of men increased in a regular ratio: first, sores; then, as a consequence, fever and thirst; then blood to quench thirst; and finally, blazing, glaring, intolerable heat from a sun on fire.

The fifth angel pours the contents of his vial upon the seat of the beast, old Rome, gray and crumbling from its long years of sin. And the kingdom of the beast, the whole Catholic world is full of darkness. The similar plague in Egypt, produced darkness so gross that it could be recognized by the sense of touch; and in dark night following the dark day of 96 years ago, even dumb animals were filled with terror, that horses could not be forced from their stables. So here the darkness sums around the followers of the papal apostasy legions of undefinable terrors till they dare not stir, but gnaw their tongues for their pains at their sores.

The sixth angel stations himself over the Euphrates, and pours his vial upon the Turkish empire; and its waters (people), which have for many years already been growing weaker, or drying up, will then be clean dried up, and the way of the kings of the East will be laid open, that they may come up to the battle of the great day of the Lord. Then the spirits of devils from the three great systems of false or apostate religion, the dragon, beast, false prophet, paganism, popery, and a dead, backslidden Protestantism, go forth to gather the nations to the last strife. And they may be up goaded by their own sufferings and torments, the results of the previous plagues, and expelled by devils, to the valley of slaughter, the great antitypical Megiddo.

The seventh angel hurls the contents of his vial around the globe. The air is tainted, every breathing thing inhales the deadly miasma. Then the voice of God, which has shaken the earth, is heard again, and shall shake both earth and heaven. That voice proclaims the controversy ended. It is done. And majestic utterance rends the earth with mightiest convulsion it has ever felt. The the weight of the curse and been torn by the disorders of sin, is laid in its coffin for a

C. R. AUSTIN.]

To the church of Seventh-day Adventists of eshire, Christian salutation.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN AND SISTERS:
ough absent in the flesh, yet am I present with in spirit beholding your order and the stead-ness of your faith. I thought it meet, both your encouragement and my own, to address this brief epistle.

The cause of God is the Cause of causes. It the sum of all excellence. Well might the et exclaim, "Salvation, oh! the joyful and." Salvation—it stoops to find the sinon the verge of the lowest hell, and exalts first, to friendship and reconciliation, then ship with Christ. The peace and the promises of God are the legacy of the saints ing their minority. Peace is the foretaste Heaven, while the promises, together with witness of the Spirit, are the surety. Christ our bondsman, and God his indorser. The promise is of life from the dead—eternal life.
includes the kingly office and the kingdom.
includes admission through the pearly gates, sight of the King in his beauty, an introduc-into the presence of the Father, the privi-ge of plucking fruit from life's fair tree, and inking the waters of the river of God.

"Having therefore these promises, dearly loved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness the fear of God." Let us keep in view the truth for the time. Let us not forget that the three messages of Rev. 14 are the grand nucleus round which all saving truth is now crystalliz-ing. God's principal method of vitalizing the church during the "time of the end" is through present truth. To this the state of the nominal churches bears witness.

Dear brethren, let us have faith in God, in his word, and in his providence. Not a dead faith (devils have enough of that), but a living, practical faith. If God says in his word,
"Knock, and it shall be opened unto you; seek, and ye shall find," if he says, "Ask and it shall be given you," he requires that we credit him, that we believe his word. The basis on which rest faith is so broad that prayer without faith is an insult to God. Hence we read, "He that believeth not shall be damned."

Brethren and sisters, let us seek God daily.
Time is hastening. Probation will soon close.
Christ is viewing the guests. Let us have on the wedding garment. Let our loins be girt with truth, our lights burning, and our feet shod. Christ is coming, coming quickly.

"Be patient, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord." Remember "here is the patience of the saints." In the exercise of patience, great perplexities become small, and small ones vanish entirely. Christ was patient. We must be like him. Let your prayers be frequent, fervent, and full of faith. In a little while the faithful will be bidden to put off their armor.
Those who have gone forth weeping, with their little bundles of tracts and papers, and those who have patiently labored to make known to others the word of truth for this time, will return with joy bringing their sheaves with them.

They who have sown in tears will then reap with joy. The conflict with the flesh and with Satan will be ended. No more fightings without or fears within. "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Were I to speak to you of my personal experience and hope, it would be to say that I am of good courage in the Lord. God is being very gracious to me in my declining years. More than sixty years have passed since I put on Christ by profession. My experience has been varied, but never more hopeful than now. I have felt, especially during the past year, and still more so of late, that it is my privilege and duty to be fitting up, and getting ready, for the coming of the Lord. And I thank my God through our Lord Jesus Christ that I have this feeling more deeply fixed than ever before. I am daily trying to seek God to this end. I want a treasure in Heaven, but I cannot have it unless I lay it up there. I want Jesus for my chief Friend, but I cannot have him unless I do the things he commands me.

It is my earnest prayer and labor that I may finally inherit the kingdom of God at whatever expense. Next to myself in this respect are my brethren and sisters in the Lord, especially those of the churches with whom I have labored in time past.

Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink: if it be the will of God I would come unto you, and speak face to face, that our joy may be full.

Farewell, ALBERT STONE.

THE LAW OF GOD.

ONE of the greatest of the wonders of human depravity is the idea, that the moral law of God is subject to abolition or change. To suppose that that law, which was distinguished from all typical, ceremonial laws, that owe their existence to the fact that sin had entered into the world, being given by the Almighty in person, by his own voice, and in his own handwriting, was only designed for a section of our race, and was subject to change or abolition, is one of the most marvelous absurdities that ever disgraced the human intellect. There is disloyalty—treason against High Heaven—in the very thought!
All would know this, if they would stop to think upon it. But an eagerness for self-justification in following the customs of the world and the corruptions of apostate Christianity, blinds the mind and perverts the judgment;
and the result is that we hear from the desk consecrated to the proclamation of the everlasting gospel, and from the lips of those sworn to be faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, that the holy law, the transgression of which made it necessary for the Son of God to die in order to the redemption of the transgressor, has been in part, or wholly, abolished? Yes, many are the professed friends of God, who are engaged in the work of undermining and overthrowing his holy law, the only moral code he ever gave to man, and of which Jesus said that one jot or tittle should not pass from it till heaven and earth pass.

The difficulty is, they blindly work for the support of creeds and custom, not looking at fundamental principles, nor giving a thought to the character of God, the nature of his law, and the probabilities or improbabilities of a change of the moral code of Him who has said, "I change not," and of which law the Holy Spirit testified by David that it was "perfect." Ps.
19: 7. They go to work to pervert and prostitute the utterances of the New Testament which relate to the law of types and shadows that all know have been abolished, applying them to that law which is declared to be holy, just, good, spiritual, and by which is the knowledge of sin, and which is declared to be perfect and the truth itself. Rom. 7: 12, 14; 3: 20; Jas. 1: 25; Ps. 19: 7, and 119: 142. They do not stop to consider how that, which is perfect can be improved by a change, or what effect it must necessarily have upon the truth of God to change it.

But why all this blind antagonism to the law of God? The whole strife is concentrated upon a single point—the Sabbath of the Lord our God. But for the Sabbath, and the fact that the church, as well as the world, are trampling it under their feet, there would be no open controversy in respect to the perpetuity and immutability of the decalogue. And why should the Sabbath be singled out as unfit to have a place in the moral law, and consequently as something that must be abolished? No other answer can be given but that men have abolished the Sabbath of the Lord and substituted one of their own.

We first find the Sabbath in Eden, before sin entered the world, Gen. 2: 2, 3; we trace it through the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation, and find it one and the same thing. No other weekly Sabbath is once named in all the Book of God. And as we look to the promises of the world to come, we find the Sabbath still in existence, and all the redeemed and holy inhabitants of that bright world keeping it. Isa.
66: 22, 23. Ah! if men could see the value of a part in that world, they would be willing to bear the cross of unpopular truth here. They would leave their strivings against self-evident truth, and choose the blessedness of those who keep the commandments of God, "that they may have right to the tree of life." Rev. 22: 14.
"If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." Matt. 19: 17.

R. F. COTTELL.

SOUTHERN FRANCE.

DEAR READERS OF THE REVIEW: I arrived here with my family last Thursday and spoke in the evening to a large and attentive congregation. I spoke to a few in another neighborhood Sabbath afternoon and evening after the Sabbath, and the next day, yesterday, I spoke three times in this place. I have the privilege of occupying a temple, and have received urgent invitations to preach in other meeting-houses.
Of course there will be a change when the people come to the cross. But at present the prospect seems rather flattering. As the message is entirely new, and as the influences that bind the people are stronger here than in the New World, we expect to see the work advance by a slower process than in America. We propose to take time to move cautiously, gain the hearts and confidence of the people, and lay a foundation for a permanent work. We commenced with practical subjects. Our last discourse was on the second coming of Christ, and was appreciated, as appeared from the eagerness with which the people listened, and from the warm greetings and expressions of gratitude at the close of the meeting.

The people here are generally poor. Their main dependence is making wine, and their vineyards are nearly ruined by a dearth, and especially by a worm that works on the root of the vine. The farmers here depend as much on the fruit of the vine as Western farmers do on their corn crops and as the people of New England do on their dairies.

Mrs. B.'s health is feeble. Pray that God may give us each strength, wisdom and consecration for the work. D. T. BOURDEAU.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THIS paper should have a large circulation; and I feel very anxious that the Iowa Tract and Missionary Society shall make a special effort to extend it. I do not believe there is any object more important for the Society to take hold of with vigor than this. Bro. White's recent remarks on this point were excellent.

I have been a reader of the SIGNS whenever I could get it; and I can truly say it is just the paper to circulate among those desiring to investigate. It is better in this respect than the Review. It is a clean-looking, high-toned paper that will favorably impress any sensible person who takes it up. It has a plenty of good thoughts on leading points of present truth, enough in each number to set the people thinking of these things.

It also has other excellent matter, not strictly denominational, of interest to all religious people. It has good health items, well calculated to help the people where they need help. Its selections of secular and religious news are always interesting to all classes. It thus presents a good variety of reading matter such as the times demand. No sensible person could read this paper six months or a year without being favorably impressed with it and the people it represents. We ought as a people cordially to second the calls for an increased circulation of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. Now that the price is reduced to $2.00, very many of our people who do not take it should at once subscribe for it.

The articles from the pen of Sister White are alone worth far more than the whole paper costs.
Those who do not subscribe little know what they are losing. As president of the Iowa Tract and Missionary Society, I call upon all our directors and workers to make a special effort to circulate the SIGNS OF THE TIMES this fall and winter. We shall greatly neglect our duty if we let the time pass away and we make but little effort to sow the seeds of truth. It seems to me the Tract Societies should make a special point to circulate the SIGNS and REFORMER.

Periodicals will interest people when a tract or pamphlet will not. There is something "newsy" about them as they are taken out of the postoffice, which will always call attention, while a tract or book would be laid away.

The REFORMER is well worthy of extensive circulation. There may be occasionally some pretty strong meat for us slow ones; but there is always a plenty of most useful matter which all must admit is sadly needed in this age.
The REFORMER is interesting, entertaining, and highly instructive on many things sadly demanding instruction, in this age of appetite. But the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, especially as the organ of disseminating the light of present truth, demands strong efforts to secure a large circulation.
We shall find no better opportunity to scatter the light than by its means. Come, brethren and sisters of the Iowa and Nebraska Conference, let us take hold of this good work with cheerfulness and energy. It is high time to awake out of sleep. Our salvation is much nearer than when we first believed. The night of darkness will soon be upon the world. The day of rejoicing will soon come for the believer.
Let us secure many subscribers for these excellent periodicals this fall and winter.

THE BATTLE CREEK COLLEGE.

REALIZING to some degree the importance of education, and appreciating the facilities and advantages over other institutions of learning in our land, afforded at the Battle Creek College, which we are now attending, we appeal to our people everywhere, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to send their children, that they too may enjoy the advantages of this excellent institution.
We have here a large, commodious building, capable of seating at least four hundred students, situated in the most beautiful part of the city.
There is no finer locality for a school in the State of Michigan.

Prof. S. Brownsberger, a graduate of Michigan University, is a teacher of several years' experience. Prof. G. H. Bell is a teacher of nearly twenty-five years' experience. The others are highly educated in their several departments.
Such thoroughness in instruction and such clearness in imparting the same we have never found in other schools.

As the school is based upon Christian principles, and the faculty connected with it are all God-fearing men and women, parents need not fear to send their children: Here they will be free from the corrupting influences with which students are surrounded at other schools.

Few are too poor to come. The students' boarding clubs are in active operation, and are proving a success; so that the expense for board necessary in attending this school is less than one-half that of any other in the land.

In view of these facts, we invite our young brethren and sisters to come and fill up our fine building. We promise you a hearty welcome.
But especially we invite and urge our young brethren upon whom great responsibilities are resting in view of the shortness of time and the great work yet to be accomplished, to come and stay one term if they cannot stay longer, and prepare themselves to labor more successfully in the great harvest field.

Eld. Uriah Smith will begin his Biblical lectures about the first of January, and he can talk as well to the large hall full as to a few. Especially should those who contemplate entering the ministry, and those also who have been laboring with some degree of success, have the benefit of these lectures. It is unnecessary to say that as a lecturer and instructor Eld. Smith cannot be excelled even in the ranks of S. D. Adventists.
As he is released from the duties of local editor of the REVIEW, he will have more time to devote to this important branch of the work.

This winter we hope to see no less than one hundred and fifty in this class. And why not?
The work of the third angel's message is fast advancing. The Lord is soon coming, and in what condition will he find us?

Shall we hoard up our riches, and neglect to secure such cultivation of the mind as will enable us to work acceptably for the Lord? In view of these great considerations, we would make an earnest appeal to our young brethren to make an especial effort to come to our college this coming winter, to attend the Biblical lectures.

worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine." "That the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed." "If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even to the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrine that is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing," &c. For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine."

If the predicted time is come, there is a pressing need of doctrinal preaching.

CATECHISM OF THE M. E. CHURCH ON THE LAW OF GOD.

"85. What does God require of man?"

"Obedience to his revealed will. 'Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man.' Eccl. 12:13. 'What doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to fear the Lord thy God, to walk in all his ways, . . . and to serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul?' Dent. 10:12."

"86. What is the rule of our obedience?"

"The moral law. 'If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.' Matt. 19:17."

"87. Where is the moral law given?"

"In the ten commandments. Ex. 20:1-17."

The first three commandments are next given, verbatim, with proof texts.

"91. What is the fourth commandment?"

"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it."

"Ye shall keep my Sabbath, and reverence my sanctuary: I am the Lord.' Lev. 19:30. 'Six days shall work be done: but the seventh day is a Sabbath of rest, a holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein.' Lev. 23:3. 'It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed.' Ex. 31:17. 'God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it.' Gen. 2:3. 'Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest.' Ex. 23:12. 'If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words: then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father.' Isa. 58:13, 14."—No. 2, pp. 38-40.

SIN.

"30. What is sin?"

"Any transgression of the law of God. 1 John 3:4. 'By the law is the knowledge of sin.' Rom. 3:20. 'Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law; for sin is the transgression of the law.' 1 John 3:4. 'He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning.' 1 John 3:8."—No. 2, p. 18.

"103. Are all Christians under obligation to keep the law?"

"Yes; they are 'not without law to God, but under the law to Christ.' 1 Cor. 9:21. 'Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God.' 1 Cor. 7:19. 'Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.' Matt. 5:17, 18."—No. 2, p. 43.

THE WORD OF GOD.

"76. Whence do we derive all correct knowledge of religious truth and duty?"

"From the Holy Bible."

"78. What is the only sufficient rule of a Christian's faith and practice?"

"The word of God, as contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments."—No. 2, p. 35.

In this connection are given the following proof texts in full, to the last two of which I invite the reader's special attention, as they are here used in support of Bible truth alone. Ps. 19:7; 2 Tim. 3:15; James 1:25; Gal. 1:8; Rev. 22:18.

I can find nothing in Nos. 1 and 2 concerning a change of the Sabbath; and number three I have not been able to procure. In the editor's preface, he says: "It is not published as a child's catechism merely, but as the Catechism of the Church, including both young and old."

The manuscript of this work was examined and approved in 1851, by Bishop E. Hedding, N. Bangs, S. Olin, and J. Holdich. In the following year it was approved by a committee composed of Revs. Elias Bowen, Geo. Webber, and John H. Power. By a unanimous vote of the General Conference at the same time, the report of the committee was accepted, and the catechism ordered printed.

I have given the scripture texts in full for the benefit of those who may have to meet publicly Methodist opposers of the Bible Sabbath.

By the answers to questions 76 and 78 a Methodist minister might be held to Bible proof alone for a change of the Sabbath, and if they do otherwise, in the name of the Methodist church they are anathematized and cursed by Gal. 1:8 and Rev. 22:18. And as to the obligation of a Methodist to keep the commandments as given in Ex. 20:1-17, we have but to cite them to questions 86, 87, 91, and 103.

PROPHECY FULFILLED.—SIGNS OF THE END.

On every hand the signs of the end multiply. The prophet Isaiah warns us: "Now go, write it before them in a table, and note it in a book, that it may be for the time to come forever and ever [margin, latter day], that this is a rebellious people, lying children, children that will not hear the law of the Lord." Isa. 30:8, 9. This is everywhere fulfilled by professed Christians coming to our ministers and urging them to stop preaching so much about the law. "Just preach practical sermons," say they, "preach Jesus, and let the law, especially the Sabbath, alone." But now we find it is authoritatively declared. We copy the following item from The Living Issue, of Mar. 27, 1877: "At Walsall, England, it has been decided to exclude the ten commandments from the religious teaching in the board schools, on the ground that difficulties would arise in explaining the fourth and seventh commandments to children. The passage from the New Testament has been substituted, running, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God,' etc."

We are nearing the end. Lord help us to be in earnest in self-sacrificing efforts to spread the light of present truth, that we can consistently pray, "Thy kingdom come." How much we need a mission in England! May the Lord open the way.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

OBEDIENCE TO GOD.

OUR Maker is pleased with prompt, trustful obedience. Just as a child shows respect to his parents and teachers by doing cheerfully and faithfully exactly what they bid him, so we honor God when we truly obey him. "This is the love of God that we keep his commandments." 1 John 5:3.

All transgression of God's law is sin. By it, Satan and his host lost Heaven. By it, Adam and Eve lost Eden. By sin, the first death came into the world. And on account of it, the second death will be suffered by the enemies of God. While disobeying any divine precept knowingly, we are walking in the steps of Satan, in the broad, fashionable road whose terminus will be the lake of fire. "The wages of sin is death;" but since Jesus, the just and holy, the pitying Son of God, has died in our stead, our sins, though red like crimson, may be as white as snow. Isa. 1:18.

Obedience to the faith of Jesus will lead us to break off our transgressions with sorrow and contrition of spirit, to come to Jesus in earnest prayer and self-yielding, to believe the gospel and be baptized; to be dead to sin and to live to righteousness.

When our hearts are purified through faith in the blood of Christ, and the hope of his kingdom, we then delight in the law of God. We will delight to know God's will, for we will be willing to do it. We will seek after his commandments; we will make haste and delay not to keep them. Our love to God in Christ Jesus will lead us to choose his way, and our sincere desire to please him will incline us to walk therein. Hos. 14:9. This narrow, unfashionable way leads to life. Matt. 19:17. Rev. 22:14.

Let us walk in it, dear reader, that with our fellow travelers, all who wholly follow God like Caleb and Joshua, we may ere long be partakers of the heavenly inheritance.

THE LORD SPEAKS.

"How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?" Ex. 16:28.

The above is the language of the Lord addressed to his chosen nation, after he had led them out of that Egyptian bondage under which they were held, and had commenced to feed them with that spiritual bread that came from heaven. The occasion of this language by the Lord to his people, all are familiar with. Having led them out of their state of bondage, and brought them where they could keep his commandments, he is now ready to test them, and this he does on the Sabbath commandment. See Ex. 16:4, 5.

God is leading his people to-day through a wilderness of woe, trials, and troubles. Like the children of Israel, they are traveling to a better land. And now that the salvation of the Lord is near to be revealed; now that the people of God are beginning to look up, knowing that their redemption is near, knowing that the promised return of their absent Saviour is close at hand, and viewing as they do, by an eye of faith, the promised rich inheritance, is it at all strange that God is again applying his test, and proving his people, before they are permitted to enter upon the promised inheritance? His test is the same,—his holy Sabbath. He again speaks, and his language is the same: "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?"

The fourth commandment, the one that enjoins God's Sabbath, the one that bears the seal of God, the commandment that says the seventh day is the Sabbath (or rest) of the Lord God, is the only one that the professed people of God are particularly rebelling against, and for which they are offering a substitute. And now that they are from under the iron heel of that presuming and exacting power which most certainly invented this substitute (the papacy) and in a land where they can worship God without fear or molestation, God is surely testing them as he did his people of old. The testing time has come, though many of God's people, who are dull of hearing, and hard to understand, have not yet realized it. But is it not time they were awaking, and opening their eyes to the light that is in this day being shed upon God's revealed will?

May the veil of darkness be torn away, and may the light of truth shine in. We are living in an especially testing time. God's Sabbath is his test. How many will stand the test we cannot tell. But we know that not all who came out of Egypt were found worthy to enter Canaan. We know that the narration of the journeying of the children of Israel to the promised land was given for our benefit, upon whom the ends of the world are come. The things that befell them are for our admonition. Will we profit by them?

May the Lord help us to do so. May he help us to keep his commandments; and may we keep them in spirit as well as in letter, a thing which we shall not be able to do until we are brought from under the bondage of sin, until we have become dead to sin and alive to Christ. When this is accomplished, then shall we be enabled to exclaim with the psalmist David, "I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart."

J. M. GALLEMORE.

MY TIMES ARE IN THINE HAND. PS. 31:15.

DAVID had been called of God, and set apart by the prophet Samuel, at an early age, as the anointed king of Israel. Almost at the commencement of his career, he found he had before him a life of difficulty and of peril; and he lost no time in placing his cause in the hands of a merciful and faithful God, who was amply able to defend his cause.

Nothing can exceed the devotion and love David felt and expressed as he penned his Psalms. Some of these are expressive of love and praise and adoration; others are full of sorrow and contrition for his departures from God and his sad wanderings in the ways of the world. Others express his heartfelt petitions for protection in time of danger, from foes who lay in wait at every turn in life, to destroy his character and his prospects or his life.

In all these varieties of trial, he learned to look to God alone for the aid he might need; and he found the help he called for; and he gave to God thanks daily for the answers he received to his prayers. In the exercise of humble faith in all the walks of private and public life, David is without an equal in history; and the constant practice he kept up throughout his life, of confiding his difficulties and burdens to God, and the relief and help he obtained, served daily to increase his confidence in God. This humble faith grew more and more strong as he advanced in years; and the words we have taken as a text present to us at once the unshaken confidence David felt in his heavenly Father, as to his life, which was so often placed in peril.

My life, my all, my years, are in thine hand. As David made this exclamation his mind rested in calm, settled faith upon God. It was his custom, as he retired to his lonely couch at night, whether in youth, as a humble shepherd, or as he, in after-life, reposed in caves and dens of the mountains when hunted by his foes, or upon the battle field, or when among conspirators, to commit his life to the keeping of God.

It is truly refreshing to witness the complete triumph of faith in such circumstances as this; and to appreciate it in any degree, one should be very familiar with the history of David's life. This one feature that we present at this time will illustrate others. My times are in thine hand. Thou art to decide in this thing. Man may plan to destroy David. Absalom, Saul, Goliath, may decree that David is to fall. The kings of the earth may arise to fulfill the decree; but if God decree that David is to live on, then enemies decree in vain.

Could we all, in all the varied walks in life, say as David said, "My times are in thine hand," how happy for us! This calm, confiding faith supports the soul in every trial.

TWO GREAT STORMS.

[PERHAPS some of the readers of the REVIEW will be interested in the following from the Cornhill Magazine. It seems more remarkable, as the first of the great storms occurred in 1780, the same year with the Dark Day. These remarkable signs of the end of time were only five years, or about that time, from the date of the great earthquake in Lisbon. W. P.]

The most terrible storm which has, perhaps, ever occurred is that which has been called the Great Storm. It occurred, or rather its worst effects were experienced, on October 10, 1780. Generated probably in mid-Atlantic, not far from the equator, it was first felt in Barbadoes, where trees and houses were blown down. Capt. Maury, in his "Physical Geography of the Sea," gives a rather exaggerated account of the effects produced by this storm in Barbadoes, apparently from memory, some of the details being like, but not quite the same, as those actually recorded.

He says, "The bark was blown from the trees, and the fruits of the earth destroyed; the very bottom and depths of the sea were uprooted—forts and castles were washed away, and their great guns carried in the air like chaff." The bark of trees was removed, but it is believed, rather through the effects of electric action than by the power of the wind. Cannon, also, were driven along the batteries, and flung over into the fosse, but not "carried in the air like chaff." At Martinique the storm overtook a French transport fleet, and entirely destroyed it. There were forty vessels, conveying 4,000 soldiers, and the Governor of Martinique reported their fate to the French Government in three words: "The vessels disappeared." Nine thousand persons perished at Martinique and 1,000 at St. Pierre, where not a house was left standing. St. Domingo, St. Vincent, St. Eustache, and Porto Rico were next visited and devastated, while scarcely a single vessel near this part of the cyclone's track was afloat on Oct. 11. At Port Royal, the cathedral, seven churches, and 1,400 houses were blown down, and 1,600 sick and wounded persons were buried beneath the ruins of the hospital. At the Bermudas fifty British ships were driven ashore, two line-of-battle ships went down at sea, and 22,000 persons perished.

Perhaps the most remarkable effects of the storm in this portion of its course were those experienced in the Leeward Isles. The hurricane drove a twelve-pounder cannon a distance of 400 feet. Those who lived in the Government Building took refuge in the central part, where circular walls, nearly a yard thick, seemed to afford promise of safety. But at 11:30 o'clock the wind had broken down parts of these walls, and lifted off the roof. Terrified, they sought refuge in the cellarage, but before long the water had risen there to the height of more than a yard, and they were driven into the battery, where they placed themselves behind the heavier cannons, some of which were driven from their place by the force of the wind. When day broke, the country looked as if it had been blasted by fire; not a leaf, scarce even a branch, remained upon the trees. As in great floods a common terror preserves peace among animals which usually war upon each other, so during the great storm human passions were for the time quelled by the fiercer war of the elements.

Among the ships destroyed at Martinique were two English war-ships. Twenty-five sailors who survived, surrendered themselves prisoners to the Marquis of Bouille, the Governor of the island. But he sent them to St. Lucie, writing to the English governor of that island that "he was unwilling to retain as prisoners men who had fallen into his hands during a disaster from which so many had suffered."

The great storm of 1780 must not be confounded with the storm remembered for many years in Great Britain as the "Great Storm." The latter occurred November 26, 1703, and its worst effects were experienced not as usual in the tropics, but in Western Europe. The reader will remember Macaulay's reference to it in his essay on the "Life and Writings of Addison." In his famous poem, "The Campaign," Addison has compared Marlborough to an angel guiding the whirlwind. "We must point out," writes Macaulay, "one circumstance which appears to have escaped all the critics. The extraordinary effect which this simile produced when it first appeared, and which to the following generation appeared inexplicable, is doubtless to be chiefly attributed to a line which most readers now regard as a feeble parenthesis:

"Such as, of late, o'er pale Britannia passed."

"Addison spoke, not of a storm, but of The Storm. The great tempest of November, 1703, the only tempest which in our latitude has equaled the rage of a tropical hurricane, had left a dreadful recollection in the minds of all men. No other tempest was ever in this country the occasion of a parliamentary address or of a public fast. Whole fleets had been cast away. Large mansions had been blown down. One prelate had been buried beneath the ruins of his palace. London and Bristol had presented the appearance of cities just sacked. Hundreds of families were still in mourning. The prostrate trunks of large trees, and the ruins of houses, still attested, in all the Southern counties, the fury of the blast." He strangely omits to mention one of the most striking events connected with the terrible storm,—the destruction of the Eddystone Lighthouse. Winstanley, the architect of the first Eddystone Lighthouse, was confident that it could resist the fiercest storm which ever blew, and expressed a hope that he might be in it when such a storm raged. On November 26 he arrived with a party of men who were engaged to repair the building. The great storm soon after began to blow, and raged throughout the night. On the morning of the 27th no trace of the lighthouse was to be seen.

OUR OCCUPATION.

SOME people seem to think that Christians should take no interest in worldly matters. This I think is a mistake. Christ says "occupy till I come," and certainly as long as we are in the world we must use the things of the world. Occupation prevents sin. "An idle brain is Satan's workshop," therefore, it is for our spiritual good to keep employed. I do not mean by this that the Christian should become so engrossed in his business as to neglect his hours of prayer or meditation, or so fill his mind with worldly thoughts as to leave "no room for Jesus there." The mind can, in a measure, be upon heavenly things while the hands are employed with temporal affairs. The farmer can see the goodness of God as manifested in the return of seed-time and harvest, and recognize the beneficence of the all-wise Being as displayed in the beauties of nature, and the comforts which are derived from the fruit of the ground.

The carpenter can remember that the Saviour of the world learned and practiced that trade. The teacher can think of Him who "taught as never man taught," and we all can see some connection between our business and the work of Jehovah in creating the world to be inhabited. If we are consecrated to God, then our occupation will be the means of helping us on in the divine life. It may not be asked in the Judgment what occupation we followed when on earth; but it may be asked what effect our work had upon our hearts and lives and what influence upon the hearts and lives of others.

Let us, then, not become tired of our work and sick of the world, but let us perform well what our hands find to do, improve the time, live above the world while we mingle with it, set such an example and speak such words as shall show to others that we indeed "have been with Jesus." "If we are faithful," in this world, "in that which is least" we shall, by and by, have the true riches intrusted to our care, and when the Master returns, receive a reward rich and full, even an inheritance glorious and eternal.

ELIZA H. MORTON.

THE CHILDREN AT BED-TIME.

EVERY parent who has been in the habit of reading or talking with the little ones after they are safely tucked in bed, will bear witness to the value of this mode of influence. With the laying off of the clothes, the angers, worries, and discontents of the day subside. With the brief season of prayer they fly still further into the background. And when the little form rests in its bed, they seem to vanish out of sight. The body is at rest. The heart is plastic to the touch of the loving father or mother.

Now is the time to exert a molding power. At this hour the little ones listen with hushed attention to what is read to them. Hymns, the Scriptures, Bible stories, are heard with close attention, until the reader's voice is stilled, or the hearers sink into a gentle sleep. Or conversation may take the place of reading. The will that was in a state of resistance an hour ago is now relaxed. The anger that blinded moral discernment has passed away. With open heart, the child utters its confessions, and gladly receives the forgiving kiss.

Plans for the morrow can be discussed, and duty can be made to put on an attractive form. Irritations can be looked at quietly, and admonitions to watchfulness may be dropped with soothing efficacy into the listening ear. And then how delightful the embrace with which the young arms clasp your neck, the intense "dear father," "dear mother," with which the "good-night" is said. Parents, if you have not thus parted from your birdlings at the evening hour, you have something yet to learn of hopeful instruction—to experience of love's delights.—The Working Church.

THE INSTINCT OF WILD GEESSE.

THE St. Louis Republican says: "Dr. Lankford, who returned a day or two since from the southeastern part of the State, mentions the following curious fact in natural history. He gives the statement on the authority of W. R. Smith, a leading farmer and miller living near Morley, Scott County, Mo. About a year ago Mr. Smith captured two young wild geese, and raised them with the balance of his domestic goslings. The wild ones became quite tame, and took kindly to the changes of civilized life. They adapted their habits to the ordinary delights of the barnyard, and swam in the pond with the tame geese, without showing a disposition to go on a wild goose chase. At length, about the 4th of November, the weather began to change, and after being domesticated some eight months the wild fellows, prompted by an instinct to seek a more sunny clime on the approach of winter, spread their wings to the breeze, and started on a migratory tour, flying southward. Their departure was natural and to be expected. After an absence of two months, early in January, great was Mr. Smith's surprise to find, on getting up one morning, that the two wild geese had returned to their old haunts on his farm. They not only returned, but eleven more wild geese came with them as visitors, which they piloted safely from some southern bayou. The new-comers made themselves at home and were fed and fondled by the children. They come up to the mill at feeding time to get their rations, and gabble all together, and put on all the airs of civilized geese who have had a good moral training."

"WINTER IS PAST."

WINTER is past—the little bee resumes
Her share of sun and shade, and o'er the lea
Hums her first hymn to the flowers' perfumes,
And wakes a sense of gratefulness in me:
The little daisy keeps its wonted place;
Ere March by April gets disarmed of snow,
A look of joy opens on its smiling face,
Turned to that Power that suffers it to blow.
Ah, pleasant time! yet, pleasing as you be,
One still more pleasing, Hope reserves for me,
Where suns unsetting one long summer shine, Flowers endless bloom, where winter ne'er de-troys.

Oh! may the good man's righteous end be mine,
That I may witness these unfading joys.
—Bryant.

KINDNESS.

KINDNESS is a quality of human nature which renders lovely the individual in whom it is a predominant feature of character. It is one of the chief principles of the character and religion of Jesus Christ, who, while he sojourned among men, was constantly performing acts of kindness as he had opportunity. It is this feature which makes the character and person of the Saviour so lovable and attractive to the human mind, when first it comprehends the divine nature and religion of the Saviour. Would we win the heart and conquer the opposition of the opposer of the religion of Jesus, we must begin by kind words and kind acts. There is no nature existing in the breasts of humanity so rough but can be approached and touched in this way. How often have words spoken in cheerfulness and a kindly spirit been the means of rescuing from a life of crime and an ignominious death some fellow creature rendered desperate by a train of adverse circumstances in life.

"Be kindly affectioned one toward another," is the injunction of the apostle to his brethren, proving the principle of kindness to be a requisite of Christian character. The true and humble follower of Jesus will manifest this principle, not only to the good and the gentle, but also to the froward and perverse. It is upon the latter class that he needs to bring to bear all the active and persuasive force of this heavenly principle. Words spoken in kindness often subdue the angry passions roused within the human breast, when harsh words would but serve as fuel to the flame. "A soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger."

Mark the effects of kindness upon the little child. Its appearance has attracted your notice, and you wish to attract its attention to yourself. It is at first very timid and retiring. You smile as you speak in low gentle tones to the little one; and presently, little by little, unconsciously its reserve is thrown off, and its timidity is lost, and ere long it approaches you in the full confidence of a new-found friend. Thus by kindness you have made an impression on the heart of that child, which perhaps may never be obliterated, and by which you may have enchained yourself in its memory, where in after life, this incident may linger as one of the bright and sunny spots of childhood's days.

Again, witness the effects of kind acts and words upon the brute creation, as may frequently be witnessed in the treatment of our domestic animals. Take for instance the unbroken colt. You approach him in a careful manner, speaking in gentle tones, endeavoring to attract its attention; but at first it shuns you in fear. You still persevere in your efforts until at last you have gained its confidence, and it suffers itself to be approached and led away, recognizing you as a friend instead of an enemy. On the other hand, mark the effects of the treatment of a horse at the hands of the person of hasty temper. Very often from the first, the experience of the horse is one of ill treatment. He is often beaten and whipped, to make him do that which he has never been accustomed to do, and of which he knows nothing. As the effect of such a course of treatment, the horse will be sullen and stubborn, or else so fearful that he can scarcely be approached in safety.

To draw further illustrations is needless;

for we are all witnesses to the fact that the effects of kindness, whether exercised toward our fellow creatures or toward the brute creation, are powerful. But we would earnestly recommend to all who profess to be the followers of Christ to cultivate this principle so highly essential to the Christian character. And not to the professor of religion alone, would we recommend the cultivation of this humane and Christian grace, but unto all who may chance to peruse the thoughts here set forth, though perhaps but poorly presented. If happily they shall be the means of arresting the attention of some poor fallible fellow creature and directing his mind in a channel of exercise wherein he may develop the strong and healthy powers of a manly and Christian character, one object of the writer will be accomplished.

A DANGEROUS POSSIBILITY.

IT is a well-known law of the human constitution, that while practical habits grow stronger by repeated acts, passive impressions, by the same process, are weakened. Thus the sight of suffering is at first exceedingly painful, and this sympathetic pain prompts us to exert ourselves in order to relieve the sufferer. Now we find, in proportion as the habits of acting in obedience to our impressions become fixed, the impressions themselves become fainter and fainter. Hence physicians and nurses will do a great deal more for the sick than surrounding friends, although they may not feel for them half so much.

Now, to allow these impressions to be repeated, and thus gradually weakened, without acquiring the practical habits which they were meant to produce, is fatal to the character. It is, as another has well expressed it, "to burn up the kindling without starting the fire." This explains the injurious effects of theatre-going and novel-reading, where passive impressions are repeatedly awakened by imaginary scenes of distress, but no opportunity is afforded to act as these impressions would dictate. In this we have a satisfactory explanation of the phenomenon so puzzling to philanthropists, viz., that delicate and refined men and women will fare sumptuously every day, eating whatever is good, and recline nightly upon couches of down, while entirely undisturbed by the knowledge of the fact that many pale forms, weary and hungry, are fainting almost at their very doors. They have lost the susceptibility of receiving impressions from the sight of suffering, without having acquired the habit of practical benevolence.

The same law prevails with reference to religious impressions. The oftener these are repeated, the oftener the sinner feels moved to act in view either of the love or justice of God, and allows these impressions to pass away without acting in accordance with them, the less and less is the probability that he will ever do so. On each repetition the impression becomes fainter, and the indisposition to act stronger. The glorious gospel of Jesus Christ thus becomes to thousands, in whose hearing it is proclaimed, a savor of death unto death. It is possible to wear out these impressions, so that there shall be nothing left for God's Spirit to act upon, and when this is once effected, of course the case of the impenitent soul becomes hopeless. Sinner, rouse from this sleep. You have often felt these impressions, and as often refused to act in obedience to them. You know from experience that they are daily growing weaker—take heed lest they disappear and leave you confirmed in your sins.—Pres. Journal.

A BLUE LAW.—The people of Texas are popularly supposed to be a rough, irreligious people. But the Legislature of that State, at its last session, passed a law which would be denounced as "blue" had it been enacted in one of the New England States. It provides for punishing profanity by a fine of one hundred dollars, if the obnoxious language is used within a certain distance of a dwelling-house. The idea of the law is, doubtless, to protect the young from being demoralized by evil communications.—Religious Intelligencer.

AN honest blacksmith, when urged to start a libel suit, answered, "I can hammer out a better reputation on my anvil than all the lawyers in Christendom can give me." The blacksmith was right, and more is the pity that a good many more Christians don't think with him.

THE WAYS OF LIFE.

Thy ways of life, mysterious,
Work slowly toward some finite ends.
Jehovah, 'neath a seeming cloud,
His creatures to his purpose bends;
When suddenly the end appears,
And breaks the spell of waiting years.

O weary pilgrim! where the path Seems fraught with endless perils great;
Thy fainting heart may almost sink
O'erawed by thy apparent fate;
Take courage now, for soon or late,
Thy steps will reach the Golden Gate.

O warrior, weary with the strife!
Be not oppressed when numbers fright;
Thy stalwart foes may legion seem,
But don the armor, fight the fight;
And in the end, so strong is right,
Thy foes shall yield them to thy might.

O seaman! when the tempests rouse
And haste thy craft to dangers dark,
When mighty billows in the night,
Lash with their foam thy struggling bark,
Be of stout heart, thy trusty hand
Will bring thy cargo safe to land.

O pilgrim! to each weary path
There is an ending in good time;
O warrior! in each contest fierce
There is a victory sublime;
O seaman! when the voyage is o'er,
There is a haven near the shore.

Only be firm; have faith in God
When darkness swallows up the light;
Oft is the sun obscured by clouds—
To every day there is a night;
But unto those who work and pray,
There comes an Everlasting Day.

OUT OF EMPLOYMENT.

appears from the following paragraph which we clip from an article in The Liberal, of June 21, 1877, that we live upon our second century with as many persons reduced to idleness with all prospective want and crime, as constitute the entire population of the country when our independence was declared. The fact is told in the paragraph itself:—

In this first year of our second century national existence there are said to be millions of unemployed persons in the United States.

Who can tell us why or how this appalling situation arose? Who can set forth colors sufficiently vivid the degradation demoralization it is bringing upon the workers and upon our country? We are living with wide-spread effects; let us look into their causes. Are these the desired fruits of our boasted 'civilization'?
Is this crisis an ordeal through which our nation must pass? Now, if ever, is time for our legislatures, our political economists, and our social-science reformers to exert themselves for the benefit of a krumpt people."

MISGIVINGS IN MICHIGAN.

In the reports of the county superintendent of the poor of the State of Michigan, 1876, we find the following expression of anxiety with reference to the future. It is from the superintendent of Ingham County:—

"With the repeal of all prohibitory laws; with open and unrestrained sale and use of intoxicants; with paupers and criminals increasing at the rate of 4½ per cent to 1 per cent of population; with a decrease of 33½ per cent in the average ability of the property owners to pay taxes, what will be the condition of our county and State ten years hence? See State Prison report, reports of superintendents of the poor, and sheriffs' reports for 1875.

BLOOD! BLOOD!

"VIOLENCE covers the earth," and the cry comes up: When will the carnival of crime cease?

The Morning Mail, of yesterday, records the dark deeds committed within the limits of this city and county during the last two days under the headings:
"Oceans of Blood,"—a desperado kills one man and wounds two more, tries to escape, but is pursued, fatally wounded, and captured, "Score another one, the murder market active, and business on the increase," a man is shot in cold blood.
"Accidental death"—a man dies from an accidental discharge of a gun in the hands of another man. "Pugilistic"—a white man makes sausage meat of a negro's face. "Highwayman"—two men attempt to rob a youth on the streets. But his screams, after being struck on the head with a revolver, cause the citizens to render him help, and the ruffians escape.

In addition to the above, the following headings appear in the same paper recording crime committed abroad: "Another Desperado 'Dies Game' with his Boots on," "Thieves Strung up by Judge Lynch," "Crime Come to Light," "The Usual Row in Henston," "A Nevada Duel with Bowie Knife and Derringer."

The editor, in the same paper, speaks as follows:—

"Our local columns this morning present a ghastly array of butcheries. Two men murdered, one a few miles distant from the city, another accidentally killed at a neighboring village, while a half dozen unsuccessful attempts are chronicled. We may well pause at this startling array of crime, and ask, When is it to cease? Laws are enacted to punish criminals, but remain dead letters upon our statute books; courts are organized and officers selected to punish law-breakers, yet men guilty of almost every crime in the decalogue are permitted to roam at large and carry on their lawless deeds. Whither are we drifting? When is this reign of crime to cease? The authorities must act. The people, weary of supporting an inefficient government that taxes and yet does not protect them, will be driven to the desperation that seized upon the citizens of California, when they rose in their might, and, acting under a 'higher law,' rid their State of the desperadoes and law-breakers who had made their presence a terror to law-abiding people."

This is a sad comment on the times in which we live. Truly we are living amid the perils of the last days, or is this the beginning of the millennium?

A NEW PROJECTILE.

MR. W. H. LEWIS, a Welsh gentleman, of Hafod, near Swansea, has invented a new engine of warfare, which will be likely to attract considerable attention. It consists of a cannon, so arranged as to discharge a sharp sword-blade crosswise in the direction of the enemy, the knife or cutter being so poised in its career through the air as to cover the whole space in a longitudinal direction described by the blade itself. An eight-inch ball would carry a sword fourteen feet in length six hundred yards, literally mowing down every human obstacle in its path.—Scientific American.

THE PLAGUE AT BAGDAD.

It is just possible that the Turkish and Russian armies may both have to reckon with a foe for whom they are not prepared, and against whom no amount of bastions or earthworks, no iron-plated ships or turret vessels, can be of avail. The plague is said to be raging in Bagdad with a fury which can no longer be concealed, and to be extending with slow but steady progress along the line of the Tigris. The Constitu-tionnel affirms that nearly as many as fifty deaths occur every day in the city, although the total population does not now amount to more than 100,000 souls. The same paper points out that it is more than forty years since this scourge last visited the East. In 1835 Egypt and Turkey were devastated by it, and before that there was an outbreak in Western Europe in 1815, while the disease which had made its appearance in Egypt in 1798 continued its ravages for several years into the present century.

If the malady which is now carrying off so many victims in the old Mohammedan capital is really the same plague known to historians and medical men, it would seem that there can be little hope of "localizing" it by any human precautions, even if the Turkish Government had wisdom and leisure enough to devise and put in force such precautions. Modern times appear in some respects to be even more favorable for the spread of the evil than the days gone by.
The increased rapidity and frequency of communications between one part of the world and another obviously favor the propagation of infection, even in regions so backward as the Asiatic Turkish provinces.

But a still more powerful agent in spreading the malady is to be found in the pilgrimages which are becoming more numerous and better attended every year. A devotee may now carry with him for scores of miles the seeds of the mortal disease before his retreat is cut off by the growing strength of the hidden malady. Should the infection once reach either of the armies, the scene would be frightful beyond description.
No place can possibly be better calculated to attract and retain the plague than a large camp; and now that vast armies are encamped in districts not far removed from Bagdad there are evidently perils still more terrible than war to be faced by the soldiers on each side.—Ex.

THE WONDERFUL DARK DAY, MAY 19, 1780.

From a work entitled, "Our First Century," pp. 88-96, we take the following graphic account of the great dark day of May 19, 1780. The testimony is important as showing the extent of the phenomenon, and as describing also a large number of mysterious features not hitherto noticed.
As this is one of those signs which our Lord himself set forth to indicate the near approach of his second coming, all testimony concerning it possesses, for the student of prophecy, the greatest value and interest.

"The Dark Day in northern America was one of those wonderful phenomena of nature which will always be read of with interest, but which philosophy is at a loss to explain."—Herschell.

Almost, if not altogether alone, as the most mysterious and as yet unexplained phenomenon of its kind, in nature's diversified range of events, during the last century, stands the Dark Day of May Nineteenth, 1780,—a most unaccountable darkening of the whole visible heavens and atmosphere in New England,—which brought intense alarm and distress to multitudes of minds, as well as dismay to the brute creation, the fowls fleeing, bewildered, to their roosts, and the birds to their nests,

and the cattle returning to their stalls.
Indeed, thousands of the good people of that day became fully convinced that the end of all things terrestrial had come;
many gave up, for the time, their secular pursuits, and betook themselves to religious devotions; while many others regarded the darkness as not only a token of God's indignation against the various iniquities and abominations of the age, but also as an omen of some future destruction that might overwhelm the land—as in the case of the countries mentioned in biblical history,—unless speedy repentance and reformation took place. The ignorant indulged in vague and wild conjectures as to the cause of the phenomenon; and those pro-founder minds, even, that could "gauge the heavens and tell the stars," were about equally at loss for any rational explanation of the event. It is related that the Connecticut legislature was in session at this time, and that, so great was the darkness, the members became terrified, and thought that the Day of Judgment had come; a motion was consequently made to adjourn.
At this, Mr. Davenport arose and said:
"Mr. Speaker,—It is either the Day of Judgment, or it is not. If it is not, there is no need of adjourning. If it is, I desire to be found doing my duty. I move that candles be brought, and that we proceed to business."

The time of the commencement of this extraordinary darkness was between the hours of ten and eleven in the forenoon of Friday, of the date already named; and it continued until the middle of the following night, but with different appearances at different places. As to the manner of its approach, it seemed to appear first of all in the south-west. The wind came from that quarter, and the darkness appeared to come on with the clouds that came in that direction. The degree to which the darkness arose varied in different localities. In most parts, it became so dense, that people were unable to read common print distinctly, or accurately determine the time of day by their clocks or watches, or dine, or manage their domestic affairs conveniently, without the light of candles. In some places, the degree of darkness was just about equal to preventing persons seeing to read ordinary print in the open air, for several hours together.
The extent of this darkness was also very remarkable. It was observed at the most easterly regions of New England; westward, to the furthest parts of Connecticut, and at Albany; to the southward, it was observed all along the sea coasts; and to the north, as far as the American settlements extended. It probably far exceeded these boundaries, but the exact limits were never positively known. With regard to its duration, it continued in the neighborhood of Boston for at least fourteen or fifteen hours; but it was doubtless longer or shorter in some other places. The appearance and effects were such as tended to make the prospect extremely dull, gloomy, and unnatural. Candles were lighted up in the houses; the birds, in the midst of their blithesome forenoon enjoyments, stopped suddenly, and, singing their evening songs, disappeared, and became silent; the fowls retired to their roosts; the cocks were crowing in their accustomed manner at the break of day; objects could not be distinguished at a comparatively slight distance; and everything bore the aspect and gloom of night,—to say nothing of the effects upon the minds of the people, which, indeed, was quite indescribable.

The above general facts concerning this strange phenomenon were ascertained, after much painstaking inquiry, soon after its occurrence, by Prof. Williams, of Harvard College, who also collected together some of the more particular observations made in different parts of the country, relative to the remarkable event. From these data it appears that, with regard to the state of the atmosphere preceding this uncommon darkness, it was noticed in many sections, for several days before, that the air seemed to be of a smoky and vaporous character. The sun and the moon exhibited an unusual redness in their color, and divested of their usual brightness and lucid aspect; and this obscuration increased as they approached nearer to the horizon. This was ascertained to have been the case in almost all parts of the New England States, for four or five days preceding the nineteenth of May. The winds had been variable, but chiefly from the south-west and north-east. The thermometer indicated from forty to fifty-five degrees. The barometer showed a somewhat higher range than usual. The weather had been fair and cool for the season.

As to the state of the atmosphere when the darkness came on, it was observable that the weight or gravity of it was gradually decreasing, the greater part of the day. According to the observations made at Cambridge, Mass., the mercury in the barometer was found, at twelve o'clock, to stand at twenty-nine inches, seventy; in half an hour after, the mercury had fallen the one-hundredth part of an inch; at one o'clock, it was twenty-nine inches, sixty-seven; at three o'clock it was at twenty-nine inches, sixty-five; at eight minutes past eight, it was at twenty-nine inches, sixty-four. A similar course of barometrical observations made, at the same time, in another part of the State, showed as follows: at six o'clock in the morning, the mercury in the barometer was found to be at twenty-nine inches, eighty-two; as soon as the darkness began to appear uncommon, that is, at ten minutes past ten, the mercury was found at twenty-nine inches, sixty-eight; at a quarter before eleven—the time of the greatest degree of darkness in that part of the country—the mercury was at twenty-nine inches, sixty-seven, the darkness continuing in the same degree for an hour and a half; at fifteen minutes past twelve, the mercury had fallen to twenty-nine inches, sixty-five, and, in a few minutes after this, the darkness began to abate; the mercury remained in this state during the whole evening, without any sensible alteration. At half-past eight, it seemed to have fallen a little, but so small was the alteration, that it was attended with some uncertainty, nor did it appear to stand any lower three hours later.

From these observations, it is certain that on the day when the darkness took place, the weight or gravity of the atmosphere was gradually decreasing through the whole day. Both of the barometers in use were instruments of superior workmanship, and consequently to be depended on as to the accuracy of their indications.

The color of objects that day, is another point of interest. It is mentioned, in the record of observations made with reference to this feature of the phenomenon, that the complexion of the clouds was compounded of a faint red, yellow and brown,—that, during the darkness, objects which commonly appear green, were of the deepest green, verging to blue,—and that those which appear white, were highly tinged with yellow. This was the character of the observations, as given by almost every one who made any record of the day's appearance. But Prof. Williams states that, to him, almost every object appeared tinged with yellow, rather than with any other color; and this, whether the thing was near, or remote from the eye.

Another element of peculiarity, in this remarkable scene, was the nature and appearance of the vapors that were then in the atmosphere. Early in the morning, the weather was cloudy; the sun was but just visible through the clouds, and appeared of a deep red, as it had for several days before. In most places thunder was heard a number of times in the morning. The clouds soon began to rise from the south-west, with a gentle breeze, and there were several small showers before eight o'clock; in some places there were showers at other hours throughout the day. The water that fell was found to have an unusual character, being thick, dark, and sooty. One observer in the eastern part of Massachusetts states, in this connection, that the strange appearance and smell of the rain-water which people had saved in tubs, was the subject of universal and wondering remark. On examining the water, there was found a light scum upon it, which, on being rubbed between the thumb and finger, seemed to resemble the black ashes of burnt leaves; the water also gave the same strong, sooty smell, which characterized the air. A similar appearance, in this respect, manifested itself in other localities; it was especially exhibited on the Merrimac River, large quantities of black scum being seen floating upon the surface of that stream, during the day. In the night the wind veered round to the north-east, and drove this substance towards the south shore; when the tide fell, the matter lay for many miles along the shore, the width of the deposit being some four or five inches. An examination of a considerable quantity of this substance, in several places, failed to show anything of a sulphurous nature either in its taste, color, or smell. Prof. Williams states that, being apprehensive as to whether there was not some uncommon ingredient in the air that day, he put out several sheets of clean paper in the air and rain. When they had been out four or five hours, he dried them by the fire. They were much sullied, and became dark in their color, and felt as if they had been rubbed with oil or grease; but upon burning them, there could not be detected any sulphurous or nitrous particles.

The motion and situation of the currents or bodies of vapor in the atmosphere likewise exhibited some striking peculiarities. In most places, it was very evident that the vapors were descending from the higher parts of the atmosphere towards the surface of the earth. A gentleman who made some special observations bearing upon this point, mentions a very curious circumstance, as to their ascent and situation, namely, that at about nine o'clock in the morning, after a shower, the vapors rose from the springs in the low lands, in great abundance. Notice was taken of one large column that ascended, with great rapidity, to a considerable height above the highest hills, and soon spread into a large cloud, then moved off a little to the westward. A second cloud was formed in the same manner, from the same springs, but did not ascend so high as the first; and a third was formed from the same places, in less than a quarter of an hour after the second. About three-quarters of an hour after nine o'clock, these clouds exhibited a very striking appearance. The upper cloud wore a peculiar reddish hue; the second showed in some places or parts a green, in others a blue, and in others an indigo color; while the surface of the third cloud was almost white.

Of a somewhat singular nature, also, is the fact, as related by another, that, while the darkness continued, the clouds were in quick motion, interrupted, skirted one over another, so as to form—at least to the eye of the beholder—a considerable number of strata, the lower stratum being of an uniform height as far as visible; but this height was conceived to be very slight, from the small extent of the horizon that could be seen, and from this circumstance observed in the evening. A lighted torch, held by a person passing along the street, occasioned a reflection of a faint red or copper-tinged light—similar to a faint aurora borealis,—the apparent height at which the reflection was made, being some twenty to thirty feet. And it was generally remarked, that the hills might be seen at a distance in some directions, while the intermediate spaces were greatly obscured or darkened.

It would thus appear, from the statements now cited, as if the vapors, in some places, were ascending; in most, descending; and, in all, very near to the surface of the earth. To this it may be added, that, during the darkness, objects seemingly cast a shade in every direction, and, in many instances, there were various appearances or corruscations in the atmosphere, not unlike the aurora borealis,—though it is not stated that any uncommon exhibitions of the electric fire were witnessed during the day. In some accounts, however, it is mentioned that a number of small birds were found suffocated by the vapor; some were found dead, and some flew, affrighted or stupefied, into the houses.

In New Haven, Conn., there was a shower of rain, with some lightning and thunder, about daybreak in the morning, the rain continuing, with intervals, until after sunrise. The morning was cloudy and darkish; and the sun, rising towards the zenith, gave no increase of light, as usual, but, on the contrary, the darkness continued to increase until between eleven and twelve o'clock, at which time there was the greatest obscurity in that place. What little motion of the air there was just at this period, was nearly from the south; though the atmosphere was as calm as the blandest summer morning. There was something more of a luminous appearance in the horizon, than in the hemisphere in general; also, a most marked liveliness of tint to the grass and other green vegetation; and a very noticeable yellowness in the atmosphere, which made clean silver nearly resemble the color of brass. At about twelve o'clock, noon, the singular obscuration ceased; the greatest darkness, at any particular time, was at least as dense as what is commonly called "candlelighting," in the evening. In the town of Hartford, and the neighboring villages, the phenomenon was observed with all its distinctive peculiarities; and by some persons the disc of the sun was seen at the time of the greatest deficiency of light.

In Middlesex County, Mass., the peals of thunder were loud and frequent at six o'clock in the morning, attended with heavy rain; at seven o'clock, the rain and thunder had ceased, but the sky continued cloudy. Between nine and ten o'clock, the clouds were observed to thicken, and to receive continual accessions from the low lands. Before ten, the darkness had sensibly increased, till it became difficult to read an almanac in a room having two windows; at eleven o'clock, candles were lighted, and at half-past eleven the darkness was so great in the meeting-house, where a court was then sitting, that it was difficult to distinguish countenances at the smallest distance, notwithstanding the large number of windows usual in such buildings. At twelve, the darkness was greatest, and a little rain fell; in the street, the aspect was like that at the beginning of evening, as lights were seen burning in all the houses. The clouds were thinnest at the north; at the north-east, the clouds were very thick, and so low that hills could not be seen at the distance of half a mile; south-westerly, hills might be clearly seen at the distance of twenty miles, though the intermediate space was so shaded that it was impossible to distinguish woodland from pasture. At half-past twelve, the clouds, having been hitherto detached, began to concentrate at such an height that all the hills became visible, and the country around exhibited a most beautiful tinted verdure; at one, the clouds became uniformly spread, and the darkness was not greater than is usual on a cloudy day. The same weather continued through the whole afternoon, except that the sun was seen for a few minutes, in some places, about three o'clock. At eight in the evening, the darkness was so impenetrably thick, as to render traveling positively impracticable; and, although the moon rose nearly full about nine o'clock, yet it did not give light enough to enable a person to distinguish between the heavens and the earth.

In the account of this phenomenon given by Dr. Tenney, of New Hampshire, an intelligent observer and writer, are some interesting details, gathered by him while on a journey to Pennsylvania, from the east. He repeats and confirms the statement made by others, that, previously to the commencement of the darkness, the sky was overcast with the common kind of clouds, from which there was, in some places, a moderate fall of rain. Between these and the earth, there intervened another stratum, apparently of great thickness; as this stratum advanced, the darkness commenced, and increased with its progress till it came to its height, which did not take place till the hemisphere was a second time over-spread—the uncommon thickness of this stratum being probably occasioned by two strong currents of wind from the southward and westward, condensing the vapors and drawing them to the north-east.

The result of Dr. Tenney's journey,—during which he made the best use of his opportunities for information,—was, that the darkness appeared to be most gross in Essex County, Massachusetts, the lower part of the State of New Hampshire, and in portions of what was then the Province of Maine. In Rhode Island and Connecticut it was not so great, and still less in New York; in New Jersey, the second stratum of clouds was observed, but it was not of any great thickness, nor was the darkness very uncommon; in the lower parts of Pennsylvania, no extraordinary scene was noticed.

Through the whole extent of country referred to, the lower cloud-stratum had an uncommon brassy hue, while the earth and trees were adorned with so enchanting a verdure as could not escape notice, even amidst the unusual atmospheric gloom that accompanied it. The darkness of the following evening was probably as deep and dense as ever had been observed since the Almighty fiat gave birth to light; it wanted only palpability to render it as extraordinary as that which overspread the land of Egypt in the days of Moses. If every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable shades, or struck out of existence, it was thought the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper, held within a few inches of the eyes, was equally invisible with the blackest velvet. And, considering the small quantity of light that was transmitted to the clouds, during the day, it is not surprising that, at night, a sufficient quantity of rays should not be able to penetrate the same strata, brought back by the shifting of the winds, to afford the most obscure prospect even of the best reflecting bodies. The denseness of this evening darkness was a fact universally observed and recorded.

In view of all the information contained in the various accounts of this day, it appears very certain that the atmosphere was charged with an unprecedented quantity of vapor,—from what primary cause has never been satisfactorily determined; and as the weather had been clear, the air heavy, and the wind small and variable for many days, the vapors, instead of dispersing, must have been constantly rising and collecting in the air, until the atmosphere became highly charged with them.

But there were not wanting those—and a large number they were too—who played in their minds, to most strange opinions concerning the cause of so marvelous an appearance. It was imagined by some persons that an eclipse of the sun, produced of course by an interposition of the moon, was the cause of the darkness; others attributed it to a transit of Venus or Mercury upon the disc of the sun; others imputed it to a blazing star, while they thought came between the earth and the sun. So whimsical, indeed, were some of the opinions which possessed the minds at this time, that even so bare a vagary as that a great mountain obstructed the rays of the sun's light during that obtained advocates. Whether they thought that a new mountain was created and placed between the earth and the sun, or that a mountain from this globe had taken flight and perched upon that great luminary, did not appear.

That this darkness was not caused by an eclipse, is manifest by the various positions of the planetary bodies at that time, for the moon was more than one hundred and fifty degrees from the sun all that day, according to the accurate calculations made by the most celebrated astronomers; she could not, in the order of nature, be in transit of the planet Venus or Mercury upon the disc of the sun that year; could it be a blazing star—much less a mountain—that darkened the atmosphere for this would still leave unexplained the deep darkness of the following night. Nor would such excessive nocturnal darkness follow an eclipse of the sun; and to the moon, she was at that time more than forty hours' motion past her opposition.

One of the theories, looking to a solution of the mysterious occurrence, which found defenders, was as follows: The heat of the sun causes an ascent of numerous particles which consist of different qualities, such as aqueous, sulphurous, bituminous, saline, etc.; hence the waters of the seas, rivers, and ponds; the fumes of burning vegetables, caused by subterranean veins of liquid fire; all the other kinds of smoke, fat, combustibles, oily matter from various kinds of earth, the juice of trees, plants, and herbs; saline and nitrous particles, from salt, snow-water, and kindred sources—these are exhaled into the regions of the air, where their positions are subject to various mutations or changes by reason of motion and compression of the air, causing them to be sometimes rarefied and sometimes condensed. It was (according to this theory) a vast collection of such particles that caused the day of darkness; it is, the particles, after being exhaled, driven together by certain winds from opposite points of the compass, and condensed to such a degree by the weight of the earth's atmosphere, that they obstructed the appearance of the rays of the sun, day, and those of the moon by night.

Having thus presented the facts and circumstances pertaining to this notable day in the history of the New England Northern States, it may not be amiss to add, that a similar day of mysterious ass occurred on October 21, 1716; the day was so dark that people were forced to light candles to dine by,—a darkness which could not proceed from any eclipse, a solar eclipse having taken place on the fourth of that month. There was also a remarkable darkness at Detroit and vicinity, October 19, 1762, being almost total for the greater part of the day. It was dark at daybreak, and this continued until nine o'clock, when it cleared up a little, and, for a space of about a quarter of an hour, the body of the sun was visible, it appeared as red as blood, and more than three times as large as usual. The air, all this time, was of a dingy yellowish color. At half-past one o'clock it was so dark as to necessitate the lighting of candles, in order to attend to domestic duties. At about five in the afternoon, the darkness became more dense, increasing in intensity until half-past three, when the wind breezed up from the south-west, and brought on a light fall of rain, accompanied with a prodigious quantity of fine black particles, in appearance much like sulphur, both in smell and quality. A sheet of clean paper, held in this rain, was rendered quite black wherever the drops fell upon it; but, when held near the fire, it turned to a yellow color, and, when burned, it fizzed on the fire like wet powder. So black did these verdery particles turn everything upon which they fell, that even the river was covered with a black froth, which, when stirred off the surface, resembled the color of soap, with this difference, that it was more greasy, and its color as black as ink. At seven in the evening, the air was clear. This phenomenon was observed throughout a vast region of country; though various conjectures were indulged in, as to the cause of so extraordinary an occurrence, the same degree of mystery attaches to it as to that of 1780,—founding the wisdom even of the most famed philosophers and men of science. It may easily be imagined, that as the sea and mysterious darkness which covered the land on the memorable nineteenth day filled all hearts with wonder—and attitudes with fear—so, the return, at the end of that brightness and beauty characteristic of the month and of the season, brought gladness again to the faces of the living, and composure to the hearts of the dead; for never before did nature appear dressed in so charming an attire of sun, sky, and verdure.

EARTHQUAKES—SEA AND WAVES ROARING.

Our Rest, of June, 1877, says:—

Presuming that all our readers may not read the particulars of the recent disaster by earthquake and tidal waves on the Pacific coast, we have concluded to publish the following graphic account from the Star and Herald of Panama. It is but a short time since we recorded the destruction of about a quarter of a million of souls by the dreadful tidal wave that swept over a portion of India. Since that time there has been a continuous famine in the same country. Even now, after so long a time, the government is obliged to employ over a million men on its works, to save them from starving, and it is said it costs gratuitously over 300,000 people. The place of decreasing, there was in May an increase of about 85,000 in one week. The prospects for the forthcoming crops are far from flattering, so that it is difficult to tell where the trouble will end. The dreadful famine in China still continues, and hundreds of thousands, we are told, are doomed to perish from starvation. Cholera is also raging in some parts of India, and an increase is feared. Thus we see that we are truly living in troublous times. Wars, famines, earthquakes, sea and waves roaring, and men's hearts are being torn for looking after those things that are coming on the earth."

see Star and Herald says:—

On the ninth of May the towns of Paita, Iquique, Punta de Labos, Pabellon, Ica, Chanavaya, Huanillas, Tocapilla, Vija, Megillones de Bolivia, Antofagasta, Canaralal, were visited by an earthquake and tidal wave, and are nearly all destroyed. About six hundred lives were lost. The destruction of Pabellon is estimated at $20,000,000, confined mostly to the coast, although the town of Tarapaca, thirty-three leagues inland, and the villages of Camatilla and Canchones far in the interior, are more or less ruined. The ships of guano from the southern deposits are indefinitely suspended, as all facilities in the way of launches, chutes, wharves, water condensers and buildings of all kinds, have been swept away. The destruction of, and the damage to, shipping has been very great, and was attended by very serious loss of life.

"At Mallendy the railway was torn up by the sea, three hundred feet, and at Ilo the railway was also injured. At Arica the people were preparing temporary fortifications to repel the threatened assault of the rebel ram Hauscar at the very moment when the roar of the earthquake was heard. The shocks were very numerous, and caused immense damage. The sea was suddenly perceived to recede from the beach, and a wave from ten to fifteen feet high rolled upon the shore, carrying all before it. Eight times was repeated this assault of the ocean, and four miles of the embankment of the railway melted away like sand. Locomotives, cars, and rails were hurled about by the sea like so many playthings and left a tumbled mass of rubbish. The United States steamer Wateree, stranded in 1868, was lifted bodily and floated two miles north of her old position. The cable buoy was moved a quarter of a mile northwards. Merchandise from the custom house and stores were carried five miles distant. The damage done was greater than that of the calamity of 1868. The earthquake had levelled the custom house, railway station, submarine cable office, hotel, British Consulate, the steamship agency, and many private dwellings. The people passed the night on the hills. Thieves began to rob, when the troops fired upon them, killing and wounding several.

"Iquique, built of wood and cane, tumbled down at the first onset. The lamps were broken, and the burning oil, spreading over the debris, started a general conflagration. Three companies of firemen were instantly at their posts, although it was difficult to maintain an upright position, shock following shock, with dreadful regularity. To procure water, the two best fire-engines were stationed on the beach. Just then the cry arose, 'The sea! the sea!' and the waves rushed in. The engines were carried out by the reflux, and the fire continued unopposed. Three elements of destruction were busy at one moment—fire, water, and the earthquake. The affrighted people left the city to its fate, flying to the neighboring eminences. The fire destroyed a large portion of the town, the earthquake leveled nearly all the rest, and water covers the ruins which it took out in its reflux. The water condensers along the shore are ruined. This is an irreparable loss for Iquique, as no potable water is found there. Nearly 400,000 quintals of nitrate at Iquique and the adjacent forts of Molle and Pisagua, were destroyed. A small loss of life took place, probably ten persons in all. Coasting craft and small boats in the harbor were broken to pieces. As in Arica, robbery of goods lying in the streets was attempted, but the guards of citizens took such severe measures that the robbers were speedily checked.

"Away up on the pampas, eleven miles from Iquique, the splendid nitrate establishment, 'La Nueva Carolina,' was completely destroyed.

"The sufferings of the people of Iquique were intense. The absence of water and the destruction of the principal stores added to their hardships. It is estimated that the damage done in Iquique will amount to nearly 4,000,000 soles.

"Chanavaya, at the guano loading deposit known as Pabellon de Pica with four hundred houses, has only two standing. There were no fire-engines in the town, and the sea came in and extinguished the flames, but as it retired it carried off all that remained of the place. In one of the guano cuttings thirty laborers were buried by the falling earth. Among the shipping the havoc was terrible.

"The town of Tarabaca, two or three leagues inland, and the villages of Picamatilla and Canchones are more or less ruined. The loss of life is reported as not being great.

"The earthquake was especially severe at Chanavaya. The earth opened fifteen metres in depth, and the whole surface of the ground changed. At least two hundred people were killed. Bodies were floating in the bay, and a pestilence was feared. At Huanillas, a guano loading station, the damage inflicted was fearful. All the houses were destroyed. The guano cuts have fallen in, and, as at Pabellon, all the loading must be suspended for at least two months. The wave which succeeded the earthquake, and completed the work of destruction, was nearly sixty feet in height. Many vessels were lost here, together with several persons on board. In short, everything except a few huts at the back of the town has been destroyed.

"At Mexillones the tidal wave was sixty-five feet high. Two-thirds of the town is completely obliterated. The guano chutes, wharves, launches, boats, water distilleries, railway stations, locomotives, cars, and furniture—all swallowed up. Six persons were drowned.

"At Teocapilla, little or nothing remains in the town.

"The mine called 'La Pena Blanca,' four miles to the southward, sank in, smothering two hundred workmen, of whom forty were Cornish miners.

"Cobija, the principal town on the Bolivian coast, has lost three-fourths of its houses. The wave thirty-five feet high swept along the main business street, and left it level as a desert. Wharves and launches were all carried out to sea.

"As soon as this lamentable intelligence reached Lima, the government chartered a steamer, and organizing a relief commission, loaded the vessel with provisions, clothing, etc., together with 50,000 gallons of water, and dispatched her on the 16th for the South, one hundred thousand soles in silver coin also forming part of her cargo, to be distributed among the unfortunate. A commission of engineers accompany the expedition. It has been urged by the government to recommend rebuilding the ruined towns on sites which may offer greater security, being more remote from the shore, since this is the second instance of a similar calamity on positions actually occupied. Subscriptions are being made in Lima and Callao for the relief of the distressed.

"The northern parts of Peru were damaged but little, though the sea was running remarkably high.

"The captain of the steamer John Elder reports that when twenty-three miles west of Antofagasta, coming at full speed, his ship was completely stopped by the shock of the earthquake, and she remained almost stationary for five minutes. The passengers believing she had struck on a reef, soundings were taken immediately, but no bottom was found at twenty fathoms."

LATER PARTICULARS.

"Captain Charles MacLoon, of the ship Geneva, sunk at Huanillos, in the great earthquake on the Pacific coast on the 9th ultimo, has arrived, and tells the story of his experiences. He says that, though apparently safely anchored, his ship became entangled with others near it, as they tossed wildly about crashing against one another, and sunk almost immediately in fifteen fathoms of water. On the first alarm, he came up from between decks; it was about half past eight p. m. There had been several shocks during the previous twenty days, but he had completed his cargo of guano, and was expecting to sail next morning.

"Aside from the frightful rumbling sound, his attention was arrested by the extraordinary phenomenon of a shore mountain above being so much agitated that rocks became detached, and rattled down toward the sea, resembling balls of fire. Furthermore, the water at the anchorage suddenly receded, so that ships in eight fathoms touched bottom. At the same time, it was observed that the ships were swinging round and round in opposite directions, the anchor chains becoming entangled beneath the copper, and the yards and masts interlocking, while the air resounded with falling spars and the crash of bulwarks. Water also came whirling in like a maelstrom, causing the Geneva to swing round at a rate of eight or ten knots an hour, in great circles, until she struck against a rock which tore out part of her bottom. The ship was forced violently in an opposite direction and went down. Other vessels were as violently driven ashore or went to the bottom, as in the case of the English ship Avonmore, Captain Canfield, which took down with her the captain's wife, three children, and several others.

"Captain MacLoon says it seemed to him from the sulphurous or electrical appearance of the mountains, that a volcano was bursting out of its sides. Rocks were tumbling about with frightful noise, and everything was lighted up. He thinks the damage to the shipping was caused not so much by the tidal wave as by the upward rush of the water and the rotary currents, driving the ships repeatedly against one another."

To appreciate and use correctly a valuable maxim, requires a vital appropriating exercise of mind closely allied to that which created it.—W. R. Alger.

REMARKS ON ZECHARIAH 14.

VERSE 11. "And men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction; but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited."

And men] That is, the "nations of the saved." See Rev. 21:24. There shall be no more utter destruction] This is proof positive that it applies after the final destruction connected with the second advent, when the cities of the nations fall, and there is a consumption from the Lord upon the whole earth. See Rev. 16:19; Isa. 28:22. Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited] That is, the New Jerusalem, which is above. Heb. 11:16; Gal. 4:26. The prophet Isaiah contemplated the same event: "Thine eyes shall see [New] Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken." Isa. 33:20. Read the context. Perhaps it was the intention of the Holy Spirit that verses 10 and 11 should furnish some hope to the Jews after the Babylonish captivity, but in the fullest sense they apply at the end of the 1000 years.

VERSE 12. "And this shall be the plague where-with the Lord will smite all the people that have fought against Jerusalem: Their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon their feet, and their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongue shall consume away in their mouth."

The eleventh verse having carried us down into the new-earth state, verse 12 opens a new scene, by taking the mind back. And it may here be remarked that many of the prophecies are not consecutive, but the mind is carried backward and forward, according to the nature of the topic being treated. As it were, these sacred predictions are arranged like a sliding scale. But no prophecy ever goes beyond the commencement of the redeemed state. In the twelfth verse we are taken back to events which occur near old Jerusalem, at the beginning of the day of the Lord, during the pouring out of the seven last plagues. But additional particulars are here introduced, which from the nature of the narrative could not be mentioned at the commencement of the chapter.

This shall be the plague] An obvious allusion to the seven last plagues, with their terrible effects. Compare with Rev. 16. The "flesh," "eyes," and "tongue," consuming away, are explained by Rev. 16:8-11. Under the awful effects of the fifth vial, men "gnaw their tongues for pain." Verse 11 says they "blasphemed the God of Heaven because of their pains and their sores." Isa. 8:21, points to the same awful event: "They shall pass through it [the time of trouble] hardly bestead and hungry; and it shall come to pass that when they shall be hungry, they shall fret themselves, and curse their King and their God, and look upward."

VERSE 13. "And it shall come to pass in that day, that a great tumult from the Lord shall be among them; and they shall lay hold every one on the hand of his neighbor, and his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbor."

This verse predicts the utter confusion that will exist among the armies of the earth that assemble at the field of Armageddon. Satan is the "head center" of this host, and the gathering will be accomplished through the agency of spiritualism. Rev. 16:13, 14.

The hosts of earth gather together to fight against the Lamb and his army, Rev. 19:19, but a general tumult is sent among them by the Lord, and they begin to fight one another. See Eze. 38:21, which doubtless refers to the same event. Isaiah says that then the land "shall be soaked with blood," chap. 34:7; and John says, "Blood came out of the wine-press, even unto the horse bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs." Rev. 14:20.

G. W. AMADON.

(Concluded next number.)

"Pa, are you in favor of the Bible in public schools?" asked a West Side youngster at the breakfast table the other morning. "Why, of course I am," responded the father, pleased that such an important subject should engage the attention of his youthful offspring. "What makes you ask such a question, my son?" "Oh! nothing," rejoined young hopeful, "only I thought may-be you was n't, as you never have had one at home."

Wonders in Heaven.

In the prediction quoted by Peter from Joel on the day of Pentecost, setting forth the signs which should indicate the coming of the great and notable day of the Lord, these words are found: "And I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood and fire and vapor of smoke." Acts 2:19. Let the reader peruse the graphic account of the great auroral display of 1837, given in another column, and he will there find vividly portrayed every feature of this remarkable prediction. This is but one of many of a like nature, but this, as all the other more remarkable ones, falls within the present age, marking this as the time when nature is bearing her testimony to the truth of prophecy that earth's last hour is at hand, and leaving men without excuse if they are not prepared for it. It is taken from a large volume of 1007 pages, entitled, "Our First Century," a volume designed to give a brief sketch of the most remarkable events of the past hundred years. It sets this down as one among the number that is worthy to be recorded. It was from this work we gave last week the description of the wonderful Dark Day of 1780, and we have, for next week, from the same volume, testimony equally valuable respecting the great meteoric shower of 1833.

Remarks on Zechariah 14.

This week's Commentary department brings the conclusion of Bro. Amadon's remarks on the 14th of Zechariah, a chapter which has been such a source of study and perplexity to many Bible students. We think there have been more frequent calls for an exposition of that chapter than perhaps of any other portion of Scripture. And now that the reader has what may be considered a fair and consistent application of that prophecy, he would do well to preserve the three numbers of this volume which contain it. We should have been glad to give it all in one number for more convenient preservation; but it was too lengthy for that; and we trust the reader has lost none of his interest in it by having it served up for three weeks in succession.

U. S.

A Waif.

A CORRESPONDENT writes asking this question: "Will we know each other in Heaven?" and signs his name with this remark attached: "Per order of wife."

We are a little at a loss to understand just what condition of things this indicates. If these parties want to know each other in Heaven, and both get there, we apprehend there will be no difficulty whatever. But if they do not want to know each other there, it is very clear they will never both get there, and hence there will be no danger.

U. S.

Wrangling or Worship? Which?

A MAN (we suppose from the reading it is a man) who signs himself, "Inquirer," proposes the following question: "A man and wife keep the Sabbath, but live miles from any other Sabbath-keepers. They do not belong to any church, but the wife would like to join the Adventists, the man being opposed. Is it her duty to desert a family of little ones who need her care to go and join the church?"

To all of which we answer that it would be better to forego church privileges entirely than to have a family quarrel.

U. S.

War's Woes.

A LITTLE tract, published recently by the London Peace Society, gives some startling statistics, showing the results of wars waged during the last 25 years, or from the beginning of the Crimean war in 1853, to the present year, 1877.

The number of regularly trained soldiers in Europe at the present time, is about six millions; or, if we take into account those who, upon any special emergency, would be called out, the number is increased to ten millions. If only one-half of the present armies of Europe were disbanded, three millions of men, in the prime of life, would be restored to productive labor, and $500,000,000 of money saved from oppressive taxation.

The number of men slain as the direct result of the wars of the past 25 years, reaches the appalling figure of 1,948,000; and the cost has been eighteen billions, five hundred and ninety-three millions, one hundred and sixty-three thousand, nine hundred and ninety-five dollars ($18,543,163,995.00). This would give, if divided among the inhabitants of the globe, over $14 to every man, woman, and child. It would build two railways around the world at the rate of $250,000 per mile, or it would provide a freehold farm of 100 acres in this country for each of the 10,000,000 adult males in Europe. Yet all this is worse than squandered in purposes of slaughter and destruction.

How heart-sickening is such an exhibition of selfishness and passion on the part of those who call themselves reasonable beings.

U. S.

and Justified.

THE editor of the Christian Intelligencer publishes an extract from a letter written to him by a missionary who has been forty years in the Levant, in which this passage occurs: "In regard to the imprecatory psalms, I have not the slightest difficulty—never—I came to the East. Any one who has, will be cured by a six weeks' residence in Hasbeijah or Mey Ayun, or any other interior part of the country to-day. Here on the coast where things are a little better, we exclaim, O Lord, how long shall the wicked triumph? But let any man who objects to the imprecatory psalms be made to live here without protection from his own government for six weeks, and he will find the language of the most violent psalm quite too weak for him. He will want to put in a double portion of fire and brimstone, and conclude if there is not a hell there ought to be one, and a deep one too. On this point we are in danger of quarreling with the providence of God, which permits such things. . . . Political matters here are very dark. We hope the Mohammedan power may get a pull-down in the present war, and we daily pray, Destroy thou them that destroy the earth. If that is wicked, we are doing wickedly, and we shall continue to do so until the Turk is blotted out, and Mohammedanism and the Papacy have no more power."

Illinois, Notice!

1. CHURCH CLERKS are all requested immediately to report by mail to our State secretary, Mrs. F. M. T. Simonson, Round Grove, Whiteside Co., Ill. Send your delegates' credentials, your annual church report, your financial report and pledge, and report any other item of interest to the annual Conference. This is your duty. Do it now.

2. Church treasurers are every one expected to report to the State secretary. Send your quarterly report, for quarter ending June 30. Report how much your church has paid on the pledge since March 31. Collect and send all dues to the State treasurer, Bro. J. R. Whitham, Aledo, Ill. Don't be negligent. You are the chosen church collectors. See your brethren and sisters, and ask them to redeem their pledges.

3. The elders and deacons in our churches should cherish a living interest in the welfare of their respective churches. Will they endeavor to "provoke" their clerks and treasurers "to love and good works"? May we all work in sweet harmony, and be saved!

G. W. COLCORD.

To Church Clerks of the Minn. Conference.

I WANT the name and post-office address of the clerk and treasurer of every church in our Conference.

When you read this, please write your own name and address, and that of your treasurer, and the name of your church, on a postal card, and direct it to me at Hutchinson, McLeod Co., Minn. If you attend to it now, it will not be forgotten, and I shall have your names and addresses at my command, whenever I wish to communicate with you.

D. P. CURTIS, Sec.

To the New England Conference.

OWING to the unusual drain upon our finances the present season, it is absolutely necessary that our s. b. and the one-third be promptly paid, in order that we may liquidate all claims against the Conference. In addition to our efforts in the T. and M. work, and the purchasing of the new pavilion, 80x125, we are at the expense of running two lecturing tents, one by Eld. D. M. Canright, in Massachusetts, and one by Eld. D. A. Robinson, in New Hampshire, necessarily making a heavy drain upon our treasury. Therefore, I do most earnestly recommend, if any brother or sister in the Conference has not already paid up the s. b. and the one-third for the support of the T. and M. work, that it be done at once; and that every church clerk or treasurer act with promptness in collecting these pledges, that the work of the Lord may not languish for the want of means to carry it forward. Please read Testimony No. 21, page 111.

M. WOOD.

Tents! Tents!!

PERSONS desiring family tents for our coming camp-meeting, can obtain them of Bro. I. Edgerton, No. 8, Rockwell St., Cleveland, Ohio. His tents are first class, both in material and manufacture, and are sold at very low prices. Be in season, brethren, send in your orders.

H. A. ST. JOHN.

Notice.

SISTER H. M. VAN SLYKE is still retained as secretary of Dist. No. 1, Mo. T. and M. Society, and all wishing correspondence with the secretary will address her at Hamilton, Caldwell Co., Mo.

And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of Heaven is at hand.

Indiana Camp-Meeting.

THE Seventh-day Adventists of Indiana will hold their next annual camp-meeting at Kokomo, Ind., Aug. 9-14. The Indianapolis, Peru and Chicago, Pan Handle, and Frankfort and Kokomo railroads all center in Kokomo. The depots are within a mile of the camp-ground. Teams will be at the stations to convey all who come to the ground.

Application has been made for a reduction of fare on all the railroads. Due notice of reduction will be given as soon as we receive a response from the companies.

We hope to see the largest turnout ever witnessed in the State. We expect to see each church in the State come with a tent, besides many family tents. Come, brethren and sisters, with your unconverted children and friends. Many in different parts of the State are favorably impressed with the truth, and could they be induced to come, would be persuaded to embrace it. Efficient speakers will be present.

Ample provisions will be made for man and beast. Let those who have not tents, and the lonely and scattered ones, come bringing bedding, etc., and ample room and shelter will be provided.

Come prepared to remain until the morning of the 15th. Let us pray for the blessing of the Lord to attend this meeting.

S. H. LANE.

Indiana State Conference.

THE Indiana State Conference of S. D. Adventists will hold its fifth annual session in connection with the camp-meeting at Kokomo, Aug. 9-14, 1877. Let each church see that one or more delegates are appointed. Also let the Systematic Benevolence treasurer see that the s. b. of his church is collected and forwarded to the State treasurer, or brought to the camp-ground. Also, let each church be prepared to pledge the amount of s. b. it can pay to the State Conference the coming year. Let each delegate be furnished with credentials, church reports, and financial report.

PROPHETIC TRUTH ACKNOWLEDGED.

THE extent to which an application of prophecy to events now transpiring, is acknowledged by men of different religious denominations, is somewhat remarkable. We gave last week a notice, taken from the Chicago Evening Journal, of a discourse by Dr. Newman, of Washington, D. C., in which he applies the last verse of Dan. 11, to the Turkish power, and believes that the present movement between the Turks and Russians will see a fulfillment of it.

We give this week an extract from a paper published by a Methodist minister, in Brooklyn, N. Y., in which he admits that men must yield to the evidence of their senses, that the illusion of a temporal millennium is dispelled by the unfavorable outlook, and that the coming of Christ is at hand.

And now a religious writer, in the Saginaw (Mich.) Daily Republican, admits the application of Rev. 16: 12, to the Turkish power, and thinks it will be fulfilled in the present war. A paragraph from this will be of interest to our readers. It is headed,

"THE WAY OF THE KINGS."

"And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates, and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared." Rev. 16: 12.

"We do not propose to offer anything like an exegesis upon the strange vision of St. John, the divine, but simply wish to call attention to the present war and its relation to this prophecy. That the days of Mohammedan misrule are about ended is a self-evident fact. The man sick so long has become a stench in the nostrils of the nations of the earth, and all would willingly assist at his obsequies with, possibly, the one exception of England, who would have to pay the funeral charges in the loss of her highway to India. It is useless to insist that the Moslem empire should longer exist. For ages this nation of bigots has acted as a clog upon the wheels of progress. Enlightenment of any kind has been absolutely forced upon them. They are beholden to Christian nations for existence for years past. Lust and bloodshed have ever been their governing principles, and now, whether it be a coincidence or not, the vision of John on the island of Patmos is being verified.

"Viewed from simply a political aspect, we insist that it is high time that this nuisance amid nations should be removed. Freedom demands it; religion demands it; the sanitary laws governing the health of the world demand it; and as in the case of other nations in the past who failed in fulfilling their mission, so must the Moslem pass away, and the crescent give place to the cross."

VIGILANT MISSIONARY WORK IN BATTLE CREEK.

WE have adopted the plan of having each member of the V. M. Society who has accomplished any work during the week, hand in a synopsis of it to the secretary at the opening of each weekly meeting, so that we are able to look back over the week, and see the amount of work that has been done. The plan can hardly be said yet to be in operation, and the reports are consequently not full; yet at our last meeting, reports for the week ending July 11, made the following encouraging exhibit:—

Periodicals sent away, 245. Periodicals distributed in B. C., 279. Pages of tracts distributed, 1,465. Letters written, 127. Families visited, 59. Subscribers, for INSTRUCTOR, 1.

When we consider the results which are known to have followed in some cases the giving of a tract, or the sending out of a single periodical, there is no computing the good that may in a brief course of time grow from one such week's work as above reported.

SPIRITISM.

THE statements contained in the following paragraph from the Spiritual Magazine, we have no doubt are strictly true. It shows a phase of spiritism of which those who do not look below the surface are not aware, and is a plain index to what its future is to be. It says:—

"Many prominent clergymen, and an innumerable host of private members of Christian churches, are firm believers in the essential, distinguishing doctrines of Spiritualism. These will finally become the link between Christians who do not believe in Spiritualism and Spiritualists who do not believe in Christianity. True Christianity, as taught in the New Testament, will be substituted for the present absurd systems of theology called by that name; and the true Spiritualism of the Bible will take the place of the present mongrel teachings of familiar spirits and true angels."

Not having the truth on the nature of man, and the state of the dead, the churches have no safeguard against the seductive influence of this last fascinating phase of error; and we see no reason why the way is not all prepared for the silent spread of this delusion among them, and its final open manifestation of such power as is assigned to it in the prophecies. And this may be nearer than the most discerning perceive.

THE STAR SHOWER.

DO NOT fail to read the graphic account of the great meteoric shower of Nov. 13, 1833, given on our first page. Much has been written on the subject, but some particulars are here given which have never before appeared in any of our works. The objection raised against our view of this phenomenon, namely, that it cannot be a sign because many other similar exhibitions have taken place, may be answered in the same manner as the same objection against our view of the dark day of 1780. See No. 2 of this volume. First, it is the most remarkable event of the kind of which we have any record; and, secondly, it took place within the limited time marked out in the prophecy in which the falling of the stars, as a sign, was to occur. There can be no question that this was the sign predicted by our Lord, when he said, "The stars [meteors] shall fall from heaven," and by John when he said, "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a figtree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind."

THE PROGRESS DEPARTMENT.

FORTY-SEVEN ministers are heard from this week in the Progress Department, through thirty-four reports. These show a good deal of activity in the field, a large amount of work being done, and an encouraging degree of success. All these workers request to be remembered in the fervent, effectual prayers of the people of God.

U. S.

THEY FEEL IT.

THE humiliation which has come upon the papacy in these later years, Roman Catholics are not able to bear with any becoming grace. The prophet asserted that they should take away his dominion (the papal dominion) to consume and destroy it unto the end. We live in the time when this is being fulfilled, and the old harlot, and all her followers are writhing under the infliction. This is shown by the following amiable (?) language in reference to the occupation of Rome by Victor Emanuel, taken from the address of Father Burke to the great meetings lately held in Limerick and Kilkenny, in honor of the pope's jubilee:—

"There is a man in Rome, in the Quirinal Palace, in the pope's own chambers, who entered into those chambers and took possession of the old pontiff's house by breaking his word. [Hear, hear.] By forging his own name in contradiction of the signature of that treaty of September, by which he swore before God and before Europe that he would respect the pope, the pope's office, the pope's independence, and the papal sovereignty. [Cheers.] He came into the city of Rome where he had no right to come. He came into the city of Rome where he said he would never come. He came into the city of Rome not only as a thief, but also as a perjurer. He came into the city of Rome not only as a thief stealing in, but as a burglar—a burglar. [Hear, hear.] Instead of his picklock and crowbar he had his great cannon, thundering at the walls, and breaking down those barriers that in their solemn and almost helpless antiquity were far stronger in their representation of the barrier of right and justice against wrong and injustice, than in the mere material strength they opposed to his force.

"He came in a manner befitting him. He came in over the walls battered down in defiance of every principle that even modern civilization has acknowledged to be the governing power of nations. He came in and stole the bishop's house—he stole his property, he plundered the churches, he robbed the monasteries, and he drove out the poor nuns upon three and four-pence a day to starve—ladies who had brought their dowries with them—and he took their fortunes and put them into his pocket, but he is not a bit the better for it to-day. But, my friends, although we sympathize with our Holy Father for that plunder, that violence, that rapine, that robbery—although we sympathize with him deeply, because the hand of the infamous, perjured burglar is at the old man's throat, we sympathize with him far more deeply in this, that the scoundrel—for I can call him no other name—the scoundrel who took the man's house, the ruffian who broke into the man's city is not content with this—he must rob him of his independent intercourse with his children."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. H. COOK: We have no evidence that Alexander Campbell became a convert to the Sabbath before his death.

J. R. CALKINS: We get the victory over the number of the name of the beast by refusing those institutions and practices which he sets forth as evidence of his power to sit supreme in the temple of God, by adopting which, we should acknowledge the validity of his title, by conceding his right to act for the church in behalf of the Son of God. We understand that verses 5 and 6 of Rev. 15, go back again in the prophecy to the beginning of the sanctuary work, as the prophecies are not consecutive, but composed of independent lines.

M. C. WILCOX: We have not received the pamphlet you mention.

G. D. CHESTER: You will find an exposition of 1 Pet. 3: 19, 20, in Man's Nature and Destiny, pp. 87-95, or State of the Dead, pp. 73-79.

F. A. MARVIN: The question of dealing with cheese factories in a manner not to infringe the Sabbath, we leave to the wisdom of those living in those localities, and knowing more of the circumstances attending such dealings, or to the consciences of those engaged therein. We believe that a conscientious Sabbath-keeper will be quick to discern any plan of the enemy which is drawing him into an infringement of the Sabbath; and in all cases where there is the least doubt, he will give his conscience the benefit of the doubt, by refraining from everything that is questionable.

T. BROWN: For an exposition of Isaiah 65: 20, see REVIEW, Vol. 43, No. 1. On Matt. 5: 19, see works on the Sabbath question; and on Ps. 49: 19, see works on the nature of man.

F. MORRISON: Prov. 21: 18, "The wicked shall be a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright," seems to refer to those instances in which the punishing of the wicked has preserved the righteous. Thus when Achan was stoned, he was a ransom for the camp of righteous Israel. The seven sons of Saul, when they were hanged, were a ransom for the kingdom of righteous David. And often the righteous are delivered out of trouble, and the wicked coming in his stead, seems a ransom for him. Prov. 11: 8.

QUESTIONED. A correspondent questions the date of the great auroral display noticed last week. He thinks it occurred in 1836, instead of 1837. We gave the date as we found it in the book.

A. M. JOHNSON: See an explanation of Acts 26: 23; 1 Cor. 15: 20, etc., in "State of the Dead," pp. 115-125, where the question of the resurrection of Moses is discussed in full. In regard to the newspaper paragraph trying to show that Christ was in paradise on the day of his crucifixion, because he was in Heaven when conversing with Nicodemus, John 3: 13, it will be sufficient to say, there is a difference between Christ's personal presence, and his presence by his Spirit, which any one can see and understand; and when the writer will tell how Christ could say, I have not yet ascended to my Father, when he was there, according to his view, all the time, it will be worth while to notice his remarks further.

"Is it wrong for railroad companies to run their cars on the Sabbath? And if so, is it consistent in Sabbath-keepers, under ordinary circumstances, to travel by railroad on the Sabbath?"

"J. R. WHITHAM."

ANS. It certainly is wrong for R. R. companies to run their cars as they do on the Sabbath for purposes of traffic. But suppose that all R. R. companies, and all who travel, were Sabbath-keepers, would there be anything wrong in steaming up and running a moderate distance to attend a Sabbath meeting, and for that purpose only? Would there be any where near the amount of work involved in this that would have to be put forth if the same company should go by private conveyances? And if this could be done, it may be asked further, May not a Sabbath-keeper avail himself of the fact that the cars do run, to accomplish just that for himself that he would do, in the case previously supposed? In some cities, Sabbath-keepers to get to meeting at all, have to avail themselves of the street cars, where the same principle would apply. And between the cities of Oakland and San Francisco, Cal., Sabbath-keepers have to pass by cars and steamer. If they go from one to the other for Sabbath meetings at all, they have to go in this way; for there is no other. Is it not right?

D. S. PLUM: We have no Catholic catechisms for sale. They can be had at Catholic book stores in large cities.

J. W. LESAN: To meet the misrepresentations of your Methodist minister on Matt. 28: 1, and other texts that speak of the first day of the week, you need the tract on this subject published at this Office, entitled, "Argument on Sabbath." It fully answers the false reading of the Greek of those passages, by ministers and self-styled scholars. We would recommend you to procure a quantity for distribution in your neighborhood.

"WONDROUS TIMES."

THE above is the heading of an article in The Whispers of Peace, edited by S. H. Platt, Methodist minister, 202 Montague St., Brooklyn, N. Y.; and the following is an extract from the article:—

"The time-honored dream of a regenerated humanity dwelling in peace, with the lion and the lamb harmlessly lying down together, is being dispelled by the hopelessness of the outlook."

"Meanwhile the prophecies are running out. The battle of Gog and Magog seems to be waging. The temporal power of the Pope has been stripped away. Distress of nations is certainly here. Amid it all, the most devoted students of God's word all over the world are looking for the speedy coming of the Lord from heaven."

"This bent of the deepest religious thought, this spontaneous kindling of the longings of the most spiritual leaders of His people does most surely portend some wonderful change. And what change so likely to occur when the grand prophetic national visions pass into history fulfilled, as that final marshaling of events that ushers in the day of days?"

"Let every lover of his Lord be on the watch-tower, 'for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh.'"

THE ARGUMENT OF BLESSING.

A MISSIONARY worker in Battle Creek received a letter from a friend who resides on one of "the islands of the sea," in which he writes:—

"I have read the book on the Sabbath, but am afraid you will be surprised when I tell you I cannot follow all the way you seem to go in the subject, for I cannot believe that our Heavenly Father would have showered down so many and so great blessings on the missionary efforts of both England and America if they were teaching so great an error."

The writer of this letter is not alone in this opinion; it is an argument put forth in some form by a great many people. But this writer sees the apparent force of it beyond most of those who use it, because he dwells in a missionary field where the power of the gospel has been seen in the conversion of dark-minded cannibals to Christianity. Yet the argument is not only faulty, but really a dangerous one to act upon.

1. It leads to the conclusion that God blesses only those who are right in all things, and the belief will inevitably follow in many minds that they are right in all things because God blesses them. If it does not amount to this it amounts to nothing at all. Therefore it is a dangerous doctrine, fostering a spirit of self-righteousness. And hence,

2. It shuts out all efforts toward a growth in grace. Why progress, why change in any thing, why examine ourselves with a view to correct our errors, if the blessings of Heaven prove we are already right? This is the force of the argument precisely. We once conversed with a man in St. Clair Co., Mich., who made great profession of high attainments in Christianity; we tried to impress on his mind the inconsistency of a Christian indulging in the foolish, costly, injurious, and filthy habit of using tobacco, and we presented it in all these lights. With much self-complacency this man not only excused his habit but declared that it was right, and a thing to be commended; "for," said he, "God sanc-

LEADERSHIP.

It is very well known to most of the readers of the REVIEW that some five years since a mistaken view was taken of this question, inasmuch that the position was taken that one man was to be recognized as the visible leader of Seventh-day Adventists, as Moses was the visible leader of the Hebrews; and what made this a very painful subject to us was the fact that the position was taken that we should be recognized as that leader.

The position of Moses was a very laborious and trying one, and good counsel suggested that a large number should be appointed to assist him in his work. We have but one leader, which is Christ, and the entire brotherhood of the ministry, while they should counsel with each other out of due respect for the judgment of each other, should, nevertheless, look to our great Leader as their unerring guide.

Our long experience in the general, successful management of matters pertaining to the cause gave our people confidence in us, and has had a tendency to lead them to look to us and lean upon our judgment too much. This experience we gained by anxious study and earnest prayer. Our brethren can obtain it in the same way. They should have looked to God more and gained individual experience. For the wrong, God has in wisdom removed us from them for a time, and we fear that the removal will be final unless they learn to look to God for themselves. We do not object to counseling with our brethren, if it can be taken as simply the opinion of one who is frail and liable to err, but when it comes to this that brethren demand of us our opinion, and add that they shall do just what we say, we shall withhold our opinion.

We now expect to be present at our General Conference, when and where we shall hope that these suggestions may be carried out.

THE DARK DAY OF MAY 19, 1780.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "A statement is made in 'Facts for the Times' which I have not been able to find. It is Noah Webster's statement respecting the dark day, said to be taken from his dictionary of the edition of 1869. Learned men tell me that there is no such edition, and deny that the sun was darkened in 1780. Where will I find the statement?"

We would say to our correspondent that the "learned" men of whom he speaks are not so learned as they might be in regard to Webster's dictionary and the dark day. We have lying upon our table the edition of 1869 from which the quotation in "Facts for the Times" is taken. On page 1556 he has this notice of the dark day:—

"Dark Day, The. May 19, 1780;—so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day extending over all New England. In some places persons could not see to read common print in the open air for several hours together. Birds sang their evening song, disappeared, and became silent; fowls went to roost; cattle sought the barn-yard; and candles were lighted in the houses. The obscuration began about ten o'clock in the morning, and continued till the middle of the next night, but with different degrees of duration in different places. For several days previous, the wind had been variable, but chiefly from the south-west, and the north-east. The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known."

Since this occurrence, so striking a fulfillment of Matt. 24:29; Rev. 6:12, and other scriptures, has been urged as a sign of the near coming of Christ, there are found plenty of persons who are ready to "go back" on Noah Webster, and claim that there was nothing unusual or unnatural in that day, that it was all in accordance with natural law, and was no sign of anything. Those who lived at the time, and had as good a chance, at least, to mark all its strange features and unnatural manifestations, as people of the present time, were filled with awe at the occurrence, and for years, so long as the memory of it lasted, were unable to explain it; but their degenerate sons, the wondrous wise generation of the present, living nearly a hundred years from the occurrence, and having never seen anything of the kind, can see through it just as easy as they can tell why two and two make four.

Thus a correspondent of the Inter-Ocean from Vermont, asks, :—

"Will you give the causes (and proof) of the 'dark day' in 1780, the 19th of May, I believe. An 'Advent preacher' has been preaching in this neighborhood, and alluded to it as a sign of the destruction of the world."

And the reply is given thus:—

"The dark day of 1780 was produced by entirely natural causes, and was about as much a sign of the destruction of the world as of the advent of the potato-beetle. The darkness, said Dr. Samuel Tenney, of Exeter, N. H., was preceded by common clouds. Between these common clouds and the earth intervened another stratum of great thickness. As the stratum advanced the darkness commenced and increased with its progress. The uncommon thickness of this stratum was occasioned by two strong currents of wind from the southward and westward, condensing the vapors and drawing them in a north-west direction. The density of this strata was owing to the vapor and smoke it contained. These so-called dark days have not been uncommon, being known in 366 B. C.; 295 B. C.; 252 A. D.; 746, 775, 1732, 1762, 1780, 1783, 1807, 1816. The one was as prophetic as any other and no more so."

It would have been a little more to the satisfaction to any one who wishes to know the reasons of his faith, if the writer of the reply had stated where he found his evidence for all his assertions. And we would like a little light on such points as this: From what came that "stratum of great thickness"? Of what was it composed? How was it formed? This fellow's explanation reads something like this: It was dark because there was great darkness. He simply states the fact in another form, and calls that an explanation. His statement needs explaining as really as the first. "The uncommon thickness of the stratum was caused by two strong currents of wind," &c. How did those winds chance to come just then, and just when there were vapors to condense? And what caused the vapors? Then how could currents from the west and south draw the vapors in a north-west direction? Common philosophy would assign them, under such circumstances, a north-east direction. Our friend must be careful or he will make the dark day to be a greater phenomenon than we have ever claimed.

But, further, we would ask how, according to the reply above given, the words of our Lord can ever be fulfilled. He says that the sun shall be darkened; and he means the literal sun; for he speaks of men and things on the earth in contrast with it; Luke 21:25; and he says that when it is thus darkened it is a sign of the end; for when we see these things come to pass, he tells us that we are to know that he is near, even at the doors. But according to the foregoing writer, there never can be any sign of this nature. He declares there never has been in the past; and suppose such a phenomenon should occur again; would it be a sign? Not in his eyes; for the hypothesis of vapors, winds, natural laws, and common occurrences, would instantly fly to his scoffing lips. But something of this kind is to constitute a sign; for the Lord himself has declared it; and we would like to ask the objector how a darkening of the sun should differ from that of 1780, to answer to the prophecy and constitute a sign?

But, it is urged, there have been many such events, hence it can be no sign; and seven dark days are mentioned by our writer before 1780, and three since, for which, however, he forgot to give his authority. But how does it happen that nobody has seemed to pay any attention to these days, or make any account of them? and why is it that all fix upon May 19, 1780, as the only one worthy of special note, giving it by way of distinction, the title of The Dark Day?

The answer is obvious. It occupies a pre-eminent position in this respect. It towers up far above all others as the one alone remarkable and note-worthy for its awful phenomena.

But we are not left to decide the matter from this evidence alone; for our Lord has not only told us that such an event should occur as a sign of his coming, but he has told us also when it should occur. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days," says Matthew. Mark is more definite and says, "In those days after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened," &c. Mark 13:24. The "days" are the days of papal supremacy, the 1260 years from 538 to 1798; the tribulation is the oppression of Christians by the Catholic power till restrained by the work of the Reformation. The tribulation may be said to have ceased in the early part of the 18th century. The "days" ended within two years of its close. Thus by the fixed terms of the prophecy we are shut up to a period less than a hundred years in length, and ending in 1798, in which to look for that darkening of the sun which was to be a sign of the Lord's soon coming.

Again, the darkening of the sun was to be the second great event to take place under the sixth seal. Rev. 6:12. The first and the one which marked the opening of that seal, was a great earthquake, shown to be, by comparison with the preceding seals, the great earthquake of Lisbon, Nov. 1, 1755. Between this point and the end of the papal period in 1798, the sun was to be darkened as a sign of the end. Here we are shut up to a period of time only forty-three years in length in which to look for that darkening of the sun which was the subject of the prediction. Now it matters not if our opponents should claim seven thousand dark days instead of seven, as notable as the one of 1780, it would not affect the prediction or the sign in the least degree. We care not how many nor what kind of dark days there may have been in other ages, we look for one which was to take place in that brief specified period as the predicted sign.

We fix our eyes upon that time, and what do we behold? We find not only the darkening of the sun, as foretold, but we find a dark day so much more notable than all others, that it is set forth by way of pre-eminence as "the dark day," while in general history all others are passed by in silence.

From one point it is very strange that people can overlook considerations of this nature which are so decisive upon this question. From another, it is not. What a man doesn't want to see he can very easily keep from seeing. But the lack both of inclination and ability we apprehend is accounted for by the prophet Daniel, when he says that "the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand."

INFINITE SIN.

BRO. R. THOMPSON writes us that he has lately heard a Presbyterian minister speak from Job 22:5, "Is not thy wickedness great? and thine iniquities infinite?" and argue from it eternal misery, on the ground that "infinite sin" demands infinite punishment.

Turning to the passage, we find that the words are from Eliphaz the Temanite, and are only one of a series of false charges which he made against Job. For instance, he says to Job in the next verse, "For thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for naught, and stripped the naked of their clothing. Thou hast not given water to the weary to drink, and thou hast withholden bread from the hungry." Verse 9: "Thou hast sent widows away empty," &c. These things Eliphaz urges to sustain his charge that Job's iniquity was infinite.

But to show how unjust and cruel such accusations were, we read in chapter 29:12-17, what course Job did actually take. He says: "I delivered the poor. . . The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me; and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. I was a father to the poor; and the cause which I knew not, I searched out. And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth."

Therefore we conclude that Job's wickedness was not great, nor his iniquities infinite.

For Eliphaz to charge Job thus, under these circumstances, was wicked; and for a Presbyterian minister, or any other minister, to indorse the charge, and then try to prove from it eternal misery, is foolish.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

How do you harmonize Lev. 6:16, 26, which says the sacrifice shall be eaten in the holy place, with Num. 18:10, which says that it shall be eaten in the most holy place?

ANS. Bishop Horsley says that verse 10 of Num. 18 should be translated, "Among the most holy things thou shalt eat it." This we find in Barrett's Synopsis of Criticism on that text. And Mr. Barrett adds: "The precept refers to a distinction between 'most holy' and 'holy' things. The 'most holy' were to be eaten by the males of Aaron's family only; the 'holy' by any of his family, male or female, who were clean." Nothing was ever eaten in the most holy place of the sanctuary.

Please harmonize Acts 9:7, and Acts 22:9.

ANS. The word rendered "heard" in those texts is a word which also means "to understand, to know." The text which says they "heard" the voice, means that they were conscious of a sound through their sense of hearing. But the text which says they "heard not" the voice, means that they did not understand the words that were spoken.

If Easter was recognized as a particular day, as in Acts 12:4, why not now?

ANS. The word there rendered Easter means simply the passover, and reference is made to it simply as a festival observed by the Jews. Dr. Clarke's note on this passage will be instructive. He says:—

"Perhaps there never was a more unhappy not to say absurd, translation, than that in our text. But before I come to explain the word, it is necessary to observe that our term called Easter is not exactly the same with the Jewish passover. This festival is always held on the fourteenth day of the first vernal full moon; but the Easter of the Christians never till the next Sabbath [by this term of course Dr. C. means Sunday] after said full moon; and to avoid all conformity with the Jews in this matter, if the fourteenth day of the first vernal full moon happen on a Sabbath, then the festival of Easter is deferred till the Sabbath following. The first vernal moon is that whose fourteenth day is either on the day of the vernal equinox or the next fourteenth day after it. The vernal equinox, according to a decree of the council of Nice, is fixed to the 21st of March, and therefore the first vernal moon is that whose fourteenth day falls upon the 21st of March, or the first fourteenth day after. . . . The term Easter, inserted here by our translator, they borrowed from the ancient Anglo-Saxon service books, or from the versions of the Gospels, which always translates the το πασχα of the Greek by this term."

Dr. Clarke then gives various names from the Saxon which he says "are different modes of spelling the name of the goddess Easter, whose festival was celebrated by our pagan forefathers on the month of April; hence that month, in the Saxon calendar, is called Easter month. Every view we can take of this subject shows the gross impropriety of retaining a name every way exceptionable, and palpably absurd."

What is the explanation of 1 Pet. 4:6?

ANS. We consider that the dead mentioned are the same as the "dead" in the previous verse: "Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead." They are those who are literally dead. The gospel was preached to them, not while they were dead, but before they died, while they were living. And they are to be judged just like living men just before Christ comes. This is accomplished in the investigative Judgment of the cleansing of the sanctuary. This being past, those who are found righteous will live according to God in the Spirit, quickened or made immortal by the Holy Spirit. Rom. 8:11.

How is the genealogy of Christ as given in Matt. 1 to be reconciled with the account given in Luke 3?

ANS. The Jews never allowed the name of a woman in their genealogical tables. Hence, when a line of descendants ended with a woman, they did not put in the name of that woman, but the name of her husband, who was only the son-in-law of the woman's father. Luke reckons according to this custom, and puts into his table two persons who were only sons-in-law of the persons named as their fathers; whereas Matthew confines his table to those who were sons strictly speaking. Thus Joseph is called by Luke the son of Heli, because he having no sons, his daughter Mary married Joseph, and the name of Joseph therefore stands as the son of Heli, whereas he was in reality only his son-in-law, but really the son of Jacob. Again, Luke places Salathiel as the son of Neri, and Matthew makes him the son of Jechonias. He was the real son of Jechonias, but the son-in-law of Neri, having married a daughter of Neri. Their son was Zorobabel, a name which appears in both tables. From Abraham to David the tables of Matthew and Luke agree. From David Matthew comes down through the line of Solomon, and Luke through the line of Nathan, both of them sons of David. These lines meet in Zorobabel, a son of Salathiel of the line of Solomon, who married a daughter of Neri, of the line of Nathan. From Zorobabel Matthew comes down through the line of Abiud, his son, and Luke through the line of Rhesa, another son. These two lines again meet in Christ, the reputed son of Joseph of the line of Abiud, who had married Mary, a daughter of Heli, of the line of Rhesa. Thus Luke gives us the genealogy through the line of Mary, and Matthew that through the line of Joseph. These lines meet in Zorobabel and David. From this point the tables agree back to Abraham, with whom Matthew stops, while Luke goes all the way back to Adam. There is really no more discrepancy between the accounts of Matthew and Luke, than there would be between the letters of a person who should give to a friend his pedigree on his father's side, and

MEETING AT BATTLE CREEK.

SABBATH, September 28, the mammoth tent having been pitched on sixth-day, there was preaching in the tent at 10:30 A. M. and 2:30 P. M. The congregation was very large at both services. It was variously estimated from 800 to 1,200. Probably there were not less than 1,000 adults present, who gave close attention to the word spoken. The writer spoke in the forenoon, and Elder Andrews, who arrived about forty hours before, spoke in the afternoon. J. E. White, with others recently from Colorado, was present to lead the singing. Several pieces were sung from his new book accompanied by an organ, which added much to the interest of our Sabbath service.

We were very happy to again stand before the people of our charge, and speak to them the words of life. We spoke seventy minutes with ease, answering the important question, "Where are we?" We traced down the several lines of prophecy in Daniel two, seven, eight, and eleven, showing that all the specifications of these prophetic chains have been fulfilled excepting the crowning event of prophecy, the coming of the Son of man.

And while the prophecy of Daniel has to do with four empires, Babylon, Persia, Grecia, and Rome, the book of the Revelation has to do with the fourth only, Rome. We trace down the four leading chains of symbols in this book and find ourselves standing before the Judgment of the last day, waiting for the second appearing of Christ. And although we had done this a thousand times, yet on this occasion the field seemed new, and the evidences more conclusive than ever before. As we followed down the seven seals to the opening of the seventh, we stood before the naked scenes of the last Judgment. And the churches brought us to the preaching of the coming of Christ in the sixth, while the seventh reveals our real condition. Here the inquiry was again raised, in view of the description given of the church of the Laodiceans, "Where are we?" Or, what is our real condition before God? The danger of self-deception was pointed out, references to cases of great deception in Old-Testament history were made, and the church was exhorted to new consecration and devotion to the work of God.

In the afternoon Elder Andrews gave a practical discourse of not great length, as he was weary from his journey across the ocean. Elders Andrews and Bourdeau were both greeted by their brethren and old friends with joy. The Sabbath with its services was a very interesting one to the church at Battle Creek, and a good introduction to our camp-meeting.

We were very happy to meet Elder Loughborough, from California, this morning, Monday, the 30th. He appears some worn from his excessive labors at the two camp-meetings in California, but enjoys his usual good health and buoyant spirits. He has many old friends who will greet him with joy at the camp-meeting, after an absence on the Pacific coast of ten years.

The mammoth tent is pitched in the center of the spacious grounds, and is being seated. The provision tent and the dining tent, and two other large tents for prayer-meetings, will be up to-night, also a dozen or more family tents, including those to lodge ministers, and a forty-foot tent for committees, to be used for a sort of head-quarters for reporting and general business. And the camp-meeting committee will push the work as fast as possible, that all may be in complete readiness for the opening service, Wednesday morning, the second.

This camp will be the largest we have ever had. From fifty to one hundred ministers are expected, and probably there will be on the ground not less than three thousand Sabbath-keepers on the next Sabbath. The weather is fine, and should good weather continue, the meeting will hold over two Sabbaths, giving parts of families at a distance an opportunity to attend the first Sabbath, and after their return to their homes the other portions of families can attend the second Sabbath. And may our adorable Redeemer come up to the feast. J. W.

THE greatest heresy that can deceive the human mind, is the heresy that makes a man believe he can meet mercy while he lives in sin.

WHERE ARE WE?

WHEN mariners meet upon the seas, the inquiry is exchanged, "Where are we?" Answers are given as to their latitude and longitude according to their reckoning; and if, after comparing, there is an agreement, confidence is enjoyed by both parties. So with Christian voyagers to the haven of eternal repose. Lines of prophecy containing waymarks, are illustrated by rivers of water, hence the expression that "they show us where we are on the stream of time."

We have a very remarkable illustration of this fact in the following from the twelfth chapter of the book of Daniel: "Then I Daniel looked, and, behold, there stood other two, the one on this side of the bank of the river, and the other on that side of the bank of the river. And one said to the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders? And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by Him that liveth forever that it shall be for a time, times, and a half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." Verses 5-7. In briefly commenting upon these verses we notice the leading points as follows:—

1. The words, "Then I Daniel looked," show that the line of prophecy, commencing with Persia, passing Grecia and Rome of the eleventh chapter, and reaching to the standing up of Michael, or the coming and kingdom of Christ, the time of trouble, and the resurrection of the dead, had ended, and that a new scene had opened before the prophet of God.

2. In this new scene three persons appear, holding different positions, "one on this side of the bank of the river, and the other on that side of the bank of the river," while a third, clothed in linen, is upon (above, margin), the waters of the river.

3. The man clothed in linen above the river is the Son of God, one of the two persons beside the river is the angel Gabriel, while there is no means of knowing who the other is. As proof that two of them are Christ and Gabriel we cite the words of the angel to the prophet in chap. 10:21: "There is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince." Michael is the archangel. Jude, verse 9. The archangel is the Lord himself, who descends from Heaven with the trump of God to awaken the righteous dead. 1 Thess. 4:16. Jesus Christ and the angel Gabriel are the persons who act in giving these lines of prophecy to Daniel. A third person appears, but says and does nothing. That the words of Gabriel, "There is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince," may be true, silence is necessary on the part of the third party. The two persons called "saints" in chap. 8:13, 14, are the Son of God and the angel Gabriel. And it is the blessed Christ of the New Testament whose voice is heard from between the banks of the river Ulai giving the imperative order for the benefit of Daniel: "Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision." Verse 16.

4. Jesus Christ not only gave the prophetic symbols of the several chains of prophecy in the book of Daniel, and also the prophetic numbers, two of which reach to the period when he enters the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary and stands before the mercy-seat and the ark of God containing the ten commandments, but with both hands raised to Heaven he answers with an oath the question of time, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?"

5. A flowing river is a most appropriate figure of the lapse of time. Who ever knew a river to become weary and stop to rest? It takes its unwearied course day and night, onward and still onward to its ocean destiny. So time, made up of seconds, minutes, hours, months, and years, is ever passing to the great ocean of eternity. And the man clothed in linen, above the waters of the river, illustrates the position of the Son of God relative to prophetic time, that he is the author of the periods in the book of Daniel.

It is true that Christ did say in answer to the inquiry of his disciples, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. 24:3, that "of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of Heaven, but my Father only." Verse 36. But he also says in the next verse, "As the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." The time of the flood was given to the patriarch in years. Gen. 6:3. This brought that family of eight to the time of waiting for further orders relative to entering the ark, the breaking up of the fountains of the great deep, and the opening of the windows of heaven for the rain to descend upon the earth forty days and forty nights. In this waiting, watching position, Noah hears the voice of God saying to him, "Come thou and all thy house into the ark;" "for yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth." Gen. 7:1, 4.

The prophetic periods brought us to the especial waiting, watching, praying time, where they terminated. We are not timeists in the sense of looking to some future definite date for the second advent. But if holding that the prophetic periods are a portion of the "Scriptures given by inspiration of God," which are profitable for doctrine, and that they were given by the Son of God for an important object, and that purpose being gained they have terminated, makes a person a timeist, then we are timeists. The writer preached definite time in 1843-4, because he found it in our blessed Bible; but with the clearer view of 1878, that Christ gave those periods and answered the earnest question of the prophet, "How long?" with a most solemn oath, he sees the time revealed to Daniel and John by the Son of God in a clearer and stronger light than he did thirty-four years since.

And that the true church might be looking, waiting, and watching for her divine Lord, he not only gave the prophetic symbols of Daniel and John, which reach to the end, and the prophetic numbers connected with them, but he has given signs of his coming in the lights of heaven. The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall. We shall not in this article give the evidences that the prophetic words of our Lord respecting the darkening of the sun were fulfilled in the dark day of May 19, 1780, and that the darkening of the moon occurred on the following night, nor that his words respecting the falling stars were fulfilled on the night of November 13, 1833. The facts important to this part of the subject are, that Christ has given signs of his coming, and enforces his words by this simple and most impressive illustration:—

"Now learn a parable of the fig-tree. When his branch is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." Matt. 24:32, 33. When the warmth of spring presses the buds from the leafless branches, and the fields begin to put down their green velvet carpets, and all nature wakes from her winter slumbers, we know that summer is right upon us. Should the frost of early spring, or a slight fall of snow, mingle the pure white with the delicate green, still all sane persons would know that summer was near. He who would take these as tokens of returning winter, would be regarded as a fit subject for the insane retreat. In this figure there is no room for doubt. And as no figure employed in the Sacred Scriptures is stronger than the fact illustrated, the Son of God evidently designed to remove all doubt from the minds of his people, and inspire them with perfect confidence, that they might express themselves in positive terms respecting his soon coming. Immediately following this impressive figure, as if to make the impress still deeper, are these words, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

We trace down the line of prophecy represented by the metallic image of the second chapter of Daniel, from the golden head, Babylon, the silver breast and arms, Media and Persia, past the sides of brass, Grecia, to the feet and toes, Rome in its divided state, and there we find ourselves waiting the utter destruction of all earthly governments, represented by the stone dashing the image in pieces. What next? Answer: The establishment of the everlasting kingdom of God, which includes the coming of the Son of man to destroy his enemies, raise the righteous dead, restore the earth to its Eden glory, and reign with his people upon it "forever, even forever and ever."

The same field of prophecy is occupied in the seventh chapter of Daniel with the use of another class of symbols, the lion, the bear, the leopard, the beast with ten horns, and the same beast with three horns plucked up by the little horn. The kingdom of Babylon is symbolized by the lion of this chapter, the same as by the golden head of chapter second. Persia by the bear, Grecia by the leopard, and Pagan and Papal Rome by the two forms or conditions of the great and terrible beast. The specifications of this prophetic chain are more minute than those of chapter second. The time of the persecuting rule of Papal Rome is given in a manner so very plain, its twelve hundred and sixty years bounded at each end, commencing A. D. 538, and terminating A. D. 1798, that it can hardly be misunderstood. What next? Answer:

The second appearing of Christ, the destruction of the beast, his body given to the burning flames. We have passed all the light-houses of the coast of time, and are entering the eternal haven by the light of the judgment fires of the burning day and the blazing glory of the coming of the Son of man.

Again, the last three of these four universal empires are symbolized in the eighth chapter of Daniel by the ram with two horns, Media and Persia; the goat, Grecia; and the little horn, Rome. This horn was to become exceedingly great, stand up against the Prince of princes at his first advent, and be broken without hand at his second advent. We wait the destruction of the man of sin by the brightness of the coming of the King of kings.

And there is a line of historic prophecy in chapter eleven, where the symbols are thrown off, beginning with the kings of Persia, and reaching down past Grecia and Rome, to the time when that power "shall come to his end and none shall help him." If the feet and toes of the metallic image are Roman, if the beast with ten horns that was given to the burning flames of the great day be the Roman beast, the little horn which stood up against the Prince of princes be Rome, and if the same field and distance are covered by these four prophetic chains, then the last power of the eleventh chapter, which is to "come to his end and none shall help him," is Rome. But if this be Turkey, as some teach, then the toes of the image of the second chapter are Turkish, the beast with ten horns of the seventh chapter represents Turkey, and it was Turkey that stood up against the Prince of princes of the eighth chapter of Daniel. True, Turkey is bad enough off; but its waning power and its end is the subject of the prophecy of John and not of Daniel.

The fulfillment of these lines of prophecy constitutes signs of the approaching end.

Christ said to those who were rejecting him, "Ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?" Matt. 16:3.

The prophets of God had foretold the humble advent of the Just One at his first appearing, even the time of that event is given in the seventy weeks of the ninth chapter of Daniel. And the fulfillment of these prophecies constituted signs of Christ's advent. And if words of condemnation fell from the lips of Christ on the Jews for rejecting him, because in their blindness they could not see the few and comparatively faint signs of his first advent, those who close their eyes to the tokens of his second advent will be worthy of greater condemnation than the Jews in proportion as the signs of the second advent are more numerous and are clearer fulfillments of prophecy than were those of his first advent.

While the lines of prophecy in the book of Daniel have to do with the four kingdoms, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome, that of John pertains to the fourth only, Rome. The Revelation contains four distinct lines of prophecy, measuring the period of the fourth universal empire, covering the history of the church until her Lord shall come. We briefly notice these prophetic chains in the following order:—

1. The seven seals. Prophecy is history in advance. The Revelation was a sealed book from the fact that it related to the future. Said the angel to John, "Come up hither, and I will show thee things which must be hereafter." Rev. 4:1. But as the car of time rolls down the track of providence, and the specifications of the prophecy are fulfilled, and the events marked by the prophetic pencil become matters of history, the seals are opened in their order. Under the seven seals is the history of the church of Jesus Christ in seven periods, reaching down to the end. The opening of the sixth seal reveals the special signs of the second advent, and opens before us the naked glare of the scenes of the last Judgment.

"And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together, and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every free man, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains, and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" The signs of the second advent have been fulfilled, and we now stand under the sixth seal, waiting the coming of the Son of man accompanied by all the holy angels. In their absence from the heavenly courts to escort their Leader and Commander down to earth to raise the righteous dead and change the living just to immortality, every harp and every angel voice will be hushed, and there will be "silence in Heaven about the space of half an hour." Rev. 8:1. When the ministry of Christ shall be finished, and his blood shall no more be offered to cleanse the dinner of his sins, and the fearful fiat of Almighty God will be given, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still; and behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me," Rev. 22:11, 12; when all the seals will be open. Thus John is borne down the stream of time. And standing where we stand to-day, he received this order from the angel, "Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book [or regard it no longer as a sealed book], for the time is at hand." Verse 10.

2. The seven churches. These also represent seven periods of the church of Christ, reaching down to the time when the overcomers shall be seated on their Lord's throne in the immortal kingdom, as their Living Head overcame, and is now seated with the Father on his throne. Rev., chaps 2 and 3. To the sixth church, Philadelphia, meaning brotherly love, Christ says, "Behold I come quickly. Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." This church was composed of those who left their creeds and party strife under the proclamation of the second coming of Christ at hand in 1844, left the several organizations of which they were members, and united in one happy, loving, brotherhood, looking for Christ's second appearing. And of these, our adorable Redeemer says, "I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." He has the key of David, and is soon to manifest his power and reign on the throne of David.

But he says to the last church, Laodicea, "Behold I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." Chap. 3:20. These words of significant import represent no common blessing. But before the blessing can be received and enjoyed there is a great work to be done by those addressed. They are represented as lukewarm. They are under the terrible deception of thinking that they are rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing, while ignorant of the fact that they are wretched, miserable, poor, blind, and naked. They are exhorted to be zealous and repent. But they are not left here.

Jesus offers to be their counselor, and exhorts them to buy of him gold and white raiment. He stands at the door and knocks, and promises that if any man will open the door he will come and sup with him, and he with Christ. Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with me." Here is a work for those addressed to do. Christ will not force his way into the hearts of his people, but when they have prepared the way he will come in and shed his love abroad in their hearts. J. W.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A CORRESPONDENT inquires whether a person belonging to the S. D. A. church, moving into a new place, can properly meet with those who have been turned out of the church for apostasy, Sabbath-keepers hostile to S. D. Adventists, preference to those belonging to his own church. Such a question need not be asked. If a person belongs to that class, let him go with them; and if he goes there, he shows that he belongs with them; for, as in Acts 4:23, every man having the opportunity will go to his own company."

Why should Christ curse the fig-tree when the time for figs was not yet? Mark 11:13. An infidel in our neighborhood points to it as an inconsistency in the scriptures. J. P. H.

Ans. That infidel must give the writer of Mark's gospel credit for marvelous obtuseness, if he supposes him to say that figs were expected upon the tree when it was not a season of the year in which figs were produced, and that the tree was cursed because it had no fruit out of the season of figs. Such a man would be destitute of common sense. And then what can we say of the millions of the best minds in the Christian world whom Mark has caused to believe, not only that he was a consistent and sensible writer, but also that he wrote by inspiration of God? A wonderful result truly to be wrought out by an idiot! The fact is that the fig-tree, in favorable localities, sometimes has fruit upon it all the year round. Dr. Clarke says that he has often seen this. Consider further that the fig-tree puts forth its figs first and afterward its leaves. Therefore, in whatever season of the year this tree was seen having leaves, it was to be taken as an evidence that there was fruit there, unless that fruit had been gathered.

But of course the fig-tree, like other fruit-trees, has its regular times of bearing its fruit, and hence there was a regular time for gathering the crop; and this time of gathering was called "the time of figs." Figs ripened shortly before the passover; but the Jews did not begin to gather them till the passover. Now when Jesus passed this tree, it was five days before the passover; it was therefore time for the figs to be ripe. But they were not gathered; for that did not take place till the passover; "the time of [gathering] figs was not yet," and the tree showed abundance of leaves, which was to be taken as an evidence that figs were there. Therefore it was consistent to expect to find figs on that tree.

Finding none under these circumstances, the Lord invests it with moral qualities, and makes it to stand as a representative of the Jewish people. Like the tree, they were covered with leaves—the leaves of high profession and great pretensions; but there was no fruit. It also represents the formal professor even of to-day. There are persons who are hypocritical pretenders. They loudly profess great things; and from their profession one would have a right to expect to find in them the fruits of the Spirit; but when their lives are examined, it is found that their religion is all a sham. There is no fruit there—"nothing but leaves." And the fate of the fig-tree shows the danger they are in. This is the moral lesson taught by this incident. And a most solemn and impressive one it is too.

Questions by C. L. B.: 1. Does Eze. 8:16, have reference to the observance of the sun's day?

Such an inference might perhaps be made to appear quite plausible; but after all it would be only an inference.

2. Do Eze. 9 and Rev. 7:1-4, have reference to the same sealing?

We think so.

3. Does the work of Eze. 9, of the men with the destroying weapons refer to the seven last plagues?

So we think.

K. B. C. asks if it is right to examine candidates for church membership, or choose delegates to Conference, on the Sabbath.

Ans. The asking of the question implies doubt in the writer's mind. Then give the Sabbath the benefit of the doubt, and attend to these things on some other day.

NEW HEAVENS AND EARTH.

DR. EDWARDS, in his mis-called "Sabbath Manual," applied the prophecy of the new heavens and new earth to the gospel dispensation, and then argued that, as the former were not to be remembered, the memorial of the old creation should be set aside for the memorial of the new.

The margin of Isa. 65:17 gives a good idea of the original; it shall not be remembered as an object of desire; to "come upon the heart" means this.

Recently I was told by a man who said he "understood Hebrew as well as any man," that Isa. 66:22 is in past time, and indicates that the new heavens and earth are already made.

This is contradicted by the third chapter of second Peter, which clearly shows that they are future. But this statement is also made by those who do not accept the New Testament. Let us look, then, at this pretended criticism.

The tenses are not always so accurately marked in Hebrew as in other languages; yet there is little difficulty in determining this: Different words are used in Isa. 65:17 and 66:22 for create and make, but the construction is the same. Both are active participles; literally, am creating—am making. In such cases, when we know the action is not taking place—is not in the present—it is most natural to throw it into the future. Our version gives the future in chap. 66:22, and also in 65:17, though not with equal definiteness.

For a like instance see Gen. 6:17. Here the participle is also used. Our version says, "I do bring a flood." More literally, I am bringing; that is, am about to bring, or will bring. But by no possible construction could it be rendered, "I have brought."

The assertion that the tense is past in Isa. 66:22 or 65:17 is not correct. Our common version cannot be improved.

BE NOT DECEIVED.

IN recent writings in the papers, Bro. White has been giving us good information and wholesome advice, that which will do us good, if properly considered and acted upon. We have not followed cunningly-devised fables in coming to the faith which we as a people hold. The Lord is giving us the last invitation to the supper. He is proving us, before passing judgment upon us, to see how many he can prepare to stand the test and to receive everlasting life.

The world is hearing the last warning of the everlasting gospel. Some will be almost persuaded who will never embrace the message. Some will not only see the truth and acknowledge it, but will receive it and run well for a season; but when trial, affliction, and persecution come, they will fall back and give up the truth, and thus lose that eternal life so soon to be given to the faithful and enduring. And some who have many years had a name and a place with God's commandment-keeping people will be tested out, being self-deceived, and find at last that they have undervalued the blessing of eternal life, not being willing to crucify self and give up the present world for it, and therefore are adjudged unworthy of it. Think, O my soul, are you of this class?

There is still a little time in which all who will may make their election sure. None who will make the earnest and persevering effort need despair. The Spirit still pleads with us and for us. Our High Priest is more than willing to confess our names and blot out our sins. Who will accept of pardon on Heaven's own terms? Let all accept. R. F. COTTRELL.

THE ORION CAMP-MEETING.

THIS meeting was held Sept. 18-23 at Orion, Michigan, forty miles north of Detroit. The location was very good, the ground was dry, shade ample, good green grass, and everything pleasant. However, the railroad gave us no advantage whatever, not even a reduction of fare. Neither did it run any Sunday trains.

As the village was very small, our outside attendance was small all the time. Probably two or three hundred attended evenings, and perhaps five hundred on Sunday.

We were much disappointed also in the attendance of our people. There should have been four hundred or five hundred camped on the ground, whereas there were less than two hundred, and nearly one-half of these came Friday, and many went home Sunday. This threw a discouragement over all the meeting. It indicated a lack of interest on the part of our brethren.

A good many within twenty miles never attended at all. Evidently our brethren are losing their interest in the camp-meeting, for which we are sorry.

There were some very good things about the meeting. The preaching was done by Elds. Waggoner, Lamson, Kenyon, Corliss, Lane, and the writer. All these brethren had good freedom, and spoke well. We had some very good social meetings, one or two excellent. About thirty came forward to seek the Lord, some of whom made a very good start. Twenty-three were baptized by Bro. Corliss in a beautiful lake.

Sunday afternoon we presented the subject of the Tabernacle, toward which nearly all pledged $1.20. Then there was $180 raised for the expenses of the meeting, and pledges were taken up for the English mission. One thousand dollars was pledged and a part of it paid.

On Sunday we selected five brethren and five sisters, with two little children, the most active we could find on the ground, to canvass for our periodicals. Part of them went among our own brethren and a part among the outside crowd.

Nearly every one had some measure of success. Something like forty subscribers were obtained for our periodicals. Such an effort should be made at every camp-meeting. We had a supply of our small tracts, which were distributed among the crowd on Sunday. Twenty-five hundred pages were eagerly taken; also many copies of our periodicals.

We were overtaken by a very severe gale and hail storm, which did our large tent much damage. Otherwise the weather was good.

D. M. CANRIGHT.

CONFUSION ON THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

ON the presentation of the Sabbath truth at Cabot, a goodly number followed the example of David as recorded in Psalms 119:60, while others waited to hear the other side. And if error on the Sabbath question were not a hydra-headed monster, we should say, They have had a chance to hear all sides by the present time.

The Congregationalist minister preached a sermon for the benefit of his hearers one Sunday in the forenoon after we left there. In the p. m. of the same day, Eld. Forrest, Methodist minister, of the same village, preached on the Sabbath question. He taught, in harmony with the Methodist discipline, that the ten commandments are all binding, that the first day should be kept by Christians, though the fourth commandment requires no definite day further than the day following any six days of labor. This, of course, set the matter at rest with those that loved to have it so.

Within one mile of there, the same day, Eld. Thurber set the question at rest among the Adventist brethren, or tried to, coming to the desired point in altogether another way. He taught the abolition of the ten commandments and the existence of the Sunday Sabbath. So to a class, both Bro. Forrest and Bro. Thurber have it right, and we are wrong, notwithstanding we hold to the perpetuity of the law of God as a whole, just as do the Methodists.

But if there was any lack in the total destruction of the law of God, up to a few days prior to our leaving Marshfield, it may be said to have been accomplished here at that time, if it could be done. Eld. Morse, a professed Adventist, came to town to instruct the people. His attack upon "the old dead law" was "dreadful and terrible," devouring and breaking in pieces, and stamping it under his feet. Why should this minister, who is a member of the Christian denomination, feel so terribly about the law, and why talk so loftily about it? What harm has it ever done him?

He affirmed that the Sabbath could not be traced this side of the birth of Christ, as the generation of the Jews there ran out. Between this period and the cross, five of the commandments were re-enacted. Matt. 19:18, 19. He said that Christ here told the young man all that is necessary to salvation. Christ said nothing about the Sabbath, hence this was not binding. The elder did not observe that Christ said nothing about first-day keeping, hence that could not be binding.

Then again the law was abolished at the cross, and finally Paul takes the law and in his letter to the Romans shows that it is abolished. Now it seems the carnal mind might rest; for since that no law has been given.

But in spite of all the contradictory positions of the first-day supporters, this charitable institution, which "beareth all things," lives. It lives, whether the ten commandments are all abolished or are all binding. Like an overdosed and over-drugged patient, who lives notwithstanding the efforts of physicians, so lives the Sunday Sabbath, notwithstanding the strange work of the doctors of divinity to support it. Everywhere and always, without respect to the reign of darkness, error, and confusion, the venerable day of the sun rears its head and cries, Behold I am here. When will ministers learn that "the priest's lips should keep knowledge"? A. S. HUTCHINS.

God give us men! A time like this demands Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands.

Men whom the lusts of office do not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue,
And face his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog,
In public duty, and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds, Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Goodness weeps, Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps.

unsound. 15. The ten commandments are all binding. 16. The Sabbath is a shadow; don't linger in it. 17. The change came gradually, being made by Christian emperors (Constantine was cited). 18. It was left for them to select any day they chose, and they finally chose Sunday. 19. A Sunday law would be a good thing, and we ought to have one. 20. The testimony of the fathers settles it forever.

IOWA.

Toledo, Feb. 11.—I leave in this place, as the result of labor here, five who are keeping the "Sabbath of the Lord our God," seven almost decided who express a firm determination to continue the investigation till the Bible evidence on the question is clear to them, and many others favorably impressed. This is the field where B. F. Snook made his great blunder; and the minds of the people were more terribly prejudiced against present truth than in any other place I have ever labored. Most arrogant contempt was exhibited by all the churches, and especially by the pastors of the place, of whom there are five.

I now return to Kansas, praying God to keep this little company through grace unto salvation when the dear Lord shall come. Those taking hold of this work are the most influential and devoted of the Baptist church.

GEO. H. ROGERS.

Sigourney, Afton, and State Center.—Our meetings in Sigourney have already been mentioned in the report of the T. and M. Institute. The Sabbath school was quite interesting. They have black-board illustrations each Sabbath. The brethren here take a club of thirty copies of the Signs. They formerly had a V. M. society, but as their few copies of the Signs are used up by those paying for them, an organized society was deemed unnecessary. Owing to the hard times, the brethren being mostly poor, they did not feel able to enlarge their club. We hope, however, that before long they will be able to do so, and to procure maps for their Sabbath-school. They seem anxious to do all they can.

Eld. McCoy and myself were in Afton the first four days in February. The brethren here are much scattered, but they manifested a commendable zeal in attending both day and evening meetings during the time we were there, and expressed a desire for them to continue. The time Monday and Tuesday was mostly occupied in setting before them the progress of this work, and the importance of health reform, tract and missionary work, spiritual gifts, etc. This was meat in due season. Some of the Spirit of God was in our midst. This is the poorest church, financially, I have found in Iowa, yet they took two church libraries consisting of Sister White's bound books, and fifty copies of the Signs, desiring to pay for them in canvassing for Good Health. They have an interesting Sabbath-school at this place.

We commenced meetings at State Center Friday evening, Feb. 7, and shared a degree of God's Spirit while the meetings continued. The brethren came each morning prepared to remain through the day. At noon a temporary table nearly the length of the meeting-house was arranged; and as the bread and fruit were bountifully placed upon it, we were reminded of the time when a table many miles in length will be spread, and the saints will gather around it, and Christ will come forth and serve them.

Monday was occupied in explaining the nature of the work, including the tract and missionary enterprise, etc. There was no money in their treasury; and a lively discussion with reference to "Sabbath offerings" for the Sabbath-school, took place, lasting about two hours. To show that it was morally right to make Sabbath offerings under certain circumstances for a special purpose, the Saviour's words in Matt. 12:5 were cited in connection with Num. 28:9, 10. At one time when all the offerings had been applied to the priests, and there was nothing in the treasury with which to repair the house of God, "Jehoiada the priest took a chest, and bored a hole in the lid of it, and set it beside the altar, on the right side as one cometh into the house of the Lord; and the priests which kept the door put therein all the money that was brought into the house of the Lord." 2 Kings 12:9. This was a wise provision at that time, and God's blessing followed it. See 2 Chron. 24.

This church had been taking a club of thirty copies of the Signs, but at this meeting they added over one hundred copies. They also organized a V. M. society, and purchased thirty dollars' worth of maps for their Sabbath-school. The friends manifested a desire to take hold anew in the work of the Lord. May God bless the cause in Iowa. S. N. HASKELL.

A CARD OF THANKS.

We are again, with our dear children, beneath our own roof; and we wish to express our heartfelt gratitude to those dear friends who have aided us by their contributions and cheered us by their love and sympathy. Our house is neither plastered nor furnished; but despite lacks and inconveniences our hearts go out in thankfulness, and in earnest prayer to our Heavenly Father that each of the dear friends who have aided us in our time of need may, at the glad morn of the first resurrection, receive the blissful welcome to a home in those mansions Jesus has gone to prepare.

CHAS. B. AND F. C. REYNOLDS.
North Parma, New York, Feb. 12.

WELLSVILLE, N. Y., INSTITUTE.

THIS meeting closed Sunday evening, Feb. 9, having continued two weeks and two days, including our State tract society quarterly meeting with which the exercises commenced. During this time there were held forty-five regular meetings of the Institute, the greater share of which were each two hours in length. Besides these, there were regular prayer and conference meetings each day, and thirteen sermons were preached during the session. Notwithstanding the fact that so many meetings were held, the interest continued good to the last, the steady and constant application of so many unaccustomed to study being one of the remarkable features of the Institute. The work was divided into five departments,—the tract society, the Conference, the Sabbath-school, the musical department, and the department for parliamentary practice. For each of these departments an instructor was appointed, who had the general charge and responsibility of the exercises for the time assigned to his department.

In the tract society department the Institute was organized into five districts, each having its director and district secretary, and being composed of three church societies with their librarians and membership. All the regular transactions of business, drawing publications, distributing tracts, obtaining subscribers for periodicals, writing letters, making reports, etc., etc., were carried out as actual transactions, while at the same time instruction concerning the method of keeping the proper accounts was given so that the business might be done in a systematic and thorough manner.

In the Conference department the entire membership was organized into churches, for which the proper officers were elected. Proper records of the organization were made by each church clerk; the regular church quarterly meetings were held, in which all the business pertaining to such meetings was transacted, including the payment of the tithes and one-third, receiving members, granting letters, etc., in fact, all the business actually occurring in our regular church work. Minute instructions were given on all these points, which were illustrated and enforced by the actual practice had in connection therewith.

In the S. S. department the entire Institute was organized into a school, after full instruction had been given as to how this should be done, and a practical illustration had been afforded by organizing schools in each district. It is to be hoped that this instruction, with the practical illustration of how the work should be done, will prove of great benefit to the work in this new Conference in establishing that order and system that should be seen in all these departments of the work of God.

The visit of Eld. J. N. Andrews during the last days of the session, will, we trust, prove a lasting blessing to those who were present. His earnest appeals to those who are engaged in the work to become possessed of the true missionary spirit were not without effect on the hearts of those who heard them, and we trust that our Institute will not prove a failure in this important particular, but that the work among us will be marked by more of that real spirit of zeal and devotion that should characterize so important a work as that in which we are engaged.

The brethren separated to go to their homes with a good degree of courage and determination to carry out the instruction they had received, and to labor earnestly to build up the work of God in our midst, and wherever their influence may reach. B. L. WHITNEY.

VERMONT T. AND M. MEETING.

THE session held at Wolcott Jan. 25 and 26 was opened Jan. 25 immediately at the close of the first S. S. meeting.

C. W. Stone was appointed secretary pro tem. Director present, C. F. Worthen.

Voted, That a committee be appointed by the Chair to draft resolutions for discussion. The Chair appointed C. W. Stone, R. S. Owen, A. O. Wilbur.

Adjourned to call of Chair.

SECOND MEETING, JAN. 26.

Prayer by Eld. R. S. Owen.

Committee on Resolutions reported as follows:—

Resolved, That we approve the action of the New England Conference in relation to the raising of a tract fund, and that we raise $500 by contributions to aid in that matter.

Resolved, That every director in the Vermont T. and M. Society be appointed to solicit contributions in his own district for this purpose.

Whereas, It is the duty of every member of our T. and M. Society promptly to report his labor for each quarter, and

Whereas, This duty has not been well performed, therefore

Resolved, That we urge our members to renewed energy and diligence in this matter.

Resolutions discussed and adopted one by one.

Adjourned sine die.

A STRONG lottery epidemic seems breaking out in Europe; the French Exposition has been followed by one in which all France has been interested. An effort was made to establish a lottery in Glasgow for the purpose of relieving the unfortunate shareholders of the City of Glasgow Bank. The amount collected for their relief was only about $1,800,000, and it was proposed to raise $30,000,000 by lottery. The scheme at first met with much favor, but the opposition of influential ministers and members of the Scotch churches has prevented the execution of the plan. So many other schemes of this kind have been devised for relieving shareholders of insolvent banks that the British Government has been obliged to interfere, and to threaten those engaged in them with prosecution. There would not be much danger in this threat unless there is some difference between British laws and ours; for lottery dealers here openly advertise and carry on their illegal business, in spite of indictments, right under the eyes of the District attorney.—Christian Weekly.

—ENGLAND is again in trouble on the labor question. A dispatch from Liverpool dated Feb. 10 says that the number of strikers of all classes is estimated at from 50,000 to 60,000. There have been some riots, but they were promptly suppressed.

—THE directors of the City of Glasgow Bank have been tried and convicted of falsehood, fraud, and willful imposition with intent to defraud, and also of theft and embezzlement, and they have been promptly sentenced to imprisonment.

—THE Vatican, which contains so many choice works of art, was built by Pope Symmachus and has been beautified and enlarged by subsequent popes till it is now the largest palace in the world. It contains 11,000 rooms, the greater part of which are occupied by works of art.

—THE balance-sheet of our foreign trade for last year is an encouraging one. We sold abroad merchandise to the amount of over $76,000,000, exceeding our imports by $301,540,000, while our specie imported was nearly $2,000,000 in excess of that exported.—Christian Weekly.

—ON the 22d of January a disastrous engagement occurred between a small body of British troops stationed at Rorke's Drift, Cape Colony, and an overwhelming number of Zulus. The British force was nearly or quite annihilated. Reinforcements sufficient to put down the Zulus will be promptly sent to Southern Africa.

—THERE will soon be no necessity for encountering the dangers of the St. Gothard Pass in winter. A tunnel through the mountain is being bored from Switzerland and Italy. It will be the longest tunnel in the world, having already reached 13,481 yards, and nearly 3,000 yards are still to be excavated, which will require another year.

—A PROMINENT feature in Henry Varley's new Tabernacle in Melbourne Australia, will be a large coffee-house, where eatables will be furnished at a little over cost price. The whole edifice will cost about $100,000. A "Working-man's Club" will find shelter under its roof, with reading-rooms and other ample conveniences.

—A DECIDED change has come over the morals of New England within the last decade. It used to be that that section of the Union was noted for its morality, and for the model deportment of its people. Occasionally a brutal murder was committed there, but such crimes were of rare occurrence. Of late years this happy state of affairs has undergone a marked change. Murders attempts at murder, poisonings, wife-beatings, burglaries, embezzlements, etc., have prevailed to an extent that is absolutely shocking, and which takes from New England all right to claim its pre-eminent morality.—Pitts. Star.

—It is a startling fact that in a single year fifty American preachers should have been found guilty of crimes or misdemeanors by the secular courts. The list of these reverend offenders, printed by the Cincinnati Commercial, is an interesting contribution to the statistics of 1878, and deserves the serious attention of the class chiefly concerned. Naturally the larger denominations furnish more black sheep than the smaller ones; thirteen of the fifty were Methodists, and eleven Baptists.

—A CORRESPONDENT sends the following item concerning the dark day, clipped from the Grand Rapids Eagle: "An old lady living on the little Colorado, says the Arizona Miner, who has attained to the comfortable old age of 128 years, was 30 years of age at the time of the dark day, of which she has a vivid recollection, and she recalls many interesting incidents which took place with her people, the Spanish, and also the Indians, who were more superstitious. The Spaniards buried all their saints, of which they had a goodly number, while the Indians took to feasting on dogs and other animals."

—IN St. Petersburg, Russia, there is general unhealthiness and predisposition to epidemic. In the government of Tver typhus fever and small-pox are increasing in an alarming manner. Of 2,000 head of cattle attacked by the cattle plague in the vicinity of Ekatermoslav, half have perished. Small-pox, the plague, and an unknown epidemic, have broken out in several other localities. The St. Petersburg Golos says that several hundreds of bodies of those who died from the plague in Astrachan last December are still unburied. The Russian army in the Balkan peninsula suffers much from spotted typhus. The President of the Board of Health at Rome predicts that if the plague enters Europe it will destroy one-third of the population.

—THE following extract shows what suffering prevails in the beautiful and fertile regions of Alsace and Lorraine: "From all parts we hear the same cry of desolation. Misery exists everywhere, and business has come to an end. The economical crisis which has generally affected Europe has not spared our country; trade languishes, and purses are closed. The same cause which leads to economy in high circles produces want a degree lower, and starvation lower still; and all this occurs at a moment when winter brings to the poor its ordinary increase of suffering and sorrow. Some time ago we stated that the Charitable Society of Strasburg had 3,200 families on its books, and this is now the case throughout Alsace-Lorraine, where the people are suffering as much as in the neighboring countries. In Lorraine it is stated that there never existed so much distress, and that there is every appearance of its being aggravated by the continuance of winter."

DIED of lung fever, in Defiance, Ohio, Jan. 9, 1879, Bro. Elisha F., son of C. G. Daniels, aged 28 years, 4 months, and 3 days. He was one of the members of the Defiance church when it was first organized by Eld. I. D. Van Horn in 1870. Much of the time during his short and painful sickness was spent in seeking a nearness to God. He expressed great anxiety to unite in prayer with myself and wife. We arrived there about one o'clock p. m., and had a sweet season of prayer, during which his responses expressed a confident hope that all was well. At the close of the exercises he responded, "Amen," and in about five minutes sweetly fell asleep in Jesus. He was loved and respected by all who knew him. WM. F. CROUS.

DIED of diphtheria, Feb. 6, 1879, at DuQuoin, Ill., James Stanhouse, aged 38 years, 7 months, and 27 days. Our dear brother embraced the truth last August under the labors of Brn. Colcord and Bliss, and he has since been a devoted, earnest worker in the cause of God. Funeral discourse by the writer, from Job 14:14. We miss the counsel and influence of our brother. C. H. FOSTER.

DIED of bilious pneumonia, in Matherton, Mich., Jan. 17, 1879, my mother, Mrs. A. C. Kellogg, wife of Leander Kellogg, in the 59th year of her age. We mourn for her but believe she sleeps in Jesus. Funeral discourse by Eld. Jordon, M. E. from 2 Tim. 4:6-8. E. BAINE.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

BY ELD. JAMES WHITE.

TEXT.—Can ye not discern the signs of the times? Matt. 16:3.

OUR Lord asked the Pharisees and Sadducees this question at a time when they came to him tempting him for a sign from Heaven. It was a reproof to them for their unbelief in the signs mentioned in the Old-Testament writings, which they professed to believe, and which were actually being fulfilled before their eyes, yet disregarded by them. They could tell the weather for the morrow, but had no skill in those prophecies that pointed to that time. "When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather, for the sky is red; and in the morning, It will be foul weather to-day, for the sky is red and lowering. O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?"

That which constitutes a sign of the times, in a scriptural sense, must be a matter of prophecy. The prophetic pencil sketches that which shall take place in the political and religious worlds. Time shows the fulfillment. The student of prophecy compares the prophetic sketch with the facts of history, and, finding a perfect agreement, he sees his position on the great highway of time. The prophets of God had spoken of the first advent of Christ; and the fulfillment of their words relative to his birth, his gospel, his miracles, his humiliation and death, were signs to the Jews that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah.

SIGNS OF THE FIRST ADVENT.

1. Christ was born of a virgin, Matt. 1:18--25, spoken of in Isa. 7:14.

2. Bethlehem was his birthplace, Matt. 2:1, mentioned in Micah 5:2.

3. The act of Herod in slaying all the children in Bethlehem, from two years old and under, Matt. 2:16, 18, prophesied of in Jer. 31:15.

4. His forerunner, John. "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord." Isa. 40:3. All Judea and Jerusalem saw this sign when they went out to be baptized of John. Matt. 3:1--6.

5. The gospel preached. When Jesus stood up in the synagogue to read, he opened the book and read where it is written, Isa. 61:1, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings." The eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened upon him. And he said unto them, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." Luke 4:16--21.

6. His humility when on trial. "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth. He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." Isa. 53:7.

7. The manner and circumstances of his death. "They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and a roaring lion. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint. My heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. My strength is dried up like a potsherd; and my tongue cleaveth to my jaws; and thou hast brought me into the dust of death. For dogs have compassed me; the assembly of the wicked have inclosed me. They pierced my hands and my feet. I may tell all my bones; they look and stare upon me. They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture." Ps. 22:13--18. "Reproach hath broken my heart; and I am full of heaviness; and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none. They gave me also gall for my meat; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink." Ps. 69:20, 21. These prophecies had an exact and literal accomplishment at the crucifixion of Christ, and the Jews saw it. Read Matt. 27:35; John 19:28--30.

8. The fulfillment of the seventy weeks of Dan. 9:24--27. The Jews understood this, or might have understood it. Caiaphas, being high priest that year, said to them, "Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this spake he not of himself; but being high priest that year, he prophesied [or taught the prophecies] that Jesus should die for that nation; and not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad." John 11:49--52. We might add to these signs the miracles of Christ, his resurrection, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the day of pentecost, and still others which were distinctly spoken of by the prophets.

But notwithstanding the fulfillment of these prophecies before the faces of the rulers of the Jews, and all these signs were actually accomplished in a little more than thirty years, and they themselves had to acknowledge that notable miracles had been done by our Lord, yet they believed not. Well may it be said by this generation, that the Jews deserved wrath, and God was just in destroying their nation and place. But are they less guilty of the sin of unbelief than the Jews were? Do they believe in that Word which they blame the Jews for rejecting?

The Jews were looking for a temporal kingdom. They applied many of the prophecies of Christ's second appearing in power and great glory to his coming as a prince to deliver them from the Roman yoke, and exalt them to worldly glory. They were disappointed and grieved with the humility of Jesus of Nazareth, and in their pride rejected the signs of his first advent. The popular professors of our day as a body are looking for a temporal millennium, and overlook the signs of his second advent, which are much more numerous and forcible than those of his first advent. Then if the signs of Christ's second coming are held in doubt, and are rejected by the professed people of God of this generation, the sin of unbelief will rest upon them heavier than it did upon the Jews, in proportion as they reject greater light.

Can anything be known relative to the period of Christ's second coming is a question unsettled in many minds. We accept the Bible as a revelation from Heaven. What God has revealed in that book let no man call a mystery, or a secret of the Almighty. "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children forever." Deut. 29:29. If the sacred Scriptures do not designate any period in particular for the second appearing of Christ, then men should no longer search for proof of his soon coming. But if prophecy, in a most clear and harmonious manner, does point to the period of that great event, and if there is evidence that "it is near, even at the doors," the subject at once assumes very grave importance.

When the disciples inquired, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Jesus did not reprove them for inquiring into that which was purposely hidden from all men; but he answered that question in the most definite manner. He even stated that there should be signs of that event in the sun, in the moon, and in the stars; and adds, "When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." The simple fact that the Lord mentions signs of his second advent, is the best proof possible that his people were not to remain ignorant of the relative nearness of the event. Add to this evidence his declaration that when these signs should be seen, his people should know that it was near, even at the doors, and the case becomes an exceedingly strong one.

Prophecy is history in advance. From the very nature of the case Daniel could not understand his own prophecy, which related to those kingdoms which were to exist. When the prophet inquires: "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things," Gabriel answers: "Go thy way, Daniel, for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end." Dan. 12:8, 9. To this agrees the apostle who speaks of the prophets, "Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister." 1 Pet. 1:12. We will now consider the subject of the signs of our times in the light of the fulfillment of prophecy.

SIGNS OF THE SECOND ADVENT.

1. Daniel, second chapter. The second chapter of Daniel's prophecy has to do with five universal kingdoms which were to succeed each other. The first four are earthly and perishable; the fifth is immortal and will stand forever.

The first four kingdoms are represented by the several parts of the great metallic image, of gold, silver, brass and iron mixed with clay. The golden head represents the kingdom of Babylon; the silver breast and arms of the image represent Media and Persia; the brazen sides, Grecia; the iron legs, Rome; the feet and toes, part of iron and part of clay, symbolize the divided, weakened condition of Rome.

The several specifications of this line of prophecy are fulfilled, excepting the last, which is expressed in these words: "Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them; and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth." Dan. 2:34.

2. Daniel, seventh chapter. The seventh chapter of this prophecy covers the same ground as the second. The symbols employed are a lion, a bear, a leopard, and a nameless beast with ten horns. The lion, like the golden head of the image, represents Babylon; the bear, like the silver breast and arms, Media and Persia; the leopard, like the brazen sides, Grecia; the nondescript beast, the same as the iron legs, Rome. His ten horns, the same as the ten toes of the image, the present condition of the Roman empire, divided into ten kingdoms.

This line of prophecy, however, is more definite than that of the second chapter, especially that which relates to the fourth kingdom. The Roman beast is given in a second form with three horns plucked up by a little horn. This little horn is a symbol of the papacy, through whose influence three of the ten kingdoms were subdued in its onward march up to complete supremacy, A. D. 538. The blasphemous character, cruel persecutions, and the period of the civil power of the little horn are given by the prophet in these words:—

"And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." Dan. 7:25. This period is the same as the forty-two months of Rev. 13:5, and the twelve hundred and sixty prophetic days of Rev. 12:6. From 538, 1260 years would extend to 1798, when, on Feb. 10, Berthier a French general, entered the city of Rome and took it. On the 15th of the same month, the pope was taken prisoner and shut up in the Vatican. The Papal government, which had continued from the time of Justinian, was abolished, and a republican form of government given to Rome. The pope was carried captive to France, where he died in 1799. Thus, he that led into captivity went into captivity; he that killed with the sword was killed (subdued) with the sword. Rev. 13:10.

Where are we in this prophetic line which reaches to the end of all earthly governments? We have passed the lion, Babylon; the bear, Media and Persia; the leopard, with his four wings and four heads, Grecia, has been passed. The history of the terrible beast, Rome, has been written; and the papacy, symbolized by the little horn, has fulfilled its twelve hundred and sixty years of blasphemy and terrible persecutions; and its civil power was taken away eighty-two years since.

For what do we wait? The prophet answers in these words: "I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." Dan. 7:11. "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Verse 27.

3. Daniel, chapter eight. The eighth chapter of Daniel presents a third prophetic line, embracing a ram with two horns, a symbol of the kingdom of Media and Persia; a goat with a notable horn, Grecia, with Alexander for its first king. The four horns taking the place of the one, represents the division of Alexander's kingdom after his death. And the little horn which waxed exceeding great, which stood up against the Prince of princes, representing Jesus Christ at his crucifixion, is Rome. This "power" being "broken without hands," represents its destruction at the second coming of Christ, when the man of sin, a symbol of the same power, 2 Thess. 2:3-8, will be consumed by the spirit of Christ's mouth, and be destroyed by the brightness of his coming.

4. Daniel, chapter eleven. In the eleventh chapter of this prophecy, the same ground is again covered by historic prophecy, reaching down to the standing up of Michael, or the reign of Christ, the great time of trouble, the deliverance of the saints, and the resurrection of the dead. This chain of prophecy terminates with these words: "And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever," Dan. 12:1-3, carrying us out into the boundless ocean of eternity. With this view of the subject, how forcible the words of Gabriel to Daniel, "I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days." Dan. 10:14.

5. The dark day of May 19, 1780. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. 24:29.

The tribulation here mentioned is that which was upon the church of Christ for 1260 years, during the persecuting career of the little horn of Dan. 7:25. Compare with Rev. 12:6; 13:5. Then immediately, after the tribulation of those days of papal persecution, the sun was to be darkened. Mark this: It does not say after those days; but after the tribulation of those days. The days reached to 1798, eighteen years this side of the dark day; but the tribulation of the days ceased before the sun was darkened in 1780. The days of tribulation were shortened for the elect's sake. Matt. 24:22. The reformation under Martin Luther modified this tribulation, and continued to restrain the rage and consume the power of the papacy until 1700, since which time, according to all church history, there has been no general persecution against the church. Mark 13:24, makes this point very plain: "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened." That is, before the 1260 years should close, but after the tribulation, or martyrdom, of the church ceased, the sun was darkened. Those who would point to the future, or to the past, prior to the eighteenth century, for the darkening of the sun here mentioned, will do well to read again Mark 13:24: "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened."

"A something strikingly awful shall forewarn that the world will come to an end, and that the last day is even at the door."—Martin Luther.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when all faces seemed to gather blackness, and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived,—men's hearts failing them for fear that the Judgment day was at hand. The neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society.—Life of Edwards.

"The 19th day of May, 1780, was a remarkably dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent, and disappeared. The fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of Judgment was at hand. The legislature of Connecticut was in session, at Hartford, but being unable to transact business, adjourned.—President Dwight in (Ct.) Historical Collections.

"ANNIVERSARY OF THE DARK DAY.—The dark day, May 19, 1780, is thus described by Mr. Stone, in his history of Beverly: 'The sun rose clear, but soon assumed a brassy hue. About 10 o'clock, A. M., it became unusually dark. The darkness continued to increase till about one o'clock, when it began to decrease. During this time, candles became necessary. The birds disappeared and were silent, the fowls went to their roosts, the cocks crew as at daybreak, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens was great.'"—Portsmouth Journal, May 20, 1843.

From Robert Sears' Guide to Knowledge, published in New York, 1844, we extract the following: "On the 19th of May, 1780, an uncommon darkness took place all over New England, and extended to Canada. It continued about fourteen hours, or from ten o'clock in the morning till midnight. The darkness was so great that people were unable to read common print, or tell the time of the day by their watches, or to dine, or transact their ordinary business, without the light of candles. They became dull and gloomy, and some were excessively frightened. The fowls went to roost. Objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance, and everything bore the appearance of gloom and night. Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in the degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown. They certainly were not the result of eclipses."

6. The dark night of May 19, 1780. "And the moon shall not give her light." Matt. 24:29.

"The moon shines with a borrowed light; and, therefore, if the sun from whom she borrows her light is turned into darkness, she must fail, of course, and become bankrupt."—Matthew Henry.

"The night succeeding that day (May 19, 1780,) was of such pitchy darkness that, in some instances, horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service. About midnight, the clouds were dispersed, and the moon and stars appeared with unimpaired brilliancy."—Portsmouth Journal, May 20, 1843.—Extract from Stone's History of Beverly.

Mr. Tenny, of Exeter, N. H., speaking of the dark day and dark night of May 19, 1780, says:

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."

Dr. Adams, speaking of the dark night, says:

"At nine, it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening, got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night as it was in the day, as the moon had fulfilled the day before."

7. The falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833. "And the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. 24:29. We here give an extract from an article written by Henry Dana Ward, published in the Journal of Commerce, Nov. 15, 1833:

"At the cry, 'Look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the east lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the north, and the west also, showed the falling stars, in the very image of one thing, and only one, I ever heard of. I called to my wife to behold; and while robing, she exclaimed, 'See how the stars fall!' I replied, 'That is the wonder!' and we felt in our hearts that it was a sign of the last days; for, truly, 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. 6:13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday, it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by aster, in Greek, and stella, in Latin, the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore the idea of the prophet, as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomenon of yesterday."

"And how did they fall? Neither myself, nor one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted."

"The stars fell 'even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet. The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one; those which appeared in the east fell toward the east; those which appeared in the north fell toward the north; those which appeared in the west fell toward the west; and those which appeared in the south—for I went out of my residence into the Park—fell toward the south. And they fell not as the ripe fruit falls—far from it; but they flew, they were cast, like the unripe fruit, which at first refuses to leave the branch; and when, under a violent pressure, it does break its hold, it flies swiftly, straight off, descending; and in the multitude's falling, some cross the track of others, as they are thrown with more or less force, but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house."

Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, says:—

"The extent of the shower of 1833 was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the east, to the Pacific on the west; and from the northern coast of South America, to undefined regions among the British possessions on the north, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance."

The Rockingham (Va.) Register called it "A rain of fire,"—thousands of stars being seen at once; some said it began with considerable noise.

We now inquire, Why has Christ given the church these signs in the luminaries of heaven of his second coming? Are they given to deceive and lead the honest Christian to look for Christ's coming, when nothing can be known of the period of that event? Preposterous! The fact that Christ foretells signs of his coming, and then states the object of those signs, that the church may know when the event is near, even at the doors, is sufficient proof that it is the design of Heaven that the church should understand the period of the second advent.

After stating that the sun should be darkened, and that the moon should not give her light, and that the stars should fall from heaven, Christ gives the parable of the fig-tree, and makes the most distinct application of it. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." Verses 32, 33. No figure should exceed the fact illustrated in a single particular. This being the case in the parable of the fig-tree, the point becomes an exceedingly strong one. No language can be more direct. No proof can be more complete. With all that certainty with which we know that summer is nigh when we see the buds and the leaves shoot forth from the trees in spring, and the earth covered with her carpet of green, may we know that Christ is at the doors. The most daring unbelief will hardly venture to deny these words of the Son of God, and assert that nothing can be known of the period of his second coming.

The proclamation of the coming and kingdom of Christ is given to the last generation. God did not send Noah to preach to the next to the last generation before the flood, but to the last. The very generation which was destroyed by the waters of the flood saw Noah build the ark, and heard his warning voice. So God has raised up men to give the solemn warning to the world at the right time to give force to the warning. And the very generation of men that live after the three great signs are fulfilled, and who hear and reject the warning message from Heaven, will drink the cup of the unmingled wrath of God. And those of this very generation who receive the message, suffer disappointments, and endure the trials of the waiting position, will witness the coming of Christ, and exclaim, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us." Isa. 25:9.

With what emphasis our Lord gave utterance to this sentiment. It is a rebuke upon our unbelief. As we read it, God help us to believe it: "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." And as though this were not enough to lead us to unwavering faith, he adds these forcible words: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—No. 2.

BY ELI. JAMES WHITE.

TEXT.—Can ye not discern the signs of the times? Matt. 16:3.

8. The seven seals of the sixth chapter of Revelation. John saw a book in the right hand of Him that sat on the throne, sealed with seven seals. Books in the days of the prophet, before the art of printing and binding was discovered, were rolls of parchment. "The usual books of the ancients were not like ours, but were volumes, or long pieces of parchment, rolled upon a long stick as we frequently roll silks. Such was this represented which was sealed with seven seals. Not as if the apostle saw all the seals at once; for there were seven volumes wrapped up one within another, each of which was sealed; so that upon opening and unrolling the first, the second appeared to be sealed up till that was opened, and so on to the seventh."—Wesley.

"It appeared as a roll, consisting of several parchments, according to the custom of those times; and though it was supposed to be written within, yet nothing could be read till the seals were loosed. It was afterward found to contain seven parchments, or small volumes, each of which was separately sealed; but if all the seals had been on the outside, nothing could have been read till they had all been loosed; whereas the loosing of each seal was followed by some discovery of the contents of the roll. Yet the appearance on the outside seems to have indicated that it consisted of seven, or at least of several parts."—Scott.

Here we have a figure of the nature of prophecy, and a special symbol of the prophetic history of the Christian church. The book of Revelation relates to the fourth universal empire, and particularly to that portion of the Christian age that was future when the book was given. He, alone, who sees the end from the beginning, could survey the future of the church and present her history to the prophet in seven distinct periods, illustrated by the seven seals. Therefore the Revelation was a sealed book when given to John, to be opened and understood as fulfilled. Of the number seven, Dr. Adam Clarke says:—

"The priest in his consecration was to abide seven days and nights at the door of the tabernacle, keeping the Lord's watch. The number seven is what is called among the Hebrews a number of perfection; and it is often used to denote the completion, accomplishment, fullness, or perfection, of a thing, as this period contained the whole course of that time in which God created the world, and appointed the day of rest. As this act of consecration lasted seven days, it signified a perfect consecration; and intimated to the priest that his whole body and soul, his time and talents, should be devoted to the service of God and his people."

"SEVEN. The way in which this number comes before us on many occasions in Scripture is very remarkable, and suggests that it must have had some hidden or typical significance. The present constitution of nature is recorded to have been made in six days, followed by a seventh day, in which God rested, and which he blessed and sanctified forever. Gen. 2:2, 3.

"The division of time into weeks of seven days each originated in this great event; and the hallowing of the Sabbath in the fourth commandment finds its reason herein: 'For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore, the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it.' Ex. 20:11. In the patriarchal history, as well as in the Mosaic legislation, the recurrence of the number seven and its combinations is very frequent. Even in the later Old-Testament history this number is met with too often for it to be always accidental. The repetition of the same number and of its multiples in the New Testament has also been observed. Seven has been called the symbol of perfection and the symbol of rest. But whether this is certainly correct or not, we may safely say with Mr. Wemyss: 'Jacob's seven years' service to Laban; Pharaoh's seven fat oxen and seven lean ones; the seven branches of the golden candlestick; the seven trumpets, and the seven priests who sounded them; the seven days' siege of Jericho; the seven churches, seven spirits, seven stars, seven seals, seven vials, and many others, sufficiently prove the importance of this sacred number.'—Key to Symbolical Language of Scripture. Jews, Pagans, and Christians have vied with each other in attempts to prove the mysterious character of this number. The estimation in which it was held, on account of its singularly sacred character, may explain its adoption as a sort of representative number. Of this last use of the term seven, instances occur in the following texts: Lev. 25:4; 1 Sam. 2:5; Ps. 12:6; 79:12; Prov. 26:16; Isa. 4:1; Matt. 18:21, 22; Luke 17:4."—Cassell's Bible Dictionary, vol. i.

We briefly call attention to the events under each of the seven seals in their order.

(1.) The opening of the first seal reveals a white horse, whose rider had a bow and a crown as he went forth conquering and to conquer. This is a fit emblem of the triumphs of the gospel in the first centuries of this dispensation, the whiteness of the horse denoting the purity of faith in that age.

(2.) At the opening of the second seal, there appeared a red horse. If the whiteness of the first horse denoted the purity of the gospel in the first period, the redness of the second horse may denote that in the second period the original purity of the church began to be corrupted. The mystery of iniquity was at work in Paul's day. Errors began to arise, and the love of the world came in at an early date, which ripened into a state of things in Constantine's time, A. D. 323, described by Dr. Rice thus: "It represents a secular period, or union of church and State. Constantine aided the clergy, and put them under obligations to him. Mosheim says of this period, 'There was continual war and trouble.'"

(3.) The opening of the third seal presented a black horse, and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. The work of corruption in the church progressed rapidly. The black horse, the very opposite of the first, represents a period of great darkness and moral corruption. By the events of the second seal, the way was fully opened for that state of things to be brought about which is here presented. The time that intervened between the reign of Constantine and the establishment of the papacy in A. D. 538, may be justly noted as the time when the darkest errors and grossest superstitions sprung up in the church.

"The balances denoted that religion and civil power would be united in the person who would administer the executive power in the government, and that he would claim the judicial authority both in church and State. This was true among the Roman emperors from the days of Constantine until the reign of Justinian, when he gave the same judicial power to the bishop of Rome."—Miller's Lectures, p. 181.

(4.) When the fourth seal was opened, there appeared a pale horse, and his name that sat on him was called Death, and Hell followed with him. The color of this horse, which is pale or yellowish, like that seen in blighted or sickly plants, denotes the condition of things in the church when the papacy bore its unrestrained and persecuting rule, commencing about A. D. 538, and extending to the time when the reformers had exposed the corruptions of the papal system. During that period fifty millions of martyrs lost their lives by the very instrumentalities named in the prophetic description of that period.

(5.) The events to transpire under the fifth seal are, the crying of the martyrs for vengeance, and giving to them white robes. This represents the work of the reformers, and covers the period of the great reformation. In reference to the souls under the altar, Dr. Clarke says: "A symbolical vision was exhibited in which he saw an altar. And under it the souls of those who had been slain for the word of God—martyred for their attachment to Christianity—are represented as being newly slain, as victims to idolatry and superstition. The altar is upon earth, not in Heaven."

A. Barnes makes the following remarks in reference to this subject:—

"We are not to suppose that this literally occurred, and that John actually saw the souls of the martyrs beneath the altars—for the whole representation is symbolical; nor are we to suppose that the injured and the wronged in Heaven actually pray for vengeance on those who wronged them, or that the redeemed in Heaven will continue to pray with reference to things on the earth; but it may be fairly inferred from this that there will be as real a remembrance of the wrongs of the persecuted, the injured, and the oppressed, as if such prayer were offered there; and that the oppressor has as much to dread from the divine vengeance as if those whom he has injured should cry in Heaven to the God who hears prayer; and who takes vengeance. The wrongs done to the children of God, to the orphan, the widow, the down-trodden, to the slave and the outcast, will be as certainly remembered in Heaven as if they who are wronged should plead for vengeance there; for every act of injustice and oppression goes to Heaven and pleads for vengeance. Every persecutor should dread the death of the persecuted as if he went to Heaven to plead against him; every cruel master should dread the death of his slave that is crushed by wrongs; every seducer should dread the death and the cries of his victim; every one who does wrong in any way should remember that the sufferings of the injured cry to Heaven with a martyr's pleadings, saying, 'How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood?' For a full exposition of this subject, read Thoughts on the Revelation, by Elder U. Smith. Address, REVIEW AND HERALD, Battle Creek, Mich.

Such are the solemn and sublime scenes that transpire under the sixth seal. And a thought well calculated to awaken in every heart an intense interest in divine things, is the consideration that we are now living amid the momentous events of this seal.

Between the fifth and sixth seals there seems to be a sudden and entire change in the language, from the highly figurative to the strictly literal. Whatever may be the cause of this change, the change itself cannot well be denied. By no principle of interpretation can the language of the preceding seals be made to be literal; nor can the language of this any more easily be made to be figurative.

The first event under this seal, perhaps the one which marks its opening, is a great earthquake. As the more probable fulfillment of this prediction, we refer to the great earthquake of Nov. 1, 1755. Of this earthquake, Sears in his "Wonders of the World," pp. 50, 58, 381, says:—

"The great earthquake of Nov. 1, 1755, extended over a tract of at least 4,000,000 of square miles. Its effects were even extended to the waters in many places where the shocks were not perceptible. It pervaded the greater portion of Europe, Africa, and America; but its extreme violence was exercised on the southwestern part of the former. In Africa this earthquake was felt almost as severely as it had been in Europe. A great part of Algiers was destroyed. Many houses were thrown down at Fez and Mequinez, and multitudes were buried beneath the ruins. Similar effects were realized at Morocco. Its effects were likewise felt at Tangiers, at Tetuan, at Funchal in the island of Madeira. It is probable that all Africa was shaken. At the north it extended to Norway and Sweden. Germany, Holland, France, Great Britain, and Ireland were all more or less agitated by the same great commotion of the elements. Lisbon (Portugal), previous to the earthquake in 1755, contained 150,000 inhabitants. Mr. Barretti says that 90,000 persons are supposed to have been lost on that fatal day."

On page 200 of the same work, we again read: "The terror of the people was beyond description. Nobody wept—it was beyond tears—they ran hither and thither, delirious with horror and astonishment, beating their faces and breasts, crying, 'Misericordia, the world's at an end!' Mothers forgot their children, and ran about loaded with crucified images. Unfortunately many ran to the churches for protection; but in vain was the sacrament exposed; in vain did the poor creatures embrace the altars; images, priests, and people were buried in one common ruin."

The Encyclopedia Americana states that this earthquake extended also to Greenland; and of its effects upon the city of Lisbon, further says: "The city then contained about 150,000 inhabitants. The shock was instantly followed by the fall of every church and convent, almost all the large public buildings, and more than one-fourth of the houses. In about two hours after the shock, fires broke out in different quarters, and raged with such violence, for the space of nearly three days, that the city was completely desolated. The earthquake happened on a holy-day, when the churches and convents were full of people, very few of whom escaped."

The events which follow the great earthquake under the sixth seal are the special signs, in the sun, moon, and stars, of the second coming of Christ. The dark day and dark night of 1780 is described in these words: "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood." The moon that was full the day before, appeared through the darkness of the night like a ball of blood. This was the appearance as presented to the prophet. Christ, speaking of these signs, says, "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." The Concord [N. H.] People speaks of the dark day, May 19, 1780, thus:—

"It was not the blackness of a storm-cloud, such as sometimes with a frightful agitation breaks over a single city; it was the silent spreading of the pall cloth over the earth by strong, invisible hands."

"The dark day, May 19, 1780, so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day, extending over all New England. In some places persons could not see to read common print in the open air for several hours together. The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known."—Webster's Dictionary, edition for 1869.

The prophetic description of the falling of the stars met a literal fulfillment in the meteoric shower of Nov. 13, 1833, which was unlike any other on record in appearance, extent, and magnitude. The falling stars is the last special sign upon which believers base their faith in the near second advent. The departing of the atmospheric heaven is after the close of probation. This seems evident from the fact that the affrighted multitudes in despair of the mercy of the Lord, direct their cries to mountains and rocks to fall on them and hide them from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb.

While the book of Daniel has to do with four universal monarchies, Babylon, Persia, Grecia, and Rome, and its several chains of prophecy bring us, with wonderful definiteness, to the day of God, the second coming of Christ, and the last Judgment, the book of Revelation pertains to the fourth, Rome, and its several lines of prophecy bring us down, with the same minuteness, to the same point, and open before us the naked glare of eternal scenes.

9. The seven churches. The messages to the seven churches of the second and third chapters of Revelation are prophetic, and are addressed to the Christians of the seven periods of the Christian age. The following are some of our reasons for taking this position, which differs from the popular view that these addresses are a simple narrative of facts as they existed in seven of the churches in Asia, in John's day:—

(1.) The entire book of Revelation is addressed to the seven churches. "I, Jesus, have sent mine angel to testify these things in the churches." "What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches." Chaps. 1:3, 11, 19; 22:16, 18, 19.

(2.) Most of the book relates to events then in the future, with which the Christians of John's day had no connection whatever.

(3.) The seven addresses of the second and third chapters of Revelation were no more applicable to the Christians in Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, than to the other churches in Asia Minor, or those of any other country.

(4.) The grand design of the book of Revelation is to foretell future events, with which the church should be connected in the Christian age. "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass." Chap. 1:1. In a few instances, past and present events are mentioned in this book, as in chap. 12:1-5, but in all such cases the past and present are alluded to only to introduce future events, which in every case are the burden of the prophecy.

(5.) The seven addresses to the churches do have a fitness to seven periods of the Christian age, while the harmony of revelation and reason forbid the application of some portions of the seven addresses to the Christians of John's day.

The view that the seven messages are prophetic has prevailed extensively among Biblical expositors of the past, but has been rejected by those who have received the modern doctrine of the temporal millennium, which makes the last state of the church the most glorious, and not properly described by the address to the church of the Laodiceans.

We give the extracts that follow, from Newton, Scott, and Henry, as proof that many able expositors of the past have held that the seven churches of Asia represent seven periods and states of the Christian church. Benson quotes Bishop Newton as saying: "Many contend, and among them such learned men as More and Vitranga, that the seven epistles are prophetic of so many successive periods and states of the church, from the beginning to the conclusion of all. But there are in these epistles several innate characters, which are peculiar to the church of that age, and cannot be so well applied to the church of any other age. Besides other arguments, there is also this plain reason: The last state of the church is described in this very book as the most glorious of all, but in the last state in these epistles, that of Laodicea, the church is represented as wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

The Comprehensive Commentary says: "Many expositors have imagined that these epistles to the seven churches were mystical prophecies of seven distinct periods, into which the whole term, from the apostles' days to the end of the world, would be divided. . . . It cannot be conceived, if the concluding part of this book itself be recollected, that the last period of the church will be worse than any that has gone before, as the Laodicean church was far more corrupt than any of the rest."—Scott.

"An opinion has been held by some commentators of note, which may be given in the words of Vitranga: 'That under this emblematical representation of the seven churches of Asia, the Holy Spirit has delineated seven different states of the Christian church, which would appear in succession, extending to the coming of our Lord, and the consummation of all things. That this is given in descriptions taken from the names, states, and conditions of these churches, so that they might behold themselves, and learn both their good qualities and their defects, and what admonitions and exhortations were suitable for them.' Vitranga has given a summary of the arguments which may be alleged in favor of this interpretation. Some of them are ingenious, but they are not now considered sufficient to support such a theory. Gill is one of the principal of the English commentators who adopt this view, that 'they are prophetic of the churches of Christ, in the several periods of time, until he appears again.'"—Henry.

We suggest, however, that the message to the last of the seven churches is in harmony with Paul's description of the last day: "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away. For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." 2 Tim. 3:1-7.

It is not our design to give an exposition of the subject of the seven churches. That is given in Thoughts on the Revelation, to which we invite the attention of the reader. As our object, in the small space we shall occupy, is to show the signs of the times in the fulfillment of prophecy, we shall, in rapidly tracing the events of this prophecy, briefly notice each of the seven churches.

(1.) Ephesus signifies "desirable," which well represents the first Christians who had received the doctrine of Christ in its purity. They enjoyed the benefits and blessings of the gifts of the Holy Spirit. They were noted for works, labor, and patience. In faithfulness to those pure principles taught by Jesus Christ, they could not bear those who were evil, and they tried false apostles, and searched out their true character. If the work of trying false apostles belonged to any one congregation of Christians, that at Jerusalem was the very one. Acts 15. Paul also writes to the Corinthians respecting false apostles. 2 Cor. 11:13. We would here suggest that the angels, or messengers, of the churches, may represent Christ's true ministers, through whom he speaks to his people during the several periods of the Christian age.

(2.) Smyrna signifies "myrrh," denoting that the church in this age would be a sweet-smelling savor to God, while passing through the fiery ordeal of persecution which has always served to keep out pride, popularity, and self-dependence, the bane of true faith, piety, and devotion. This state reached down to Constantine, covering much of the period called the ten persecutions. See Buck's Theological Dictionary, pp. 332, 333.

(3.) Pergamos signifies "height, elevation." This period reached from Constantine, about 323, down to the rise of antichrist, about 538. During this period the church became exalted, having her worldly policy, and, like the church of this day, attending to the ceremonies and forms of religion, and neglecting inward piety, the graces of the Spirit, and the life and power of the religion of Jesus. Here was the falling away mentioned by Paul. 2 Thess. 2:3.

(4.) Thyatira signifies "sweet savor of labor," or "sacrifice and contrition," which seems descriptive of the church of Jesus Christ during the 1260 years of papal persecution. This age of dreadful cruelty, and martyrdom of the true church, improved her real condition. "I know thy works, and charity, and thy patience, and thy works; and the last to be more than the first." How necessary to the purity and prosperity of the church, has been persecution and affliction! and how corrupting and destructive to holiness has been worldly prosperity!

"Jezebel, is a figurative name, alluding to Ahab's wife, who slew the prophets of the Lord, led her husband into idolatry, and fed the prophets of Baal at her own table. A more striking figure could not have been used to denote the papal abominations. See 1 Kings 18, 19, 21. It is very evident from history, as well as from this verse, that the church of Christ did suffer some of the papal monks to preach and teach among them. See the History of the Waldenses."—Wm. Miller's Lectures, p. 142.

(5.) Sardis signifies "song of joy," or "that which remains." If we are correct in the application of the first four churches, then Sardis represents the popular churches for nearly a century past. This church has a name to live, but is dead. Look at the exalted position and name which these churches have had among the nations of the earth. Look at their high-sounding titles, and the applause they receive from what is called the world. They bear the name of the church of Jesus Christ, and have the credit of doing much for the world. But they are dead to the pure principles of the gospel, and to good works as taught by Christ and his first ministers.

During this period of the church the message of the second coming of Christ is proclaimed, and the duty to watch for that event is enjoined. Those who do not watch will be overtaken by Christ's coming as by a thief, verse 3, while those who do watch are not in darkness, that that day should overtake them as a thief. 1 Thess. 5:4.

There are a few names even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments. These come out of the different branches of Babylon, and unite upon the glorious theme of the second advent of Christ, leaving their denominational tenets behind, and form the church of brotherly love.

(6.) Philadelphia signifies "brotherly love," and expresses the position and spirit of those who received the advent message up to the autumn of 1844. As they came out of the sectarian churches, they left party names and party feelings behind, and every heart beat in unison as they gave the alarm, pointing to the coming of the Son of man as the consummation of the true believer's hope. Selfishness and covetousness were laid aside, and a spirit of consecration and sacrifice was cherished. The Spirit of God was with every true believer, and his praise on every tongue. Those who were not in that movement know nothing of the deep searching of heart, consecration of all to God, peace, joy in the Holy Spirit, and pure, fervent love for each other, which true believers then enjoyed.

The Son of God is the rightful heir to the throne of David, and is about to take to himself his great power, and reign, hence is here represented as having the key of David—key, a figure of power. The throne of David, or of Christ, on which he is to reign, is in the capital of his kingdom, the New Jerusalem now above. The opening and shutting, mentioned in the address to this church, can refer only to the change of ministration from the holy to the most holy of the heavenly sanctuary, at the end of the 2300 days, in 1844. It was then that the ministration in the holy place closed, and the ministration in the most holy for the forgiveness of sins, and to cleanse the sanctuary, was opened by Him that hath the key of David.

"Behold, I set before thee an open door." Compare this with Rev. 11:19. We can apply texts of this class to no other events than to Christ's entering the most holy in 1844, and opening his ministration there, where is the ark of ten commandments; hence, since that time, the Sabbath, with the whole law of God, has been present truth in a special sense.

Compare with the above texts, Dan. 7:13, 14; Ps. 2:8, 9; Rev. 11:15; Matt. 25:10. That Christ receives the kingdom, takes the throne of David, before his second advent, is plainly taught. This union is represented by the marriage of Matt. 25:10, and is called "the marriage of the Lamb." Rev. 19:7. Since 1844 has been the patient, waiting, watching time. "Here is the patience of the saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God." Rev. 14:12. "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding." Luke 12:35, 36.

Those who keep the word of Christ's patience, will be kept from the hour of temptation which is to try all the world. Those who now live in patient, faithful obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus Christ, will be kept in the dreadful deciding hour before us. Rev. 13:15--17.

The personal appearing of Jesus Christ is also expressed in this address, Behold, I come quickly! This shows the application of the testimony to the church in Philadelphia, to that period when Christ's second advent may be scripturally looked for, and shows the absurdity of that theory which makes the seven addresses to the churches, narratives of matters of fact which occurred, or were to occur, in seven of the churches of Asia Minor, in John's day. There are no such expressions in connection with the first three churches, from the fact that they did not reach down near the end.

In this address the overcomer has the promise of being made a pillar in the temple of God, to go no more out, which here must mean the church, 2 Cor. 6:16, where he is established in the truth, and finally sealed. And let it be distinctly understood that these are all marked direct for the New Jerusalem above, and not for Old Jerusalem where our age-to-come friends think of going. God save us from that mark. These have written upon them, God, New Jerusalem, because they are the property of God, purchased by the blood of his dear Son, to be taken to the New Jerusalem. How glorious the promise, "I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of Heaven from my God, and I will write upon him my new name."

(7.) Laodicea signifies "the judging of the people," or according to Cruden, "a just people," and fitly represents believers in the last message in the great day of atonement, or judgment of the house of God, while the just and holy law of God is taken as their rule of life. They are described as being neither hot nor cold. As a body they have not that zeal, devotion, and those good works which are taught in the Scriptures, and yet their efforts to keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus are such that they cannot be said to be cold. They say they are rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing. They say this, because they believe their condition in spiritual things, and their standing before God, is such. But they are under a most terrible deception, as shown by the declaration, "and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." The words, "and knowest not," vindicate them from all charge of hypocrisy. They honestly think their condition very good, when it is very bad. This is a period of dreadful deception in spiritual things, hence pointed testimony is called for to arouse the deceived to their real danger. The very climax of deception, in which Satan may most exult, is a spirit of fear for the result of the plain and pointed testimony.

The people, and especially unconsecrated professors, love smooth things. They love to be deceived. "A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land; the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means, and my people love to have it so; and what will ye do in the end thereof?" Jer. 5:30, 31. The true Witness counsels the people of God at this time to buy of him tried gold, which may represent true faith; white raiment, which may represent grace from him to enable his people to live a spotless life; and to anoint their eyes that they may see, which may represent the influence of the Holy Spirit upon the mind, which will remove the dreadful deception upon it, so that they may correctly understand their true position and duty at this time.

He stands at the door of the heart, knocking for admission; but spiritual blindness on the part of the lukewarm shuts him out. He pleads for admission, and promises those who will hear his voice, and open the door, that he will come in and sup with them, and they with him. In this appeal, the Son of God uses most touching figures, which illustrate his matchless love for his people who are thrown upon the deceptive perils of the last days, and then closes his special message to them with a soul-inspiring promise of the highest exaltation: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

In this appeal, the true Witness sets forth, first, the terrible deception of the lukewarm; second, their danger, and fate if they thus remain; third, the requisite zeal in repentance; fourth, his willingness to impart to them great blessings; and fifth, points them, on condition that they overcome, to a seat with him on his throne in the kingdom. This is enough! O God, let thy Holy Spirit strike this message home to the heart of every Laodicean.

The seventh is the last church. The number seven represents fullness, perfection, completion. There will be no eighth church to come out of the seventh, as taught by some restless fanatics. The seventh church now existing, keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, will be purified and prepared to meet the Lord at his coming.

10. The Seven Trumpets. Political events are fitly symbolized by trumpets, the chosen heralds of war and revolution. The seven trumpets of Rev. 8, 9, and 11, bring to view the great political events in the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, and reach over past the destruction of all earthly kingdoms, and of sin and sinners, to the time when Christ shall be the great King, and his dominion shall embrace all the earth.

The first trumpet was fulfilled in the first invasion of the Roman Empire by the Goths under Alaric, commencing A. D. 395. The second trumpet points to the terrible inflection of disaster upon the empire by the piratical Vandals under Genseric, 428--468.

Attila and his warlike Huns responded to the call of the third trumpet. Under the fourth trumpet, the Ostrogoths, Theodoric and Odoacer raised their thrones on the now extinguished Western Empire. A third part of the luminaries in the Roman political heavens was now darkened.

The ninth chapter of Revelation is devoted in equal portions to the fifth and sixth trumpets, fulfilled respectively by the Saracens and Turks. These trumpets bring to view the scourge of Christendom by the Mohammedans. These are woe trumpets. The prophetic periods of the fifth trumpet ended in 1449; that of the sixth, August 11, 1840. The second woe was then past, "and behold," said the prophet, "the third woe cometh quickly." Rev. 11:14.

The startling events to occur under the sounding of the seventh angel are given in these words: "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth." Verse 18. The seventh trumpet, though the last of the seven, is not the "last trump" that will rouse the dead and change the living righteous "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye."

The seventh trumpet, like the six that precede it, covers a period of time, and under its sounding a series of events occur. Mark the difference: The work of the last trump will be accomplished "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye;" 1 Cor. 15:52; that of the seventh angel covers a period of prophetic days: "But in the days [years] of the voice of the seventh angel." Rev. 10:7. The last three of the seven are woe trumpets. The seventh is the third woe covering all remaining woes, reaching to the execution of the last Judgment, when sin and sinners will cease to exist. We briefly notice the events under the sounding of the seventh angel in their order.

(1.) The anger of the nations. The spirit of war and bloodshed has existed since the days of Cain, who slew his brother. The increase of wars constitutes a sign of the end. These are to increase in violence and extent until the nations shall be angry.

(2.) The wrath of God in the seven last plagues. "And I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvelous, seven angels having the seven last plagues; for in them is filled up the wrath of God." Rev. 15:1. For a description of these plagues, read the sixteenth chapter.

(3.) The time of the Judgment, which embraces two resurrections, one thousand years apart. Rev. 20:5, 6. The great day of the Lord is not less than one thousand years, and reference may be made to it by the apostle when he states that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. 2 Pet. 3:7, 8.

(4.) The reward of the saints in full will be given at the close of the seventh millennium. They will have the gift of immortality at the second coming of Christ, and will inherit the city of God during the period between the two resurrections; but their entire reward of an immortal inheritance will not be theirs until the wicked shall be destroyed from the earth at the second death, and the new earth shall appear as their eternal inheritance. Then shall the King say to those on his right hand, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Matt. 25:34.

(5.) In connection with the final and complete reward of the just, will the destruction of the unjust take place. Sin and sinners will be destroyed, and the righteous will be rewarded and eternally saved.

11. The gospel of the kingdom. In answer to the question of his disciples, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Jesus said to them, "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Matt. 24:14. This is the first sign of the second coming of Christ, and the end of the world, mentioned by our Lord. It was given in answer to the question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Verse 3. But this text is supposed by many to teach that all men will be converted. What then? The end? No, not for one thousand years at least, in which all will know the Lord from the least to the greatest. And some hold that the one thousand years of Rev. 20 are prophetic, each day in the year representing a year, making three hundred and sixty-five thousand years, during which time all men will be holy and happy.

But the text does not intimate that all men will be converted. It does not say that any one will be converted as the result of preaching this gospel of the kingdom. It does not even state that all will hear this gospel. And we find it far from intimating that the world will be converted, and remain so a thousand years, or three hundred and sixty-five thousand years, before the end.

Many who hold the doctrine of the world's conversion, and a thousand years, or three hundred and sixty-five thousand years, of peace and holiness before the end, assert that nothing can be known of the period of the second advent. But would they not know when their supposed millennium, whether it be literal time, or prophetic, had commenced? Certainly they would. If those enjoying the millennium could not tell when it commenced, it would hardly be worth having. But if they could tell when it commenced, and most certainly they could, then they could tell when it would close, and bring the end.

If we understand the phrase, "this gospel of the kingdom," to be the gospel, in the common acceptance of the word, is not the work very nearly accomplished? J. Litch, in his Prophetic Expositions, page 147, under the heading, "Signs of the Times," says:—

"Rev. J. O. Choules, author of a voluminous work, a History of Missions, from the apostolic age down to the present day, being asked, last May (1842), if he knew of any nation which never had received the gospel, replied that he did not; but he thought the promise implied something more than its being barely preached in each nation. The same question was proposed to Rev. Mr. Janes, general financial agent of the American Bible Society, and nearly the same answer was elicited. Dr. Nathan Bangs, for many years at the head of the Methodist missionary operations, was asked the question last July, and after reflecting some time, replied that he believed there was a tribe, somewhere upon the northwest coast of North America, to whom it has never been preached."

But if the term, "this gospel of the kingdom," be understood as applying to the proclamation of, or to that portion of the gospel which relates to, the coming and kingdom of Christ, the fulfillment is equally evident. And it seems necessary to so understand the passage, as it was spoken in answer to the question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Campbell's translation of this verse decidedly favors our view of this subject: "And this good tidings of the reign shall be published through all the world, for the information of all nations, and then shall come the end." Whiting's version also gives the same idea: "And this good news of the kingdom will be preached in all the world, for a testimony to all nations, and then will the end come."

J. Litch, in his lecture on the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, given in the Advent Herald for Nov. 23, 1850, says: "The great American movement on this subject, and the diffusion of information with regard to it within the last ten years, are too well known to need extended remarks in this place. Neither labor nor sacrifice was regarded in the wide and rapid extension of the good news of the kingdom, as far as the English language could make it known. It was sent to the four quarters of the globe, and to the islands of the sea, upon the wings of all the winds."

E. R. Pinney, in his exposition of the same chapter, says: "As early as 1842, second-advent publications had been sent to every missionary station in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, both sides of the Rocky Mountains."

F. G. Brown, in an article in the Midnight Cry for Feb. 15, 1844, speaking of Eld. Hutchinson's work, says: "Bro. H. occupies the most favorable position for distributing the light throughout the British Possessions and Europe. Having a large acquaintance in Europe, and as papers can be sent from the Canadas thither free of postage, he has embraced every opportunity of sending large supplies by each returning steamship. He has forwarded them to the Canadas, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, Germany, Constantinople, and Rome."

The "Voice of the Church," by D. T. Taylor, speaks as follows concerning the wide diffusion of the Advent sentiment: "In Wirttemberg there is a Christian colony numbering hundreds, who look for the speedy advent of Christ; also another of like belief on the shores of the Caspian; the Molokaners, a large body of dissenters from the Russian Greek church, residing on the shores of the Baltic—a very pious people, of whom it is said, 'Taking the Bible alone for their creed, the norm of their faith is simply the Holy Scriptures'—are characterized by the 'expectation of Christ's immediate and visible reign upon earth.' In Russia, the doctrine of Christ's coming and reign is preached to some extent, and received by many of the lower class. It has been extensively agitated in Germany, particularly in the south part among the Moravians. In Norway, charts and books on the Advent have been circulated extensively, and the doctrine received by many. Among the Tartars in Tartary, there prevails an expectation of Christ's advent about this time. English and American publications on this doctrine have been sent to Holland, Germany, India, Ireland, Constantinople, Rome, and to nearly every missionary station on the globe. At the Turks Islands, it has been received to some extent among the Wesleyans. Mr. Fox, a Scottish missionary to the Tellogoo people, was a believer in Christ's soon coming. James Mac Gregor Bertram, a Scottish missionary of the Baptist order, at St. Helena, has sounded the cry extensively on that island, making many converts and pre-millennialists; he has also preached it at South Africa, at the missionary stations there. David N. Lord informs us that a large proportion of the missionaries who have gone from Great Britain to make known the gospel to the heathen, and who are now laboring in Asia and Africa, are millennialists; and Joseph Wolfe, D. D., according to his journals, between the years 1821 and 1845, proclaimed the Lord's speedy advent, in Palestine, Egypt, on the shores of the Red Sea, Mesopotamia, the Crimea, Persia, Georgia, Arabia, throughout the Ottoman Empire, in Greece, Turkistan, Bokara, Afghanistan, Hindoostan, Cashmere, Thibet, in Holland, Scotland, and Ireland, at Constantinople, Jerusalem, St. Helena, also on shipboard in the Mediterranean, and at New York City, to all denominations. He declares he has preached among Jews, Turks, Mohammedans, Parsees, Hindoos, Chaldeans, Yezidis, Syrians, Sabeans, to Pachas, Sheiks, Shahs, the kings of Orgentsh and Bokhara, the queen of Greece, etc.; and of his extraordinary labors the Investigator says: 'No individual has, perhaps, given greater publicity to the doctrine of the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, than has this well-known missionary to the world. Wherever he goes, he proclaims the approaching advent of the Messiah in glory.' pp. 342-344.

If it be asked if the news that such a truth is preached is a sufficient proclamation to fulfill the prophecy; Rev. 14:6, 7; Matt. 24:14; the answer is, If it was sufficient in the days of the apostles, it is now. That it was then, is clear from Acts 19:8-10, where Paul preached or taught in Ephesus two years, so that all they in Asia, both Jews and Greeks, heard the word of the Lord Jesus. They could not all have heard a sermon, but they heard the sound of the gospel. In this sense, I have no doubt but the gospel of the kingdom is preached in all the world.

We still wait for the approaching end. And when the purpose of God in the proclamation of the coming reign of Christ shall be accomplished, then will the end come.

WHITE ROBES.—NO. 2.

BY ELD. JAMES WHITE.

After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb. And all the angels stood round about the throne, and about the elders and the four beasts, and fell before the throne on their faces, and worshiped God, saying, Amen. Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen. And one of the elders answered, saying unto me, What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they? And I said to him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said unto me, these are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Rev. 7:9-14.

THE seventh chapter of Revelation relates to two classes of the redeemed. It first introduces the definite number of an hundred and forty and four thousand, and gives distinct specifications relative to them. The closing portion of the chapter then describes the great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, as clothed with white robes, and bearing palms of victory. One class is numbered; the other cannot be numbered. One is manifested and sealed at a definite period of time; while the other is redeemed, not only from all nations existing at any one time, but from all people who have lived upon the earth from the time of the offer of salvation to fallen man, to the close of human probation.

"After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." Verses 9, 10. The prophet had just before taken a definite view of the one hundred and forty-four thousand, which were to be manifested and sealed near the close of probation. He next beholds with astonishment the numberless hosts of the redeemed, which make up all the saved. And as his prophetic eye runs back over all time, he sees them gathered from all the nations, in all the different ages of the world. Hence the expression, "After this I looked, and, lo, a great multitude."

These stood before the Lamb. They had been redeemed by the blood of Christ, and stood before him as the dear purchase of his blood. They were clothed with white robes. We should not understand by this that the saints in this world, or in that which is to come, are to wear literal garments of white linen to represent inward holiness. The white robe must be understood as a figure of purity of character. The redeemed of the Lord had obtained this purity during the period of their probation. They had availed themselves of the matchless cleansing power of the blood of Jesus Christ, while, at the same time, they had, in his strength, wrought righteousness. These, also, held palms in their hands. They were victors. They had conquered the world, the flesh, and the devil. They had overcome by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony.

And, let it be borne in mind, these were the saved "of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues." Abel and Enoch will be there; righteous Noah, faithful Abraham, and all the holy prophets of God, with robes washed in the blood of the Lamb, and bearing palms of victory, through his redeeming power, will stand before him, as well as the apostles and martyrs of Jesus, the reformers, and those saved in the nineteenth

SPIRIT OF PROPHECY.

BY ELD. JAMES WHITE.

ONCE, man walked with God in Eden. With open face he beheld the glory of the Lord, and talked with God, and Christ, and angels, in Paradise, without a dimming veil between. Man fell from his moral rectitude and innocency, and was driven from the garden, from the tree of life, and from the visible presence of the Lord and his holy angels. Moral darkness, like the pall of death, has since cast its shadows everywhere, and everywhere the blight and mildew of sin have been seen. And amid the general gloom and moral wretchedness, man has wandered from the gates of Paradise for nearly six thousand years, subject to sickness, pain, sorrow, tears, and death. He has also been subject to the temptations and wiles of the devil, so much so that it is the sad history of man, throughout the entire period of his fallen state, that Satan has reigned with almost universal sway.

When all was lost in Adam, and the shades of night darkened the moral heavens, there soon appeared the star of hope in Christ, and with it was established a means of communication between God and man. In his fallen state, man could not converse face to face with God, and with Christ, and with angels, as when in his Eden purity. But through the ministration of holy angels could the great God speak to him in dreams and in visions. "If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream." Num. 12:6.

The manifestation of the spirit of prophecy was designed for all dispensations. The sacred Record nowhere restricts it to any particular period of time, from the fall to the final restitution. The Bible recognizes its manifestation alike in the patriarchal age, in the Jewish age, and in the Christian age. Through this medium God communed with holy men of old. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied, and so extensive was the range of his prophetic vision, and so minute, that he could look down over long ages, and describe the coming of the Lord, and the execution of the last Judgment upon the ungodly. Jude, verses 14, 15.

God spake to his prophets in the Jewish dispensation in visions and in dreams, and opened before them the great things of the future, especially those connected with the first advent of Christ to suffer for sinners, and his second appearing in glory to destroy his enemies, and complete the redemption of his people. If the spirit of prophecy nearly disappeared from the Jewish church for a few centuries toward the close of that dispensation, on account of the corruptions in that church, it reappeared at its close to usher in the Messiah. Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, "was filled with the Holy Spirit, and prophesied." Simeon, a just and devout man, who was "waiting for the consolation of Israel," came by the Spirit into the temple, and prophesied of Jesus as "a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Israel." And Anna, a prophetess, "spoke of him to all them that look for redemption in Jerusalem." And there was no greater prophet than John, who was chosen of God to introduce to Israel "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world."

The Christian age commenced with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and the manifestation of various spiritual gifts. Among these was the gift of prophecy. After commissioning his disciples to go into all the world and preach the gospel, Jesus says to them: "And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." Mark 16:17, 18. On the day of Pentecost, when the Christian dispensation was fully opened, some of these gifts were manifested in a most wonderful manner. Acts 2:1-11. Luke, in giving account of his travels with Paul and others, when a quarter of a century of the Christian age had already passed, after speaking of entering into the house of Philip the evangelist, says: "And the same man had four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy. And as we tarried there many days, there came down from Judea a certain prophet, named Agabus." Acts 21:9, 10. Again, still later, we see the beloved John in the Isle of Patmos, imbued with the spirit of prophecy in all its fullness. The wonderful Revelation was given unto him when more than half a century of the Christian age had passed. And here the New Testament record leaves us, without a single intimation that the gifts of the Spirit should cease from the church till the day of glory should be ushered in by the second appearing of Jesus Christ.

Since the great apostasy, these gifts have rarely been manifested; and, for this reason, professed Christians generally suppose that they were designed to be limited to the period of the primitive church. But from the time of the primitive Christians to the present, there have been manifestations among the most devoted followers of Jesus, which have been recognized by nearly all of the leading denominations as the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Then should not the errors and the unbelief of the church be assigned as reasons why these manifestations have been so seldom, rather than that God has taken these blessings from the church? When the people of God attain to primitive faith and practice, as they most certainly will under the last message, the latter rain will be poured out, and all the gifts will be revived. The former rain was given at the commencement of the Christian age, in the time of the sowing of the gospel seed, to cause it to germinate and take good root. Then the church enjoyed the gifts. And when the latter rain shall be poured out at the close of the dispensation, to ripen the golden harvest for the garner of God, then will the gifts of the Holy Spirit be manifested in all their fullness.

To this agree the words of the prophet as quoted by Peter: "And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy; and I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke; the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come." Acts 2:17-20. The spirit of prophecy is here seen among the especial signs of the last days. Its revival is to constitute one of the most noted signs of the approaching end. This is evident from its being classed with the most prominent signs, in the sun, in the moon, and in the stars, and such wonders in the heavens above, and in the earth beneath, as blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke.

Of all the blessings which God has bestowed upon his people, the gift of his Son excepted, none have been so sacred and so important to their welfare as the gifts of his holy law, and his Holy Spirit. And none have been so well calculated to thwart the plans of Satan, and consequently to stir his rage, as these. And when that people arise in the last generation of men, who shall observe all ten of the precepts of God's holy law, and recognize the revival of the spirit of prophecy, they may expect to feel that bitterness from their opponents which can arise only from the direct inspiration of Satan. "And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." Rev. 12:17.

The dragon is a symbol of the first great rebel against God's government. The woman is a symbol of the true church. The common and well-understood figure of the remnant represents a small body of Christians in the last generation of men, just prior to the second coming of Christ. This body of Christians, waiting for the coming and kingdom of the Redeemer, are keeping the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.

We now inquire, What is the testimony of Jesus Christ? The angel gives John the answer to this question in its broadest signification. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." Rev.

19:10. The spirit, soul, and substance of prophecy, is the testimony of Jesus Christ. Or, the voice of the prophets relative to the plan and work of human redemption, is the voice of the Redeemer. Christ undertook the work of redemption, and who should inspire a book upon the subject but the Redeemer himself?

The book of the Revelation opens with these words: "The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John." Men placed as the caption of this book, "The Revelation of St. John, the Divine," with the first clause of the inspired book before their eyes,—"The Revelation of Jesus Christ." The reader will excuse the blunder of the compilers of our blessed Bible, and accept the inspired declaration.

Jesus, and not John, is the revelator. It is Jesus Christ who speaks through his angel to John, for the benefit of his church. And when the prophet of God, overwhelmed with what he heard and saw, fell at the feet of the angel to worship him, he said: "See thou do it not; for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book; worship God." Rev. 22:9. Notice the following points:—

1. The angel was a fellow-servant with John. Both were servants of God, and both were doing service to the Christian church in receiving light and truth from Jesus Christ, and giving it to the people in the seven periods of the Christian age, symbolized by the seven churches.

2. This angel who visited John in Patmos was also a fellow-servant of the prophets. The angel who stood as a connecting link between the Son of God and the prophet John, in receiving and giving the book of Revelation, occupied the same position, doing the same work, in kind, with all the prophets of God.

3. He is not spoken of as one of Christ's angels, whose number is said to be ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands, but "HIS angel." Rev. 1:1. Who is this angel that stands in the presence of God as Christ's special messenger, claiming to be a fellow-servant of all the prophets? When we learn the name of that angel who visited any one of the prophets, we have an answer to this question.

"I am Gabriel that stand in the presence of God," said the angel who addressed Zacharias relative to the birth of John. Luke 1:19.

Daniel was a prophet of God, Matt. 24:15, and by command of the Son of God, Gabriel was dispatched from Heaven to instruct the prophet relative to his wonderful revelation. Dan. 10:12, 21; 8:16.

4. In the revelation of the will of Heaven relative to the plan of human redemption, God is first, his Son second, and Gabriel is third. That which is true of the book of the Revelation in this respect, is true of all the prophetic books of the Bible. The Father is the first great cause, the source of light and truth. He gives it to his Son, who reveals it to his people by his angel through the prophets. Hence it is the Redeemer who has revealed the plan of redemption, which reaches across all ages. That the voice of the prophets is the testimony of Jesus Christ, the apostle distinctly teaches when he speaks of them as "searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow." 1 Pet. 1:11.

5. Gabriel was a fellow-servant with John in receiving the Revelation from Jesus Christ, and in giving it to the church. He was also a fellow-servant of the prophets through whom the testimony of Jesus has appealed to the people in past ages. But the work of Christ's special angel in this respect does not close with the prophets of the Bible. After stating, "I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets," he adds, "and of them which keep the sayings of this book."

The book of the Revelation relates to the fourth universal empire, and especially to that portion of the Christian age that remained when John wrote. The Divine eye, that sees the end from the beginning, could alone peer into the dark future. Hence the book of Revelation was a sealed book when given to John, to be unsealed and understood as fulfilled. This progressive work is illustrated by the opening of the seven seals of the sixth chapter. Admitting that the sayings of the Revelation could be kept as far and as fast as that book was unsealed, it is unquestionably true that no man could keep all the sayings of the book, until the period of the fifth seal should be passed and the sixth seal should be opened. This seal introduced the great earthquake of 1755, followed by the dark day of 1780, and the falling stars of 1833. The first six of the seven seals cover all probationary time, down to the period of the wrath of the Lamb. The period of the sixth seal closes with the three messages of the fourteenth chapter. And at the very close of the third, the last message of mercy, it is said, "Here are they that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." And to this very time, and to the very people who are keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, do the closing words of the address of the angel to John apply—"and of them which keep the sayings of this book." Here is work for Gabriel. Here the remnant people of God can in the fullest sense of the phrase keep the sayings of this book. And here is one of the strongholds of the doctrine of the perpetuity of spiritual gifts to the close of probation.

The Jewish age, notwithstanding its apostasies, opened and closed with special manifestations of the Spirit of God. And it is not reasonable to suppose that the Christian age, the light of which, compared with the former dispensation, is as the light of the sun to the feeble rays of the moon, should commence in glory, and close in obscurity. And since a special work of the Spirit was necessary to prepare a people for the first advent of Christ, how much more important the work of the Spirit to prepare a people for his second advent.

God has never manifested his power to his people simply for their gratification; but according to their necessities has he wrought for them. Then we may safely conclude that, as his people are passing the perils of the last days in the final struggle with the aroused powers of darkness, when false prophets shall have power to show great signs and wonders, insomuch that, if it were possible, they would deceive the very elect, our gracious God will bless and strengthen his fainting people with the gifts, as well as the graces, of the Holy Spirit.

We have seen that the manifestation of the spirit of prophecy became necessary in consequence of man's being separated from the visible presence of God. But when the tabernacle of God shall be with men, and he shall dwell with them, and God himself shall be with them; Rev. 21:3; when Christ shall come again with all the holy angels, and receive his people unto himself, that where he shall be, there they may be also; John 14:3; and when man redeemed shall walk and talk with God, and Christ, and angels, in Eden restored; then there will be no further need of the spirit of prophecy.

When man in Eden stood in all the perfection of his manhood, before the blight of sin had touched anything that God had made for him, and with open face beheld the glory of the Lord, he could have no need of the spirit of prophecy. But when Eden was lost in consequence of transgression, and man was doomed to grope his way from the gates of Paradise, enshrouded in the moral gloom that resulted from the curse and the reign of Satan, he needed the light of the spirit of prophecy. And his need in this respect will continue more or less urgent until the restitution, when the redeemed shall walk and talk with God, and with Christ, and with the holy angels, in Eden restored.

The apostle to the Corinthians clearly sustains this position. He introduces the subject by stating, "Now concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant." 1 Cor. 12:1. He deemed the subject of too great importance to leave the church at Corinth in ignorance respecting it. He proposes to instruct them. We shall do well to avail ourselves of the benefit of his teachings.

In this chapter the apostle introduces the human body, with its several members acting in harmony, one dependent upon the other, as an illustration of the Christian church, with its members, and the several gifts God has set in the church. He then makes the application of the figure thus: "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." Verses 27, 28.

Let it be borne in mind that God has set prophets, miracles, and gifts of healings, in the Christian church as verily as he has teachers, helps and governments. And this expression, "God hath set" them in the church, means more than that he would communicate with his people by his Holy Spirit in the Christian age the same as he had in former dispensations. It conveys the idea that God had especially endowed the Christian church with them. He had established them in the church, to remain until the return of her absent Lord. This was done because the church needed them. Did the primitive church need them? So did the true church need them to light her pathway during the dark period of her persecutions and martyrdom. And much more does the church need the gifts in making her course through the perils of the last days, and in making ready to receive her soon-coming Lord.

The design of the gifts, and also the time of their continuance in the church, are definitely expressed by the apostle to the Ephesians: "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." Chap. 4:11-13.

It cannot be shown that the church did, in the lifetime of Paul, reach the state of unity, knowledge, and perfection, here mentioned. And certainly the church did not enjoy these during her apostasy, 2 Thess. 2:3, and the period of her flight into the wilderness. Rev. 12:6. Nor has she reached this state of unity, knowledge, and perfection, since the labors of Martin Luther. The church to-day is almost infinitely below this state of unity, knowledge, and perfection. And not until the Christians of the last generation of men shall be brought to the enjoyment of it by the last warning message, and all the means God may employ to prepare them to be translated to Heaven without tasting death, will the ultimate design of the gifts be realized.

But Paul, in 1 Cor. 13, has distinctly shown when the gifts would cease. In the first part of this chapter the apostle discourses upon the pre-eminence of love (improperly translated charity) over the gift of tongues, gift of prophecy, faith, liberality to the poor, and courage to give one's body to be burned. These, in the absence of love, are valueless. He then describes the virtues and riches of love, closing with these words: "Charity [love] never faileth; but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away." Verse 8. While love is not only the crowning Christian grace here, but will reach forward to all eternity and be the crowning glory of the redeemed, the gifts will cease with faith and hope. At the glorious appearing of the Lord, faith will be lost in sight, hope in fruition, prophecies will fail to be any longer a light to the church, tongues will cease to be a sign, and the faint knowledge of the present dim night will vanish before the perfect knowledge of the perfect day as the dim rays of the moon vanish before the light of the rising sun.

Next come the forcible words of verses 9 and 10: "For we know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." We still wait for that which is perfect to come. And while we wait, may our dear, absent Lord manifest himself to his waiting people through the gifts. "For," says Paul, speaking of the present imperfect state, "we know in part, and we prophesy in part." How long shall the spirit of prophecy serve the church? When will it be done away? Answer: "But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." This should settle in the question of the perpetuity of the gifts in the Christian church.

The popular view, however, is this: The gifts were given to the primitive church, to remain only during the lifetime of Christ's first apostles. At their death, the gifts were to be removed from the church. But let it be remembered that a great change takes place when the gifts are to cease, and that change is from an imperfect state to that which is perfect; from the dimness of night to the glory of perfect day. We need not inquire if such a change took place at the death of the first apostles; for all who have any knowledge of the history of the primitive church, know that whatever changes did take place in the church about the time of the death of the apostles, were not for the better, but decidedly for the worse. Even in Paul's day, the mystery of iniquity already worked in the church. 2 Thess. 2:7. And the apostle, addressing the elders of the church at Miletus, says: "For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them." Acts 20:29, 30. But if we apply this great change to the close of the present dispensation, and the introduction of the eternal day of glory, all is plain. Here we have the clearest proof that the gifts were not to be done away until the second appearing of Christ.

Paul continues with an illustration of the present imperfect state, and the future state of perfection and glory: "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things." Verse 11. His childhood represents the present imperfect state; his manhood, the perfection of the immortal state. This is evident. Now suppose we are wrong, and that Paul's childhood represents the church in his day, endowed with the gifts; and that his manhood represents the church after his death, stripped of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, and fast sinking away toward the great apostasy! Absurdity!

And still the apostle continues with another beautiful illustration of the change from the present dispensation (during which the church was to enjoy the comparatively dim light of the gifts, as she walked by faith and hope) to the open glories of the world to come, when the redeemed shall walk with God in Eden restored, and talk face to face with Christ and angels. He says, "For now we see through a glass darkly; but then, face to face." Verse 21. To the view that the gifts were to cease at the death of the first apostles, and that with their death came the glorious change illustrated by these words of the apostle, we need only repeat, Absurdity!

The truth of God upon this subject is consistent and harmonious with itself, and with all divine truth. The spirit of prophecy, in consequence of the fall and man's separation from the visible presence of God, became a necessity. This necessity has not been obviated by any past change of dispensation. No dispensation needs the gifts of the Holy Spirit more than the Christian age; and at no time in the long period of man's separation from God's visible presence have they been so much needed as amid the perils of the raging tempests of the last days. But when the Redeemer shall come, the controversy be ended, the saints' rest given, and they, all immortal, meet around the throne with angels, and face to face behold the glory of God and the Lamb, the spirit of prophecy will be numbered among Heaven's choicest blessings of the past.

But the skeptical objector inquires, "Where are the gifts? If your position is correct, why have they not been manifested in the church all along down ever since God set them in the church? Why are not the sick healed by faith now?" We are aware that this is the principal objection brought against the scriptural doctrine of the perpetuity of the gifts, therefore it demands especial notice. We reply as follows:—

1. The sick were not always healed by faith in Paul's day. He says (2 Tim. 4:20), "Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick." Again he says to Timothy (1 Tim. 5:23), "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." God could have answered the prayers of his servant Paul, and raised up Trophimus, and healed Timothy's infirmities, if this had been best. We conclude that God has not designed in any age of the church to manifest his power so far that there should be no sick among Christians. But in cases where it would be for the good of the afflicted, and for his own glory, he has manifested his power, and will manifest it.

2. The unbelief of the professed followers of Christ in the manifestation of spiritual gifts is sufficient reason why they are not more fully manifested. It is said of Christ, "And he did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief." Matt. 13:58. There is an impious unbelief with many at this day, even of some who profess to take the Bible as their guide, which resembles that of those who, mockingly, said of Christ as he hung on the cross, "Let Christ, the King of Israel, descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe." It is sometimes said in reply to the Bible evidences of the perpetuity of spiritual gifts, "Just work a few miracles, and we will believe your doctrine." It is not God's plan to gratify such spirits; for should they see as powerful manifestations as were seen in the days of Christ, Paul, and Peter, they would scottishly attribute it to the power of Satan, or some other cause besides the power of God.

It is humble, confiding faith that moves Omnipotence. Those only who have this faith may expect the manifestation of the gifts. Mark 2:5: "When Jesus saw their faith, he said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee." Chap. 9:23: "Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." Matt. 9:21, 22: "For she said within herself, If I may but touch his garment, I shall be whole. But Jesus turned him about, and when he saw her, he said, Daughter, be of good comfort, thy faith hath made thee whole. And the woman was made whole from that hour." Chap. 15:28: "Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour."

3. The object of the gifts, as stated by Paul, was "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come in the unity of the faith." But they have been superseded in the popular churches by human creeds, which have failed to secure scriptural unity. It has been truly said, "The American people are a nation of lords." In a land of boasted freedom of thought and of conscience, like ours, church force cannot produce unity; but has caused divisions, and has given rise to religious sects and parties almost innumerable. Creed and church force have been called to the rescue in vain.

The remedy, however, for this deplorable evil is found in the proper use of the simple organization and church order set forth in the New-Testament Scriptures, and in the means Christ has ordained for the unity and perfection of the church. We affirm that there is not a single apology in all the book of God for disharmony of sentiment or spirit in the church. The means are ample to secure the high standard of unity expressed in the New Testament. Christ prayed that his people might be one, as he was one with his Father. John 17. And Paul appeals to the church at Corinth in these emphatic words: "Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment." 1 Cor. 1:10. "Now the God of patience and consolation grant you to be like-minded one toward another according to Christ Jesus, that ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." Rom. 15:5, 6. The gifts were given to secure this state of unity.

But the popular churches have introduced another means of preserving unity, namely, human creeds. These creeds secure a sort of unity to each denomination; but they have all proved inefficient, as appears from the New Schools and Reformed of almost every creed-bound denomination under heaven. Hence the many kinds of Baptists, of Presbyterians, and of Methodists, etc., etc. There is not an excuse for this state of things anywhere to be found in the book of God. These sects are not on the foundation of unity laid by Jesus Christ, and taught by Paul, the wise master-builder. And the smaller sects who reject human creeds, professing to take the Bible as their rule of faith and practice, yet rejecting the gifts, are not a whit better off. In these perilous times they shake to fragments, yet cry, The Bible! the Bible! We, too, would exalt the Bible, and would say to those who would represent us as taking the gifts instead of the Bible, that we are not satisfied with a part of the sacred volume, but claim as ours the Bible, and the whole Bible, gifts and all.

All the denominations cannot be right, and it may not be wrong to suppose that no one of them is right on all points of faith. To show that they cannot have their creeds and the gifts too, that creeds shut out the gifts, we will suppose that God, through chosen instruments taken from each sect, begins to show up the errors in the creeds of these different denominations. If they received the testimony as from Heaven, it would spoil their creeds. But would they throw them away and come out on the platform of unity taught by Christ, Paul, and Peter? Never! They would a thousand times sooner reject the humble instruments of God's choice. It is evident that if the gifts were received, they would destroy human creeds; and that if creeds be received, they shut out the gifts.

4. When we consider the great apostasy of the church, the corruption of her pure doctrines, and her sojourn of 1260 years in the wilderness, we are not surprised that we do not find on the pages of her sad history any clearer records of the manifestations of spiritual gifts. We would here call attention to a work entitled "Miraculous Powers," published at the Office of the REVIEW AND HERALD, in which may be found testimonies from not only the eminently pious, but from many of the learned, and from some of the most reliable historians, fairly representing the faith of the church upon the subject of spiritual gifts. We do not rely upon the testimony of men as proof of our position; but after being established in the doctrine of the perpetuity of spiritual gifts from the plain testimony of God's word, it is a matter of unspeakable joy to find that on this vital doctrine our faith is in harmony with the good, the humble, and the prudent, ever since Christ said to his first ministers, "These signs shall follow them that believe."

Infinite wisdom has doubtless withheld the gifts to a great extent lest Satan take advantage of the ignorance and weakness of the people of God, and push them over into fanaticism. Many who have supposed that they were favored with manifestations of the Spirit of God, have regarded themselves as being quite out of danger. They soon became lifted up with pride in spiritual things, and were Satan's easy prey.

If it was necessary that Paul should have a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet him, lest he become exalted through the abundance of revelations with which he was favored, it is a reasonable conclusion that all who seek to walk with God, and share all the spiritual blessings of the Christian age, are also in danger of exaltation and the wiles of the devil. If he can push one such to extremes and fanaticism, he disgraces the vital part of Christianity, and gains a greater victory than in holding a hundred souls in cold formality. The history of Luther, the Wesleys, and others, who by the power of a living faith led the church from the dark shades of error and formality to a clearer light, proves the necessity of the mind's being well balanced with caution. And he who sees no need of caution here is not far from some delusive snare of Satan. But in walking softly and humbly before God, in strict watchfulness and fervent prayer to be kept by the power of God from the wiles of Satan, there is safety. God has great blessings in store for his people, and will bestow them as fast as they can make a right use of them to their good and his glory. Amen.

THE PLAN FOR FAMILY READING.

We learn that the circular sent out to the churches to be read Dec. 21, proposing a plan for family reading, did not reach some of the churches in season, and that others were unfaithful in attending to the matter, and hence that many are unacquainted with the plan proposed. We therefore present the plan again, so far revising it as to adapt it to the present circumstances, as some of the time has already passed.

In many homes the family spends one to three hours chatting around the fire, or engaged in various employments. Farmers and mechanics usually spend the winter evenings with their families at home. And while in some families the time is wholly spent in useful employment, in many the father is reading or dozing, the mother making garments, or preparing food for the morning meal, and the children studying their school lessons, or at play. There is hardly a family where one or two hours could not be saved, to be spent profitably in a systematic course of reading from some good books of general interest to the whole family circle.

We recommend that every family of our people organize a home reading society. Let the exercises be held one hour of each evening, only excepting those evenings when meetings or other duties occupy the time.

And we have recommended that the reading for January, February, and March, 1880, be the three volumes of "Spirit of Prophecy." These volumes are rich in thought, and are highly spiritual and practical. We urge that in every family of Seventh-day Adventists in the land, reading exercises be instituted. Let the entire family be assembled at the fireside, and let different members of the family have the benefit of the practice in reading. And if circumstances will admit, let neighbors and friends be invited to join. We know of no better exercise to secure mental and spiritual culture than reading, and no books better than the volumes named.

Let these volumes be taken as a course of family reading, between Jan. 1, 1880, and April 1, 1880. In the three volumes there are one hundred chapters, and between the dates named there are 78 week days and thirteen Sabbaths. Now it will be seen that the work can easily be accomplished by adopting the following plan, which involves only a little system, order, and perseverance, qualities which all should cultivate; namely, let one chapter be read each week day and two chapters each Sabbath, and the work is done with a little time to spare.

The above is the plan which was proposed to commence Jan. 1, and some are already going forward with it as recommended. But others have not yet commenced, and so are behind. Now we recommend that those who have not yet entered upon the work, procure the volumes immediately, and read two chapters each day till they catch up with the regular readers who began Jan. 1. For instance, if you commence Feb. 1, and read two chapters a day and two each Sabbath, you will be on the 1st of March up with those who began Jan. 1, and have read one chapter a day and two on the Sabbath. Then all can go on through the month of March, reading one chapter a day and two on the Sabbath, according to the regular plan, and finish the volumes together, April 1.

LABOR is the very life-blood of society, stirring in all its veins, and diffusing vigor and enjoyment through the whole system. Without our labor, all life, except that of the rudest and most savage kind, must perish. Labor is the grand pedestal of God's blessings upon earth; 'it is more: like man and the world itself, it is the offspring and the work of God. All honor, then, to labor, the offspring of the Deity, the most ancient of ancients, sent forth by the Almighty into these nether worlds, the most noble of nobles! Honor to that divine principle which has filled the earth with all comforts and joys. Whatever we see or perceive in heaven or on the earth, is the product of labor. The sky above us, the ground beneath us, the air we breathe, the sun, the moon, the stars,—what are they? The product of labor. They are the labors of the Omnipotent, and all our labors are but a continuance of his. Our work is a divine work. We carry on what God began.—William Howitt.

The Family Circle.

"BE YE SEPARATE."

Two cannot walk together,
Unless they are agreed;
One dictates the direction,
The other must accede;
One chooses to walk crooked,
The other to walk straight,—
This cannot be effected Unless they separate.

Light cannot dwell with darkness,
They cannot be agreed;
For if the one advances,
The other must recede;
Christ has no part with Satan,
They ever must be twain;
And there is no agreement
With God and idols vain.

So those who are disciples
Of Christ, the blessed Lord, Must choose companions only Whose faith and hope accord.
No partnerships whatever
With others should be made,
Lest Christians prove apostates,
And Christ should be betrayed.

One loves the blessed Saviour,
And waits for his return,
While on affection's altar
The fires celestial burn;
The other loves the present,
All earthly his desire—
The constant-pouring water Extinguishes the fire.

And speak we of the union
Preferred to that from birth,
A tie which brings communion
Most intimate on earth?
Two cannot walk together
Unless there be accord;
Therefore the great apostle
Said, "Only in the Lord." * * *

UNHAPPY MARRIAGES.

THE restriction which the apostle laid upon believers, that they should marry "only in the Lord," means not only that they should not marry open infidels and pagans, but even the Jews themselves who did not believe in the Lord Jesus. "In the Lord" signified, in the faith of Jesus Christ. This was at that time the present, testing truth; and those who did not believe it, were, to those who did, infidels, that is, simply unbelievers. They were out of Christ, whatever profession of religion they might make, whether they were pagans, or those who professed faith in the Scriptures, as did the Jews. An unbelieving Jew would be even more likely to have an influence to turn away a believer, than one who professed no religion at all akin to the true.

So it is at the present time. To those who believe that the last merciful message of the gospel is present truth, others must be accounted unbelievers; and such as hold tenaciously to the Christian religion, and yet reject the special, saving truth for our time, are more to be feared for their influence than they would be, had they not a religious faith with which they are so perfectly satisfied.

Said Paul, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" 2 Cor. 6:14, 15. "Can two walk together, except they be agreed?"

The truth which we believe, is a separating truth, as was the faith of Jesus in its beginning. The Sabbath is a distinguishing, separating truth. It is intended and well calculated to cleave the believer out from the world. The observance of different days as sacred time, may seem, at first thought, to be a very small thing; but in social life it is sometimes a very great inconvenience. But two Sabbaths in one family is a thing to be deprecated. It is next to an impossibility; and very much like no Sabbath at all. Children reared under such opposing influences will probably regard no day.

are truly to be pitied. They must do the best they can to maintain a good conscience and please God, and he will help them. But those who are free, and consider this thing in its true bearing, will not venture voluntarily upon an experiment so hazardous. The exercise of good sense on either side would prevent such an undertaking. With the believer, God and his truth should be of first importance. No matrimonial alliance should be entered into, without carefully and prayerfully considering whether God can approve it. Ah! how true it is that "the hour that witnesses the marriage of many young men and women, closes the history of their religious experience and usefulness."

God will sustain and finally reward that person who, when brought into a place which tests religious principle, can frankly say, "I am a conscientious Christian. I believe the seventh day of the week to be the Sabbath of the Bible. Our faith and principles are such that they lead in opposite directions. We cannot be happy together; for if I follow on to gain a more perfect knowledge of the will of God, I shall become more and more unlike the world, and more assimilated to the likeness of Jesus Christ. If you continue to see no loveliness in Christ, no attractions in the truth, you will love the world, which I cannot love, while I shall love the things of God, which you cannot love." * * *

THE DARK DAY.

OF all the wonderful stories that my great-grandmother used to tell my mother when she was a little girl, the most wonderful was about the dark day in New England, Friday, May 19, 1780. This was during our Revolution, you will remember, and the same year in which the traitor, Benedict Arnold, attempted to betray his country to its enemies.

For several days before the 19th the air was full of vapors, as we often see it when fires are raging in the woods near us; and the sun and moon appeared red, and their usual clear light did not reach us, especially when rising and setting. The wind blew chiefly from the southwest and northeast, and the weather was cool and clear. The morning of the 19th was cloudy, and in many places slight showers fell, sometimes accompanied by thunder and lightning; but as the sun arose, it did not increase the light, and the darkness deepened and deepened, until the children standing before the tall clocks could not see to tell the time, and older people peering over the almanac were not able to distinguish the letters. The birds sang their evening songs and flew to their nests in the woods, the poultry hurried to their roosts, while the cattle in the fields uttered strange cries and leaped the stone fences to gain their stalls, and the sheep all huddled together, bleating piteously.

Color, which you know depends upon the light of the sun, filled many with astonishment by its unusual appearance; for the clouds were in some places of a light red, yellow, and brown; the leaves on the trees and the grass in the meadows were of the deepest green, verging on indigo; the brightest silver seemed tarnished, and everything that is white in the sunlight bore a deep yellow hue.

The shadows, which before noon fall to the westward and after noon to the eastward, were observed during the darkness to fall in every direction.

The rain, also, was unlike any other rain, and it set the people to wondering as they dipped it from tubs and barrels; for a scum, resembling burnt leaves and emitting a sooty smell, formed on the water; and this same substance was seen on rivers, especially the Merrimac, where it lay four or five inches thick, for many miles along its shore.

Another peculiarity was the vapor. In many localities it descended to the earth from high in the atmosphere; but at one point the vapors, at about nine o'clock, were seen rising from the springs and lowlands; one column in particular was noticed rapidly ascending far above the highest hills, where it spread into a large white cloud and sailed off to the westward; a second cloud formed in the same way, from the same springs, but did not rise as high as the first, and a third formed fifteen minutes afterward. At a quarter of ten the uppermost cloud was of a reddish hue, the second was green, indigo, and blue, and the third was almost white.

So unwholesome was this vapor that small birds were suffocated in it; and many of them were so frightened and stupefied that they flew into the houses, adding to the fears of ignorant people, who considered it a bad sign for a bird to enter a dwelling.

The commencement of the darkness was between ten and eleven o'clock in the forenoon (when the men were busy in the fields and offices and workshops, the women spinning, weaving, and preparing dinner, and the children at school, or helping their fathers and mothers at home), and it continued until the middle of the following night; but the degree of darkness varied; in some places the disk of the sun was visible when the darkness was the most dense.

Lights were seen burning in all the houses, and the people passing out-of-doors carried torches and lanterns, which were curiously reflected on the overhanging clouds.

Thousands of people were sure that the end of the world had come; many dropped their work and fell on their knees to pray; others confessed to their fellows the wrongs they had done, and endeavored to make restitution.

The meeting-houses were crowded, neighborhood prayer-meetings were formed, and the ministers and old church-members prayed long prayers, mentioning the nations and individuals of Bible times who had been destroyed on account of their sins, and begging that as God spared the great city of Nineveh when it repented, so he would forgive them, cheer them again by the light of the sun, and give victory to their armies.

It is said that the Connecticut Legislature being in session, the members became terrified when they could not see each other's faces, and a motion was made to adjourn, when Mr. Davenport arose and said:—

"Mr. Speaker, it is either the day of Judgment or it is not. If it is not, there is no need of adjourning; if it is, I desire to be found doing my duty. I move that candles be brought, and that we proceed to business."

All the shivering, frightened people now began to look forward to evening, hoping that, as the moon arose full at nine o'clock, her light would penetrate the gloom; but all the children who coaxed to sit up and see her, grew very sleepy, and their strained eyes were not rewarded by her beautiful beams, for at eight in the evening the darkness was total; one could not distinguish between the earth and the heavens, and it was impossible to see a hand before one's face.

Then all the weary children were sent to bed, after the most honest prayers that they had ever prayed; and the old people sat up to watch for the light that had never before appeared so glorious.

And never dawned a fairer morning than the 20th of May; for the sun that opened the flowers and mirrored itself in the dew-drops, brought the color again to the children's faces and filled every heart with confidence. The birds sang joyously, the cattle returned to their pastures, the places of business were opened, and every one went about his work more gentle toward man and more grateful toward God.

After the darkness was past, several persons traveled about to gather all possible information concerning this memorable day, and Dr. Tenny wrote an account of what he learned while on a journey from the East to Pennsylvania. He says the deepest darkness was in Essex county, Mass., the lower part of New Hampshire, and the eastern portion of Maine (where my great-grandmother lived.) In Rhode Island and Connecticut it was not so great; in New Jersey peculiar clouds were observable, but the darkness was not uncommon; and in the lower parts of Pennsylvania nothing unusual was observed.

The darkness extended as far north as the American settlements and westward to Albany, but its exact limits could not be ascertained. In Boston it continued fourteen or fifteen hours, varying in duration at other places.

As it was impossible to attribute the darkness to an eclipse, the wise people formed many theories respecting it, being convinced that it was due to immense fires in the woods, winds blowing in opposite directions, or to the condition of the vapors; but Herschel says: "The dark day in Northern America was one of those wonderful phenomena of Nature which will always be read of with interest, but which philosophy is at a loss to explain."—Ella A. Drinkwater, in St. Nicholas.

THE FASHIONS.

"FASHIONABLE" dress and equipage are the uniform of the army of "the god of this world," and fashionable customs are his tactics. Why should Christians adopt them? See Rom. 12:1, 2; 1 John 2:15, 16.

Many a soldier of Christ has been infected with the clothing, or taken prisoner by the tactics, and millions of the Lord's money have been taken from his work by these devices of the enemy. How long shall this course continue? Shall Christians still ask of Paris, or of any other worldly fashionable center, instructions how to live?—Selected.

IN THE DESERT.

A DESERT place; no springing water here,
No palm's green shade;
The sky above me burning azure clear;
The sun hath laid
His brazen spell on the stark landscape nigh;
Fainting beneath that baleful power I lie.

Faint and alone! the pitiless, hot sands Widen away,
Or stirred by the sirocco's waving hands,
Rise into gray
And blinding veils, to mock the vision sore
With straining after objects seen no more.

Yet in my dreams, cold rivulets flow down
With careless songs,
And mountains lift up many a purple crown;
The laughing throngs
Of men and women walk fair city streets,
While my lips taste life's most alluring sweets.

Only a dream! here must I slowly die,
Poor atom tossed
From world to world, in God's infinity Drunk up and lost.
To him it matters not if there, or here,
One lone soul flutters to the hidden sphere.

A desert place; yet the Lord's angel came,
Even to such as I;
Not in the whirlwind or the blasting flame,
He passed me by;
But all my trembling spirit was aware
Of a great peace—and of One standing there!

Forth from the solitude of arid pain
I journey now.
Still lies around me the untraveled plain,
And yet I bow,
Saying in faith, Who bears the desert test, Finds the green pasture and the Shepherd's Rest.

—Charlotte M. Packard, in Christian Weekly.

THE DARK DAY.

THE recent centennial anniversary of the dark day of May 19, 1780, has caused a very general mention of the subject by newspapers in different parts of the country, bringing out some new features of the scene. Among the many which have come under our notice we give the following sent in by different correspondents. The first is from the Janesville (Wis.) Gazette of June 3:—

"Two weeks ago Wednesday was the one-hundredth anniversary of the celebrated 'dark day,' which on May 19, 1780, overcame a great tract of North America, though its darkness was most intense in New England, and especially in Massachusetts, where it was commonly thought to be the day of Judgment, though it much more closely resembled the day described by the prophet Joel, as the herald of the Lord's avenging army of locusts:—

"A day of darkness and of gloom;
A day of clouds at morning spread,
In lurid gleams, presaging doom, Around the mountain's stormy head."

"The early morning was cloudy, with indications of coming thunder storms, and even when the sun rose toward the zenith and there were but few distinctly marked clouds, it was so dark that it was almost impossible to read except by candle-light. What clouds there were were strange and lurid, and it is said, shadows were cast in all directions, irrespective of the position of the sun, unusual refractions and reflections playing their part in the phenomena of the upper air. When rain fell, the water was presently covered with a peculiar scum, which on the Merrimac River was several inches thick, as it also was along the shores of several other New England rivers. Peculiar vapors descended from the clouds, while others ascended from the earth to meet and mingle with them. As is said generally to be the case in unusual disturbances of nature, birds and domestic animals showed great distress, huddling together and uttering cries of alarm. According to observers in New England, where, as has been said, the phenomena were most marked, the intensity of the darkness was greatest between ten and eleven o'clock in the morning.

"It continued throughout the day, but the degree of obscurity varied at different places; at some, the sun was seen at the darkest hour, while at others it was wholly invisible. People left their employments and thronged to the churches in terror as great as that of the beasts of the field, and the ministers held up their sins before them and retold the history of men and nations swept from the face of the earth by the Lord in his anger at their iniquities. A story has come down to us which is referable to a name commonly given in New England to those portentous hours—that of Davenport's Dark Day. The Connecticut Legislature was in session, and as the gloom settled down more and more frightfully, the members cried that it was the day of Judgment, and a motion was made to adjourn. Then arose Colonel Abraham Davenport and said, 'Mr. Speaker, it is either the day of Judgment or it is not. If it is not, there is no need of adjournment. If it is, I desire to be found doing my duty. I move that candles be brought and that we proceed to business,' a motion which brought the legislators to their senses.

"As the day wore on, the excitement and dread foreboding of what was coming increased. The moon was to rise at nine o'clock, and it was hoped her beams would dispel the gloom; but at eight o'clock the darkness was such that the earth could not be distinguished from the sky, and when the hour arrived at which, according to the almanac, the moon should rise, nothing was to be seen of her, and till toward morning her course could not be traced in the heavens. There was little sleep throughout New England that night, but the morning of the 20th dawned bright and beautiful, dispelling the terror as it dispelled the gloom. No satisfactory explanation of these strange phenomena has ever been offered by science, and Herschel said of the day, that 'it was one of those phenomena of nature which will always be read with interest, but which philosophy is at a loss to explain.'"

The following is from a paper in Connecticut:—

"THE DARK DAY OF 100 YEARS AGO.

"To-day is the centennial anniversary of the famous dark day which threw the whole of the New England States into much consternation and dread. Doughty Abraham Davenport, member of the general assembly from Stamford, did not scare worth a cent. He was one of the true Puritan stock, who was ready for the Lord's command at any time. An aged lady of old-time 'Norridge' used to tell the story of the wonderful day and its effects on the then East Chelsea district, in a portion of which, known as 'Swallow-all' (the Broadway or Washington street of that period), she resided. She was a fair maiden of sixteen, in May, 1780, and the writer of this has often listened to her reminiscences of 'ye olden times in Norridge.' The gloom began to be felt about eleven o'clock, and every one was struck with terror. Neighbors gathered in the lanes and dooryards, the fowls went to roost, and while some said their prayers others walked the fields in aimless dread. The relater said that the night succeeding the dark day was the darkest night ever known—darkness that might be felt, as she insisted. Few went to their beds, and she remembers going to the door with her parents and calling to the neighbors, none daring to venture out of their houses, to know if it was well with them, and if anything mysterious had happened in their dwellings. This being the 'perihelion year,' perhaps we may expect something marvelous from the near visit of the mighty planet Jupiter; but I doubt if Jupiter himself could produce more of a bobbery than the famous dark days did to our fathers and mothers in 'Swallow-all.'"

PAUL SAILING ON THE SABBATH.

BY H. WREN.

IT is common for seventh-day advocates to urge that the meeting spoken of in Acts 20:7 took place, not at eleven o'clock in the morning on Sunday, but at "early candle lighting" Saturday evening; and then proceed to show that, when Sunday really came, Paul was traveling on foot from Troas to Assos, while Luke and his other companions were at sea, under full sail.

This is all proved so snugly that the Sunday cause itself is sent afloat without Paul or any other inspired man aboard. Then an appeal is made about as follows: "Show me where Paul and other inspired men are found thus engaged on the Sabbath, and I will give up its defense."

By-and-by somebody comes forward and says he "has found it." He says that Paul and this very same inspired Luke did spend the Sabbath before their arrival at Troas in travel by ship. He proves by Acts 20:6 that they staid at Troas seven days, and then left on Sunday or Monday. This would throw their arrival there on the previous Sunday or Monday.

Then, he says, the five days previous to their arrival were spent in sailing from Philippi to Troas according to Acts 20:6, which says: "We sailed away from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and came unto them to Troas in five days." He then calls upon the seventh day advocate to surrender his cause; for the Sabbath was surely one of those five days. His argument seems to have some point at first, but soon loses all its force in view of the following plain facts:—

Three of those five days were not necessary to that voyage, under ordinary circumstances. Luke does not say that they spent the five days sailing; but that they "came to Troas in five days" after leaving Philippi. To show that two days only were necessary for this voyage, we refer to Acts 16:11, 12, which says: "Loosing from Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothracia, and the next day to Neapolis; and from thence to Philippi." Here the same distance is passed over in two days, but in the opposite direction. Hence, three of those five days were not required by the distance nor by the ordinary incidents of a voyage over that route.

Those three days, then, must have been spent in delays, either voluntary or involuntary. If voluntary, they may have stopped at one, or perhaps a number, of the islands of the Grecian sea, which was full of inhabited islands. Some of those islands are shown by maps to lie right on the line they must have sailed over. The fact is, that, in the voyage described in Acts 16:11, 12, they did stop at Samothracia, one of those islands. No doubt they stopped there again on this voyage.

Now, having shown that they stopped at some place, or places, three days during the voyage, let it be proven that one of those days was not the Sabbath; and that they did not stop at least on one day because it was the Sabbath. I have no doubt but that was one reason of their stopping, if their delay was voluntary. If their delay was involuntary,—that is, caused by winds or calms,—then it would not have been an instance of disregarding the Sabbath.

Conybeare and Howson think that the delay was caused by the weather. They say:—

"The voyage seemed to begin unfavorably. The space between Neapolis [Philippi's seaport] and Troas could easily be sailed over in two days with a fair wind; and this was the time occupied when the apostle made the passage on his first coming into Europe. On this occasion the voyage occupied five days. We have no means of deciding whether the ship's progress was retarded by calms or by contrary winds. Either of these causes of delay might equally be expected in the changeable weather of those seas."—Life and Epistles of Paul, vol. ii. pp. 204, 205.

Thus the last hope of casting a shadow upon the Sabbath of inspiration "vanishes like some fair creation of industrious magic."

THE TIME OF TROUBLE.

BY C. LAWTON.

"AND at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book." Dan. 12:1.

We as a people believe that this time of trouble is but a little way in the future; yet how many are putting forth efforts corresponding with their faith? Oh that all were seeking earnestly to form characters by the high and holy standard of God's word. This should be the case with every one who professes to be a child of God, and more especially with those who believe that the terrible events of the last days are just before us. We have far more reason to believe this than that many years are to intervene between this and the coming of Christ.

We have no time to lose, indulging the thought and even saying by our actions that the Lord delayeth his coming. Those who make up their minds to this are very apt to become careless and indifferent, and to think there is no need of using their means at present to advance the work of God; they feel no interest in the tract society, or in the work generally, and soon lose all concern for themselves and others, and before they are aware, are immersed in cares and worldly-mind-the country of the Bechuanas. The total area is 114,360 square miles, and the population—according to the official returns of 1877—is 300,000; probably a rough estimate, from which little can be known as to the fighting strength of the people who have defied the power of the British empire. Potscherfstroem, the seat of government, is by land 960 miles south-east of Cape Town. The region is described as a vast plateau, sloping to the north, supported by the coast line of mountains, which, presenting a bold mural buttress or escarpment to the low country at their feet, stretch away on their western flank into immense undulating plains. The Boers, though originally Dutch, are now very considerably mixed by intermarriages with European refugees and emigrants from Cape Colony and Natal, as well as the natives. Still, the Dutch characteristics largely predominate, and while the standard of education is said to be low, the people know enough to govern themselves and hate the foreign yoke. In religion they are Protestants, and the Bible and hymn book are almost their only literature.—Christian Advocate.

—The policy of the new Spanish cabinet promises to be marked by a liberal and tolerant spirit, strangely in contrast with the contracted and illiberal course of that which preceded it. A broad programme has been laid out, not only for Spain, but for her colonies also. All press prosecutions are to be suspended, and all journalists imprisoned in any part of the Spanish domain are to be liberated; the amplest form of speech, of voting, and of public meetings is to be allowed all Spanish subjects; the professors who were expelled from the Spanish universities through priestly influence during the last administration, are to be reinstated; the educational interests of Cuba are to be advanced by the establishment of a university at Havana, and the liberation of the slaves in the Spanish West Indies is to be encouraged by giving the most liberal interpretation to the emancipation act.—Interior.

—Russia proposes to convoke a preparatory commission, as was done previous to the emancipation of the serfs, to consider in what form representatives of the people can participate in the consideration of State matters, —a long stride toward popular government.

The State house at St. Paul, Minn., caught fire recently. The fire occurred when both branches of the legislative body were in session, and the members escaped by means of a ladder. The loss on the building is about $100,000. The Supreme-court and historical libraries were destroyed.

—The Earl of Shaftsbury recently stated that there are 500,000 persons in London who never hear the gospel, and that the only way to reach them with it is by special services in theaters and mission halls. He expresses his depressing conviction that the masses are spiritually ten times worse than they were twenty years ago.

—The Italian bark Ajace, from Antwerp to New York, was wrecked off Rockaway beach in the storm of Thursday, March 3. The crew consisted of fifteen men. Two of them became desperate and committed suicide; the others with one exception, were washed overboard, and drowned.

—Speaking of the foreign commerce of the United States, the Scientific American says: "The Secretary of the Treasury reports that the value of merchandise exported from the United States for the single month of December, 1880, was $98,856,632, the largest monthly export ever made in the history of the country. The total exports for the year 1880 were $889,649,840; imports during the same period, $696,803,433."

—On the 27th inst., a severe engagement occurred between the British forces in South Africa and the Boers. The British suffered an overwhelming defeat. General Colley, the commander, was killed, and it is said that only sixty-two British soldiers escaped unharmed. General Colley will be succeeded by General Roberts, who conducted the Afghan campaign. General Roberts will probably reach the Transvaal by March 28. His troops will number about 5,000 men.

—The new governor of Madrid determined to suppress gambling; and as the first, step he locked up ten district inspectors in his office, so they could not warn the gamblers. Then at night, accompanied by the chief constable, he surprised twenty-four gambling houses, and took the players to prison. The Chicago Inter-Ocean thinks the mayor of that city might profitably take a lesson from the Spaniards, and lock up the detectives on the eve of every raid.

—The storm of Thursday, March 3, was very severe over nearly the whole country. In the Northwest, particularly in Wisconsin, it is said to be the heaviest snow-fall ever known. Trains were snow-bound, business was suspended, and in many places actual suffering threatened the people on account of the lack of transportation. On the Atlantic coast the storm was accompanied with severe gales, and many ships were wrecked.

—President Garfield has selected the following cabinet: For Secretary of State, James G. Blaine, of Maine; Secretary of the Treasury, William Windom, of Minnesota; Secretary of War, Robert T. Lincoln, of Illinois; Secretary of the Navy, William H. Hunt, of Louisiana; Secretary of the Interior, Samuel J. Kirkwood, of Iowa; Postmaster General, Thomas James, Jr., of New York; Attorney General, Wayne Mac Veagh, of Pennsylvania.

—A young girl residing in Hull, P. Q., renounced the Catholic faith, and made a public profession of the Protestant religion. Her friends and the priests made every effort to bring her back to allegiance to the Mother Church, but to no purpose. A few weeks since, a company of from sixty to seventy boisterous men, headed by the girl's brother-in-law, surrounded a Sunday-school procession in which she was walking, and forcibly removed her to the house of her brother-in-law. She was subsequently permitted to return to her Protestant friends.

—It is said of the inaugural ceremonies the 4th inst., that the throng of visitors at the capital was larger, the decorations of streets and buildings more profuse, the parade grander, the ball more brilliant, and the whole proceeding more satisfactory, than on any previous occasion of the kind. In his inaugural address, President Garfield spoke of the agricultural and financial interests of the country. He advises legislation to stamp out polygamy, and thinks it necessary that equal freedom of suffrage and protection of law be accorded to black and white citizens. General Garfield's mother accompanies him to the White House, and on this auspicious day was "the proudest and happiest woman in the world." And well she might be, when she remembered the days, when, a widow, in straitened circumstances, "she washed and cooked, toiled and saving that her children might be educated;" for her son has won his way to the honorable prominence he now enjoys by his own merit and energy. It is said that the President defers to her slightest wish with the same obedience he rendered her when a boy. Hers has always been the post of honor at the table, and however distinguished the guests present, she is invariably served first. This little white-haired matron, whose head barely reaches her son's elbow, came proudly forward, with tears in her eyes, to be first to receive him as he entered the Executive Mansion President of the United States, escorted by the grandest civic and military display Washington has ever witnessed.

IN MEMORIAM.

The following lines were written by Mrs. D. T. Taylor, in memory of her sister-in-law, Mrs. C. O. Taylor, who fell asleep Oct. 30, 1880, and whose death was noticed in REVIEW, Vol. 56, No. 19:—

SHE sleeps! The voyage of life is o'er, Outrode each stormy billow;
The fevered brow will throb no more
Upon death's quiet pillow.

She sleeps! The eye has done with tears,
The aching heart with sorrow;
The trembling bosom hides no fears,
No care for the to-morrow.

She sleeps! No sound of earth's turmoil,
No startling dreams shall waken;
Blest sleeper! 'mid life's fruitless toil
By slumber soft o'ertaken.

She sleeps! Hark! o'er the blessed dead
The word of promise spoken—
O death, the Mighty One hath said Thy fetters shall be broken.

"She sleeps! Oh, lay her gently down
To long and peaceful slumber,
Till God shall all his ransomed crown,
And all his jewels number!"

LUCE.—Died of inflammation of the lungs, in Grant township, Monona Co., Iowa, our infant daughter, Blanche Lovilla, aged 2 months and 7 days. Remarks by Bro. S. W. Bird. Text, Rev. 21:4, second clause.

E. A. AND ISABELLE LUCE.

CAMP.—Died of injuries received from a fall, at Duke Center, Pa., Feb. 21, 1881, Harmon Camp, aged about 75 years. Bro. Camp embraced the Sabbath about nine years ago, by reading. He was a faithful member of the tract society at Portville, N. Y., where he resided. He died at his son's, where he had gone on business. We feel our loss; but our loss is his gain. D. B. WELCH.

STARLING.—Died near Tidouate, Pa., Feb. 6, 1881, Elisha Starling, aged 92 years, 3 months, and 23 days. His health seemed good, until about three days before his death, when he began to grow feeble, and continued to fail until he fell asleep, not seeming to suffer the least pain. He became interested in present truth about one year ago, and seemed anxious to live it out as far as he could comprehend it. Funeral discourse from Job 14:14. S. TAURSTON.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

LIFE hath its barren years,
When blossoms fall untimely down,
When ripened fruitage fails to crown
The summer toil, when Nature's frown Looks only on our tears.

Life hath its faithless days,
The golden promise of the morn,
That seemed for light and gladness born,
Meant only noontide wreck and scorn,
Hushed harp instead of praise.

Life hath its valleys, too,
Where we must walk with vain regret,
With mourning clothed, with wild rain wet,
Toward sunlight hopes that soon may set,
All quenched in pitying dew.

Life hath its harvest moons,
Its tasseled corn and purple-weighted vine,
Its gathered sheaves of grain,—the blessed sign
Of plenteous ripening, bread, and pure rich wine,
Full hearts for harvest tunes.

Life hath its hopes fulfilled,
Its glad fruitions, its blest-answered prayer,
Sweeter for waiting long, whose holy air,
Indrawn to silent souls, breathes forth its rare,
Grand speech by joy distilled.

Life hath its Tabor heights;
Its lofty mount of heavenly recognition,
Whose unveiled glories flash to earth munition
Of love, and truth, and clear intuition.
Hail, mount of all delights!

FALLING STARS.

BY H. WRNN.

FALLING stars are one of the signs of the second coming of the Lord. (Luke 21:25; Matt. 24:29; Rev. 6:13.) Their order, in the list of such signs, is next after the darkening of the sun and moon; and they are to fall in showers. For in Rev. 6:13 it is said they shall fall as figs from a fig-tree when shaken by the wind. In such a case, many figs would fall at once; and as this is the figure used to represent the falling stars, they must fall in the same manner, that is, many at a time, or in showers.

The sun was darkened in the year 1780, as there is abundant evidence to show. Since the year 1780, there have been numerous showers of falling stars, but no record of any prior to that year. The first shower of which astronomers have found any record took place in the year 1799, and the last in 1839; while between these there have been quite a number.

Their occurrence has presented the astronomers of the present generation with new questions to solve, and has caused them to modify their views of the solar system, in some particulars. Olmsted's Astronomy contains an account of falling stars, and of the investigations and conclusions of astronomers on the subject. Mr. Olmsted was professor of astronomy in Yale College, and one of the first astronomers of the day. He begins his discussion of the subject of meteors by saying:—

"The remarkable exhibitions of shooting stars which have occurred within a few years past, have excited great interest among astronomers, and led to some new views respecting the construction of the solar system. Their attention was first turned toward this subject by the great meteoric shower of Nov. 13, 1833. On that morning, from two o'clock until broad daylight, the sky being perfectly serene and cloudless, the whole heavens were lighted with a magnificent display of celestial fireworks. . . . Soon after this occurrence, it was ascertained that a similar meteoric shower had appeared in 1799, and what was remarkable, almost exactly at the same time of the year, namely, on the morning of the 12th of November; and it soon appeared, by accounts received from different parts of the world, that this phenomena had occurred on the same 13th of November, in 1830, 1831, and 1832." He proceeds to state that there were showers at the same time every year "until 1839, when, so far as is known, they ceased altogether." Also that "three other distinct periods of meteoric showers have been determined; one on the 9th of August, and (more rare) on the 21st of April and 7th of December respectively."—Olmsted's Astronomy by Snell, pp. 267, 268, 269.

The above account places before us all the meteoric showers known to astronomers. They are embraced in a period of forty years, commencing in 1799, and ending in 1839. This forty years may, therefore, be called the era of meteoric showers, or falling stars.

Some very interesting questions arise here. How was it that these events never took place until 1799–1839? The heavens and earth had stood nearly six thousand years, but there is no record of meteoric showers, or showers of falling stars, until this period. Why? And, never having transpired before, why did they now appear? Why did they continue to occur just long enough to get the attention of the world excited on the subject, and then cease? Was it all accident? Oh, says our scientific skeptic, Mr. Olmsted himself shows that they were produced by a "nebulous body" passing across, or near, the earth's orbit, or "with which the earth falls in, and near or through the borders of which it passes," causing the disturbances which resulted in those meteoric displays.

But where did that nebulous or meteoric body come from? and what design could there have been in its hovering about the orbit of our world forty years, and then disappearing? Can anybody tell? I think any one could tell, if it were known that the great Creator had a scheme of providence, or government, for this world, that contemplated such displays at that time. From the word of the living God who made and rules the earth and the heavens, we do learn that his providence, yea, his laws, fixed and unalterable, do require such events to take place at that time, as a herald to notify the inhabitants of earth that the Maker and Ruler of all worlds is about to visit them, in the person of his Son, attended by all those "morning stars" that sang creation's birth.

In the twenty-first chapter of Luke it is expressly stated that "there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars;" which signs are to be followed by the Son of man "coming with power and great glory." In the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, it is said, "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven." Then the powers of heaven are to be shaken, and the sign of the coming Son of man brought to view. The exiled prophet, in the sixth chapter of Revelation, describing what he had seen taking place just before "the heavens departed as a scroll," says, "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair; and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind."

Here are sublime and most impressive events that are to transpire but once in the history of earth. They are then to take place in a given order: First the sun is to be darkened; then the moon; then the stars are to fall, as the last solemn sign that precedes the visible glory that envelops the Son of man as he comes in the clouds of heaven. The sun and moon have been darkened in fulfillment of these predictions. The 19th of May, 1780, is well known to have been a "terrific dark day;" and at night of the same day, the moon gave no light, though it was at the full, and no clouds to intercept its light. These events in the sun and moon were to be succeeded by the falling stars,—falling like fruit from a tree, when shaken by the wind; that is, in great numbers at once.

After 1780, the time had come for the manifestation of falling stars. Did they appear? Let the foregoing account of Professor Olmsted answer. We have forty years devoted to the fulfillment of this sign. The era of falling stars arrives just when the movements of Divine Providence have brought us to that point where he has a design in causing such events. Is it not a plain and undeniable instance of prophecy and fulfillment? When God works, how plain the impress of divinity on his achievements! How manifest, not only his power, but his goodness likewise, in causing this last warning sign to linger so long in the heavens that our world might have long-continued notice of coming events. It reminds us of what the Holy Book says, "He is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." How solemn, and yet how thrilling, to see and know that our eyes shall soon behold the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory!

"His chariot will not long delay;
We hear its rumbling wheels, and pray, Triumphant Lord, appear."

MOST of the social distinctions which men make are arbitrary. That one man is rich and another is poor, that one man is an officer and another only a private, indicates no difference between the men. These arbitrary distinctions must all end. The only distinction which is real and eternal is that of character. The outer conditions may change without our consent; our characters will always be as we are, and by them we shall be classified. That we consider ourselves to be above others is rather a proof of our inferiority.

"Every person should have the heart to say with the old Roman, 'I am a man, and consider nothing that concerns humanity as above or beneath me.' If principle causes us to war against alcohol, it will cause us to advise against the use of tobacco as soon as we know that its use is evil. Appleton's Encyclopedia says: 'It is a nauseous and poisonous weed, of an acrid taste and disagreeable odor; in short, one whose only properties are deleterious.' Again: 'It is one of the most virulent poisons known, a drop of the concentrated solution being sufficient to kill a dog, and its vapor destroying birds.' This card would hardly hold the names of prominent scientists and physicians who have testified to what we have given and what follows.

"I. THE EFFECTS UPON THE BODY.

"The New Testament tells us to be 'holy both in body and in spirit'; to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God; that we are not our own, but belong unto God; and should therefore glorify God in our body and spirit, which are his. To do this we must heed the exhortation of Paul to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

"Here are some of the injuries to the body: It drains the system of saliva, for it does not take long for a tobacco-user to spit a pint of it. The waste of this precious fluid means disease of the digestive organs. Often the complexion is rendered sallow, and the face and body thin. Inveterate snuff-users have much trouble with their lungs. It irritates, and in some instances has been known to completely fill up, some of the small air cells. It is of great injury to the blood. Dr. Richardson tells us that if the blood is in a healthy condition, the microscope will reveal a small depression on each corpuscle. In inveterate smokers these depressions, though seen after a night's rest, disappear with the use of tobacco, the corpuscle resuming its puffed appearance. God, through the Bible and science, teaches us that 'the life is in the blood.' We cannot disarrange it, and remain healthy. You cannot injure the blood without injuring the brain, and thus the whole nerve system; for the brain is fed by the blood. Would impure food make you sick? So does impure blood sicken the brain. Tobacco, like alcohol, has a peculiar fondness for the heart. A prominent Kentucky physician told the writer that ninety per cent of the cases of functional derangement of the heart under his practice were caused by the use of tobacco. Its influence upon the nerves often weakens the eye-sight. Anton says: 'I am convinced that a soldier who is an inveterate smoker is incapable of leveling his musket and taking steady aim.' And as manhood is thus shorn of its strength, no wonder that General Markham said: 'Had the Turks never indulged in tobacco, they would have been as powerful in the Crimean war as in the days of the ancient sultans.' The question as to one cause of the degeneration of the proud blood of Castile is answered when we say that 'Spain is one vast smoke-house.' May not America take a lesson?

"II. THE EFFECTS UPON THE MIND.

"Lizars, an English surgeon, writes: 'I have invariably found that patients addicted to tobacco-smoking were in spirit cowardly, and deficient in manly fortitude to undergo any surgical operation.' Memory, too, often suffers; for in the same degree that the body is unsound, the mind will be also. The difference between pupils who use it and those who do not is very marked.

"III. THE EFFECTS UPON THE MORAL SENSE.

"Said Dr. Graham: 'Tobacco has impaired the delicacy of the moral sense. It has in some sense impaired the nice powers of the understanding to perceive moral truth.' Prof. Mead, of Oberlin College, Ohio, said: 'The tobacco habit tends to deaden the sense of honor, as well as of decency.' Statistics reveal the fact that ninety per cent of those who drink alcoholic beverages use tobacco! Its use has led many a man to thirst for alcohol. The principle that causes us to abstain from strong drink, cuts off tobacco also.

"IV. THE EFFECTS SOCIALLY.

"Of the social heart we can say, as Hamlet said of his mother's, that 'custom hath brazed it so that it is proof and bulwark against sense.' We must not look upon crime too often. We first tolerate, then embrace. On our railroads the smokers have to be put off by themselves. They are not fit for ladies' society while they are using it. Look at the floor where that nicely-dressed gentleman sits. Don't be shocked. Custom protects him. Our places of worship are sometimes sickening. 'We build churches in which to worship God and chew tobacco!' Even the love you bear your wife and the sacredness of the hearth-stone cannot keep the latter clean. Thus home, the dearest place on earth, is degraded by its use. 'But not every one who uses tobacco is seriously injured.' No, and not every one who uses whisky has delirium tremens. Not every one bitten by a rattle-snake or mad-dog dies. Do not attempt to stop its use until you have first made up your mind to quit it forever. You are a slave. Assert your manhood ere it is too late, and be free!"

THE WAY TO WIN.

In one of the battles of the Revolution it is narrated that a young officer found himself in charge of a battery. The general sent from time to time to draw off guns from that battery, until the officer was left in charge of a single gun, and soon all the men that were serving that gun were shot down with the exception of himself. He could see nothing through the mist and the smoke but the flashes of the enemy's guns in front of him, but he stood bravely to his post, loading and firing, loading and firing, out into the darkness and the smoke; and by-and-by the bugles rang out behind him to cease firing, and the smoke lifted in front of him, and he was the sharer in a glorious victory.

When he told that story, he said, "I understood how victory, for me, meant loading and firing my own gun." Dear friends, it is the same with us. That is the meaning of victory, whether in the battle of the world or in the battle of the Lord, that each one of us should be loading and firing our own gun, intent on doing our own share of the work of the Lord. Let me send a message to our brethren in the field: Brethren, the clouds and the fog and the smoke of the battle are all around you; the noise and the shout and the din are sounding in your ears; men are falling at your right hand and at your left. Let not your hearts shrink; stand ye, brethren beloved and sisters beloved, stand ye each to your own gun! Soon, soon shall ye hear—not the bugle sound of an earthly general, but the trumpet of our Lord and God ring in your ears; and those tones shall be the ushering in—not of a partial and an imperfect or a patched-up peace on earth, but the advent of the Prince of Peace himself. Then shall you and we find that we are the sharers in a glorious victory, and that we have not served our guns in vain.—J. Herbert Tritton, Esq.

SPECIAL MENTION.

THE ZEALOTS OF THE VATICAN.

THE zealots, who dream still of the return of the temporal power, have gradually subjugated the spirit of Leo XIII., whose utterances when he first ascended the Papal throne were of a different character from the later ones. The later Allocutions are in the spirit and almost with the words of the doleful speeches made by Pius IX. from 1870 until his death. That of the 29th of June attributes the murder of the Czar Alexander and the other recent attempts against the lives of rulers,—to which he would also have added the wounding of Garfield, which occurred a few days later,—to the reform and the "false philosophy" of the eighteenth century. Communism, Socialism, Nihilism,—all the moral epidemics of our times,—are due to the declining influence of the Roman Church and loss of the divine right of kings to reign. As kings have no efficacious means of remedying these evils and restoring public discipline, the encyclical shows the importance of the influence of the church to aid them. This Allocution produced far more excitement in Germany than in Italy, where it passed almost unnoticed. The Germans say that "never was a greater insult made to the Protestant Church" than to accuse it of the social disorders of our times, in reality the fruit of centuries of Papism.

The last Allocution of the pope is intended to excite the Papal world against Italy for the events of the 13th of July. The language is extremely violent, and the Liberals are accused of having organized a demonstration to insult the remains of the late pontiff. But the trial of the six young men arrested that night has convinced the Roman population that they had no such design, and that the provocation came from the organizers of the procession. Such is the party which is dominant in the Vatican.—Rome Correspondence of N. Y. Observer.

—Since the famous "dark day" of May 19, 1780, there has been no such remarkable phenomenon as was witnessed Tuesday, Sept. 6, in New England and Central New York, and later in Virginia. For several days the sun had been obscured by haze or smoke from the extensive forest fires, but on that day, though no fog or haze was perceptible, the sun was obscured, or seemed to hang in the sky like a burnished copper ball, sending out no rays of light. A yellowish, saffron light pervaded the atmosphere, while within doors it was so dark that gas had to be lighted. There was an unusual hue upon the grass and all vegetation. Many delicately-colored flowers faded out of sight, and the colors of ribbons and dress patterns in the stores could not be distinguished. The unusual aspect of sky and earth struck terror to many hearts, and the belief that the end of all things was approaching was widespread. The weather-wise predicted hurricanes or cyclones, and scientific observers attributed it to the uncommon presence of smoke and aqueous vapors absorbing all the color rays of the sun, except those which make the orange and red light.—Christian Weekly, Sept. 17.

—It is pleasant to note the hearty good will with which the French are accepting the part assigned them in the ceremonies connected with the Yorktown Centennial. In a letter to the committee, the Marquis de Rochambeau announces his own coming, together with representatives of the Lafayette family, and alludes to the probability of numerous officers, representing the different departments of the French government, being present to assist in the celebration. The French West India squadron has been ordered to take part in the naval demonstrations, and to act as escort to the French delegations, which will include officials of the highest rank. French troops, representing different arms of the service, are to participate in the field parade, and an address is to be read by a descendant of one of the brave Frenchmen who helped to win our independence. In short, there is to be such a fraternization as will best recall the glorious struggle, and as will give to the celebration a broad national character.—Interior.

—The news from Arizona limits the Indian outbreak to the White Mountain Apaches and Nana's band of Mescaleros and Navajos. Gen. Carr's command is in no immediate danger, and the troops being pushed forward will soon give force enough at Fort Apache to resist any attack made upon it. The hostiles are believed to be off to the south-west of the fort, where they are confining their operations to the slaughter of defenseless ranchmen, couriers, and miners. The governors of Arizona and New Mexico have asked the War Department for arms to supply citizens in exposed settlements, and the military and civil authorities are working in thorough harmony. Whenever settlements are threatened and cannot be reached by the military, couriers will be sent to notify the volunteer forces. The prompt concentration of troops and the organization of volunteer soldiers will, it is hoped, prevent a recurrence of the massacres, if they do not confine the rising to very narrow limits.—Interior.

COVERED WITH GOLD.—It is a curious fact that Russia, one of the poorest of civilized countries, makes a greater parade of wealth in one respect than any other State. The domes of all the great churches in St. Petersburg, Moscow, and other large towns, are plated with gold nearly one-quarter of an inch thick. The new church of the Saviour, dedicated and opened in Moscow last August, represents a value of fully $15,000,000. The Isaac Cathedral in St. Petersburg may be safely credited with at least twice that amount. So strong, however, is the old Slav belief in the inviolable sanctity of "holy places," that, during countless seasons of wide-spread and bitter distress, no attempt has ever been made to plunder the gold thus temptingly exposed. Indeed, one of the finest churches in St. Petersburg, the Kazan Cathedral, owes its massive shrine to a voluntary offering of the plunder taken by the Cossacks in 1812.

—The situation in Northern Africa is full of peril to France, and the indications are that she will wish herself safely out of the scrape before the occupation is accomplished. The Arabs are everywhere in open revolt, the climate is unhealthy, the heat extreme, and the large reinforcements sent out from France seem to serve no purpose save to garrison a few of the coast towns. In Tunis the authority of the Bey has ceased to be recognized by the natives, and the military occupation of the city of Tunis and some other points has become necessary. Kairwan still holds out against the Bey's troops, to whom its subjection was entrusted. In the engagement between the French your kindness in sending me the papers and tracts. You have mistaken me for my father; but it makes no difference, as my father and mother live with me. We both read them with much interest, and thank you for them, and hope that much good may be done for the Master's cause through the influence of your paper. We wish it much success. Write to us soon." This brother has received tracts on nearly all the leading points of our faith.

The following is from a Baptist minister in Hampton, Va.: "I am happy to say that I have received the papers you have been sending me; and I know of no paper that I like as well as I do the Signs; but I am not able to pay for it now. If you will be so kind as to keep sending it to me, I will pay you for it as soon as I can."

We are of good courage in the work of the Lord, and it is our purpose to increase rather than diminish our present missionary efforts.

BREAD CAST ON THE WATERS.

DURING the summer of 1877, I was in Southern Georgia, Brooks Co. I spoke publicly, as the way opened. At one place a Mr. W. was much interested. He became convinced that the seventh day was the Sabbath, and was interested in the nature of man and the state of the dead. He sent to the REVIEW Office for tracts; but never took a decided position on the truth. His daughter, however, commenced keeping the Sabbath. Some over a year ago he gave one of the tracts on the nature of man and the state of the dead to Bro. L., a minister. He read, and became enlightened. Only a few months ago Bro. L. heard Bro. M. (who has been keeping the Sabbath since I was there) say he would give his mule to any one that would show Scripture for Sunday-keeping. That created an inquiry. Bro. M. sent him papers, and a tract on the two laws. He and his wife are now keeping the Sabbath. He is preaching it, and other truths of the third angel's message as he can see them. When I left that county in the fall of 1877, there were three families keeping the Sabbath. One person gave it up, and another died; Bro. M. remained true. At this time there are three entire families, and a part of two others, regarding the rest-day of the Lord.

—How true it is that till God speaks to the heart of man, man cannot understand the language of God which is uttered around him and over him and beneath him! As there are times when we stand in the midst of nature as if we were in a church, when a joyful song of praise is springing from each breast, and we cannot help but sing also, being drawn into the stream of devotion, and carried along with it; so at other times how mute all creation seems to us, as though all pursued its way alone without a hand in Heaven to guide it! All depends upon whether God speaks in us.—Tholuck.

SPECIAL MENTION.

THE DARK DAY OF 1881.

A MORE full and comprehensive description of the dark day of Sept. 6, 1881, than that given in the REVIEW of Sept. 20, will be interesting to our readers. We therefore give the following from the Springfield (Mass.) Republican of Sept. 9, 1881:—

New England experienced Tuesday the same atmospheric phenomena which distinguished the famous "Dark Day" of 1780; in lesser degree its characteristics were repeated, and over very nearly the same extent of country. In this city the day began with a slow gathering of fog from all the water-courses in the early hours; the thin clouds that covered the sky at midnight seemed to crowd together and descend upon the earth, and by sunrise the atmosphere was dense with vapor, which limited vision to very short distances, and made those distances illusory; and as the sun rose invisibly behind, the vapors became a thick, brassy canopy through which a strange yellow light pervaded the air and produced the most peculiar effects on the surface of the earth. This color and darkness lasted until about three o'clock in the afternoon, once in a while lightening, and then again deepening, so that during a large part of the time nothing could be done conveniently in-doors without artificial light. The unusual complexion of the air wearied and pained the eyes. The grass assumed a singular bluish brightness, as if every blade were tipped with light. Yellow blossoms turned pale and gray, a row of sunflowers looking ghastly; orange nasturtiums lightened; pink roses flamed, lilac-hued phlox grew pink, and blue flowers were transformed into red. Luxuriant morning glories that had been blossoming in deep blue during the season now were dressed in splendid magenta; rich blue clematis donned an equally rich maroon; fringed gentians were crimson in the fields. There was a singular luminousness on every fence and roof-ridge, and the trees seemed to be ready to fly into fire. The light was mysteriously devoid of r-refraction. One sitting with his back to a window could not read the newspaper if his shadow fell upon it; he was obliged to turn the paper aside to the light. Gas was lighted all over the city, and it burned with a sparkling pallor, like the electric light. The electric lights themselves burned blue, and were perfectly useless, giving a more unearthly look to everything around. The darkness was not at all like that of night, nor were animals affected by it to any remarkable extent. The birds kept still, it is true, the pigeons roosting on ridge-poles instead of flying about, but generally the chickens were abroad. A singular uncertainty of distance prevailed, and commonly the distances seemed shorter than reality. When in the afternoon the sun began to be visible through the strange mists, it was like a pink ball amidst yellow cushions,—just the color of one of those mysterious balls of rouge which we see at the drug stores, and which no woman ever buys. It was not till between five and six o'clock that the sun had sufficiently dissipated the mists to resume its usual clear gold, and the earth returned to its every-day aspect; the grass resigning its unnatural brilliancy, and the purple daisies no longer fainting into pink. The temperature throughout the day was very close and oppressive, and the physical effect was one of heaviness and depression.

What was observed here was the experience of all New England, so far as heard from, of Albany and New York City, and also in Central and Northern New York. We have dispatches and letters from Portland, Me., from Boston, Providence, Norwich, New Haven, New York, Utica and all over Southern Vermont, Connecticut and Western Massachusetts. Schools were dismissed in various places, as indeed study was perforce suspended in those which kept up their sessions; and many factories also let out their hands when their facilities for lighting were insufficient. The Bachelier shoe factory at North Brookfield was one of them, and the Hartford carpet company at Thompsonville, where it is said that the operatives were afraid the final trump was going to sound. There were traces of superstition in various quarters. Naturally, many associated the strange darkness with the removal of President Garfield, and some felt as if it signified his death. Others thought of the end of the world, as so many did on the celebrated dark day of one hundred and one years ago.

The "Dark Day" par excellence was May 19, 1780, when, after several days of close, hot weather, characterized by a thick, smoky atmosphere, between ten and eleven o'clock in the forenoon, the skies thickened, and a fearful darkness set in which lasted until the following midnight, or from twelve to fifteen hours. This darkness covered all New England, extending west as far as Albany, southward along the coast, and to the east and north as far as white settlements extended. Birds stopped singing, and fowls went to roost, the cocks crowed at midday, as if it were midnight, animals showed terror, and the superstitious howled. Then it was that Abraham Davenport, in the Connecticut Legislature, said that he proposed to be found at his duty if the day of Judgment did come, and moved that candles be brought in. Prof. Williams, of Harvard College, made record that day of a steady fall in the barometer, and noted many of the phenomena of color we have described as occurring yesterday. The darkness of the following night was tremendous, so that there was literally no light, and though the full moon rose early in the evening, the heavens and the earth were indistinguishable.

THE PHENOMENAL YEAR.

WHETHER the approach of several of the planets to the perihelion has any influence on the meteorological conditions of our planet or not, one thing is indisputable, that we have celestial and terrestrial prodigies without number.

The sun is covered with spots; three comets have tracked their course ominously across our skies; a band of light four or five degrees in width spanned the heavens over New England and New York a few evenings ago; the sun has been destructively blazing over our country, cutting short the crops of a continent; the day was recently so darkened in its going forth that people were compelled to burn gas at mid-day along the coasts of New England; a large area in Michigan has been swept by forest fires, by which several villages, numerous farms, with all their improvements, crops and stock, and hundreds of human beings, have been burned up; Canada has been a-blaze in her extensive woodland; over the lakes such a veil of smoke has rested that vision scarcely extended for one-eighth of a mile, and vessels had to make their way through an atmospheric ocean of smeary duskiess painful to the eyes and injurious to the lungs, navigating by guess and avoiding collisions with invisible vessels by the sounding of fog-horns; the East, too, is parched, and the flames have spread desolation in different localities; the monarch of the largest empire on earth has fallen a prey to the assassin's madness; the president of this great republic has fallen in consequence of a wound inflicted by one of the serpent's slimy seed; volcanoes are pouring out fiery deluges; earthquakes ingulph cities and horribly mar the fairest landscapes; cyclones sweep the country with the besom of destruction; the floods drown out whole districts; the tidal waves roll inland; grim-visaged war lays his blood-red hand upon his sword, and sounds the tocsin of present and coming wars; men's hearts are so failing for fear that reason reels, and insanity is almost an epidemic; the end is not yet. All these are only the preliminary travelling throes that will bring to birth the great tribulation. We are living in a grand and awful time. Watch and pray.—Selected.

—A new aspect seems about to be put upon the opium question by the arrival at Simla, in India, of an envoy of the Chinese government, who will investigate the matter with a view of suggesting a new treaty to the British government. The prominent Chinese statesmen are earnest in their determination to demand the absolute exclusion of the noxious drug from the free ports of their empire. It will be a very serious question for the British government to consider, whether they shall dare to continue to force the traffic against the moral sentiment of the best portion of their own people, especially as now the Chinese are no longer the submissive and feeble nation that were compelled to yield to the superior force that imposed the poison upon them.—Christian Weekly.

—French archaeologists are just now excited over the discovery, in Algiers, of an ancient Moorish city, buried for ages beneath the sands of the desert. It lies in the environs of the Ouargla oasis in the Sahara, and has been identified with the ancient city of Cadrata. Despite the fact that it is covered to the depth of eight or ten metres with sand, its monuments and buildings are said to be in an unusually perfect state of preservation. A mosque and nine houses have already been excavated, and a rich treasure of elaborately carved marble arches, columns, inscriptions, etc., unearthed. The site of the city is said to exactly resemble that of Pompeii; and the city itself is supposed to have formed one of the many which historians describe as having flourished centuries ago amid these

I see him, and not far. I surely see him, and even nigh. Through the darkness and confusion and conflict of the hour, I see, out on the battling deep, the wings of mighty cherubims and the burning wheels of the coming of the Son of man; and before the jasper throne I hear the angel of the seventh trumpet crying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever," and hallelujahs are ringing through all the earth and all the heavens.—Presbyterian.

DAY-BREAK.

BY EMMA M. FRENCH.

THE darkness of night is fading
From the hills of earth away;
Far in the dim horizon
Gleams a welcome streak of gray,
For although 'tis dull and cheerless,
It betokens coming day.

Even now the gray is turning
To pale yellow—now to red;
For the sun in stately grandeur
Is uprising from his bed,
And o'er the works of nature
Is a soft, bright radiance shed.

And now on my raptured vision
Bursts a wondrous glory-light;
For in full and blazing splendor
Day's proud king has merged in sight;
And before him, with winged fleetness,
Hath fled every shade of night.

And the rosy light of morning
Fills the earth, the air, the sky,
Bringing thoughts of joy and gladness,
Gratitude to God on high,
Faintly shadowing the glory
That shall greet us "by and by."

For another day is breaking;
Now appears the "streak of gray;"
Brighter, brighter still 'tis growing,
Driving doubts and fears away;
Onward, onward, faster hastening,
Soon will break eternal day.

THE WONDERS OF A CENTURY.—No. 16.

BY A. SMITH.

THE DARK DAY.

ALTHOUGH similar phenomena had been witnessed Oct. 21, 1716, and again at the West, over a vast extent of country, Oct. 19, 1762, the dark day of May 19, 1780, constitutes the one that is pre-eminently the dark day since that upon which our Lord was crucified.

Concerning this phenomena, Webster, in his dictionary, edition of 1869, says: "The dark day, May 19, 1780, so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day, extending over all New-England. In some places, persons could not see to read common print in the open air for several hours together. . . . The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known." It is said that the weight of the atmosphere gradually decreased during the day. From lowlands there were constant accessions of vapor, forming a stratum but little above the hill-tops; and the color of the clouds was a compound of faint red, yellow, and brown. Green objects were intensified in hue, verging to blue, and white objects were highly tinged with yellow.

Light showers fell occasionally throughout the day, and the rain water was thick, dark, and sooty, and a black scum was seen floating on the Merrimac; but no nitrous or sulphurous substance could be detected by the tests applied. There was but very little wind; in some places, according to account, it was perfectly calm.

In some directions the hills could be seen at a distance of many miles, while intermediate objects were obscured or darkened. Bodies seemed to cast a shade in every direction. Candles were lighted in the houses at midday, the birds and domestic fowls retired to roost, and the domestic animals sought their stable or their fold.

Business was in some cases suspended, and a gloom or dread seemed to rest upon the people, who generally believed that the Judgment day had come, or was impending. "The darkness of the following evening," says Mr. Tenney, of Exeter, N. H., as quoted by Dr. Gage to the Historical Society, "was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes was equally invisible with the blackest velvet." This darkness was all the more remarkable from the fact that the moon had full the day before, and an eclipse therefore was impossible. No other event since the beginning of the Christian era has even approximately fulfilled the prediction of Christ that, as a sign of his second appearing "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." Mark 13:24.

The fact that the phenomenon was a local one also locates the causes, however mysterious or unknown, that produced it, the sun and moon being only relatively darkened, just as we understand the terms rising or setting of the sun, not as actual but as relative events, due entirely to mundane progression; but this fact does not invalidate the phenomenon as a fulfillment of prophecy, or as one of the most mysterious and unaccountable freaks of nature ever known or recorded.

OUR WORDS.

BY MRS. SARAH M. SWAN.

OF all the gifts which the Creator has bestowed upon his creatures, perhaps there is no greater blessing than the power of speech, and it is certain that no blessing has been more sadly perverted and abused. "The tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things." James 3:5. The wise man informs us that life and death are in the power of the tongue; and our Saviour tells us, that by our words we shall be justified or condemned. "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." James 3:2.

When we realize that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," we see the need of a thorough cleansing of the fountain, that the stream issuing from it may be pure. Jesus has left us an example that we should follow in his steps. He "did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth." "As he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation." Our precious Saviour "was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin;" he endured trials and sufferings such as we can never know, but no words of murmuring or impatience ever fell from his lips. When he was reviled, he reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not. He was ever ready to speak words of love and tenderness, to sympathize with the afflicted, and to kindly reprove the erring; and even in the agonies of death he prayed for his murderers.

Are we followers of this perfect example of holiness, and do words of anger, or of impatience and fretfulness, ever pass our lips? Do we try to injure those who have injured us, instead of obeying the instruction of the Master in Matt. 18:15? Do we talk of the faults of others in their absence, and judge them harshly? Read James 4:11, 12: "Speak not evil one of another, brethren. He that speaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law; but if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge. There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy; who art thou that judgest another?" Do we indulge in foolish talking and jesting, forgetting that for every idle word we speak we must give account in the day of Judgment? Or if we have, through the grace of God, put away these things, are there not still greater victories for us to attain? Is our conversation in Heaven, from whence we look for the appearing of our Saviour? "Seeing then," says the apostle, "that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness?"

We are not our own; Jesus has bought us with his own precious blood. All the talents which he has given us belong to him, and he expects us to use them to his glory. Oh that we might so realize this that our tongues might be sanctified to his service! If we truly love the Lord with all our hearts, if he is to us the "chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely," we shall delight to speak to others of his charms; we shall long to "tell to all around" what a dear Saviour we have found; "his praises will flow spontaneously from our lips." "Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me; and to him that ordereth his conversation aright will I show the salvation of God." Ps. 50:23.

If we realize fully the shortness of time, and the greatness of the work before us, we shall feel that we have no time for idle or unprofitable conversation. If our treasure is laid up in Heaven, if our hearts are there, we shall love to talk of our heavenly home. The glories in reserve for the people of God will so enrapture our hearts that it will be our greatest pleasure to speak of them to others. Oh! let us no longer talk about the trials of the way. Let us not talk darkness and discouragement, but let us talk of the "blessed hope," and thus inspire in our own hearts, and in the hearts of those around us, faith, hope, and courage. "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my redeemer." Ps. 19:19. Let us think and talk more of that

"Happy day, when earth so bright
In Eden robes shall bloom again."

The Christian's hope is soon to be realized, our heavenly home is almost in sight, and it is time that we learn to speak the language of Canaan.

"The Lord is coming! let this be
The herald note of jubilee;
And when we meet and when we part,
The salutation from the heart."

LATER YEARS THE BEST YEARS.

To a man of middle life, existence is no longer a dream, but a reality. He has not much to look forward to, for the character of his life is generally fixed by that time. His profession, his home, his occupation, will be, for the most part, what they are now. He will make few new acquaintances—no new friends. It is the solemn thought connected with middle age that life's last business is begun in earnest; and it is then, midway between the cradle and the grave, that a man begins to look back and marvel with a kind of remorseful feeling that he let the days of youth go by half enjoyed. It is the pensive autumn feeling—it is the sensation of half sadness that we experience when the longest day of the year is passed, and every day that follows is shorter, and the lights fainter, and the feeble shadows tell that nature is hastening with gigantic footsteps to her winter grave. So does man look back upon his youth. When the first gray hairs become visible; when the unwelcome truth fastens itself upon the mind that a man is no longer going up hill but down, and that the sun is always westing, he looks back on things behind. Now, this is a natural feeling, but is it the high Christian tone of feeling? We may assuredly answer, No. We who have an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, what have we to do with things past? When we were children, we thought as children.

Manhood in the Christian life is a better thing than boyhood, because it is a riper thing; and old age ought to be a brighter and a calmer and a more serene thing than manhood. There is a second youth for man, better and holier than his first, if he will look on, and not back. There is a peculiar simplicity of heart and a touching singleness of purpose in Christian old age which has ripened gradually, and not fitfully. It is then that to the wisdom of the serpent is added the harmlessness of the dove. It is then that to the firmness of manhood is joined almost the gentleness of womanhood. It is then that the somewhat austere and sour character of growing strength, moral and intellectual, mellows into

8. THEIR FULFILLMENT.

1. THE sun shall be darkened. We have but little to say on this point,—not that there is not much to say, but that so much has already been said. "The dark day," is a common phrase to denote the 19th of May, 1780. A few are yet living who witnessed it. The writer well remembers that, in his boyhood, aged people made frequent mention of it in relating notable points in their experience. One testimony only we here give, from an authority of undisputed reliability. It is a publication of the American Tract Society, entitled, "Life of Edward Lee":—

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived; 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the Judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed, and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society—Life of Edward Lee.

Had the author and publishers of this work intended to give a forcible illustration of the fulfillment of this prophecy, they could not better have chosen their language for that purpose. But they had no such intention—they had not this prophecy in view at all, which makes their testimony all the more emphatic as evidence on the question.

Some have questioned whether this was sufficient to fulfill the prophecy, admitting that it must be so fulfilled. Dr. Noah Webster, who was an eye witness of it, says the sun was darkened fourteen hours. Then it was darkened over fourteen twenty-fourths of the earth's surface, and particularly over that part where we believe the most important scenes of last-day prophecy are laid,—the continent of America.

2. The moon shall not give her light. It was well suggested by Dr. Henry, the commentator, that the moon would fail because the sun would shed no light on her, in the fulfillment of this prophecy. In New England, where the sun's darkening was most noted, the moon, though full, was totally obscured till midnight, when it came out with brilliancy. Here is the evidence that the sun was darkened fourteen hours—from 10 A. M., of the 19th, till the midnight following. Many descriptions have been given of the intense darkness of that night. One said, that if every luminous body had been struck out of existence, he could not imagine that the darkness could have been more intense. It was startling, and overpowering, and even painful to the senses because of its intensity. And learned men say it cannot be explained or accounted for. We think it admits of just one explanation. The God of Heaven—the Ruler of Nature—hung out these signs in the heavens to teach the student of his word that the Son of God would soon make his second advent to this world. And we are thankful that the warning has not been in vain. The marked fulfillment of the prophecies has led thousands to look, to hope for, and to rejoice in the "blessed hope," of the coming of the dear Redeemer.

3. And the stars shall fall from heaven. We may be permitted to notice this more particularly, as efforts have been made to show that no past fulfillment can meet the requirements of this part of the prophecy. We believe that it was fulfilled in the fall of 1833.

Professor Olmstead, of Yale College, said that they who were so fortunate as to witness the falling stars on Nov. 13, 1833, probably beheld the greatest display of celestial fireworks that has ever been seen since the creation of the world,—certainly the greatest that has ever occurred within the time covered by the annals of history. It was more than a "shower," as it has been called. They began to fall as early as 11 o'clock, and increased until they truly resembled a shower, but of many hours' continuance. We witnessed them in all their glory, for nearly three hours, till they were obscured by the light of dawning day. And when the day dispelled the appearance they were still falling as numerous as ever, as was proved by their being visible in the west when the advancing light of the sun rendered them invisible in the east. During their fall, the largest and brightest would leave a mark of light down the heavens like a mark of phosphorus on a wall in a dark room. When it became so light that the mass of them could no longer be seen, one would occasionally make its presence known by such a penciling of the sky. No description can give one any conception of the grandeur and glory of the scene. As our memory recalls it, we feel that the power of God was manifest to make known to the student of prophecy that the coming of the Son of man is near.

By comparing the testimony of the Evangelists we find these signs still more definitely located. We have noticed that the greatest tribulation, or affliction, which ever befell the church of Christ was under the Papal Roman power. This power was symbolized by the "little horn" of Dan. 7, into whose hands the saints of the Most High were given for a thousand two hundred and three-score prophetic days—1260 years. This period commenced A. D. 538, and ended when the civil power fell from the hands of the papacy by the imprisonment and exile of Pius VI. in 1798. For extended evidence on this point the reader is referred to "Thoughts on Revelation." The persecution began to wane under the German Reformation, and ended in the first half of the eighteenth century. To this the Saviour doubtless referred when he spoke of shortening the days of the affliction for the elect's sake. The affliction ceased before the expiration of the days spoken of by the prophet. And Mark says, "In those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened." Mark 13:24. This was actually fulfilled, in that order. The days of the prophecy closed at the very close of the eighteenth century. The power was still in the hands of the papacy, but unused; the affliction was past; the long, dark night of persecution upon the church of Christ had come to an end; there was a respite "for the elect's sake," lest no flesh should be saved—lest the faithful witnesses for Jesus should be exterminated by the power and malice of the Inquisition. And in this time of respite, while yet the power lingered in the hands of the man of sin, the sun was darkened—God's signs "in the heavens above" commenced their fulfillment. The darkening of the sun in 1780 was the greatest that ever was known, and it took place at the very time specified in the "sure word of prophecy."

We have now considered the signs of Matt. 24 in connection with a class of evidences which we consider fully sufficient to disprove the current idea that the coming of the Lord referred to the destruction of Jerusalem. We will answer a few objections, and make the application of the prophecy.

A STRIKING ADMISSION.

FROM a recent issue of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican we cut the following significant extract:—

"Rev. George F. Pentecost, the noted evangelist, says in the Independent that the conversion of sinners is becoming a lost art. 'The fact is sad and stubborn that in the great cities where churches, talent, wealth, culture, leisure and opportunity to do revival work abound, there the number of conversions is in an inverse ratio to the facilities.' He attributes this to what he calls the overfeeding of the churches. 'Too much food and too little work result in surfeit and torpor, and that is where he thinks the trouble lies.'"

Mr. Pentecost is known as one of the most earnest revival workers of the present time. There are few men living better prepared to speak on this subject than he. He would probably object as strongly to our views of the fall of Babylon as any one, for he has confidence in the modern revival work, and has acted a prominent part in it. We can but respect the earnest labors of such men as Moody, Pentecost, and some others, though we cannot indulge in such bright hopes of successful results as they seem to. Is it not a striking commentary on the tendency and progress of religious movements in this age, when a leading actor in them uses such language as we find here attributed to him? And does it not sound much like a confession that we are right in our views of the "fall of Babylon?" What could be said which would more fully endorse them? "Talent, wealth, culture, leisure, and opportunity to do revival work abound," and yet conversion is "becoming a lost art." Old fashioned religion is dying out, its most earnest workers thus testify.

But we take no satisfaction in such a condition of things. We are forced to admit these same influences are at work among us. Worldliness, pride, love of pleasure, superficiality of religious experience, threaten us as well as others. We are living in the "perils of the last days," and Satan is making mighty efforts to destroy true religion from the earth. Our only hope of success is to be faithful to our father's God, and be sure to walk in the "old paths." God has given us special light, which will preserve our feet from sliding if we walk in it. Nothing else will. Such confessions as the above show the need of something more than modern popular religion possesses.

THE NEW ENGLAND SCHOOL.

IT has been some time since anything has appeared in the REVIEW concerning the school at South Lancaster, Mass., and as the friends of our educational interests may like to learn something of its present outlook, a few words respecting it may not be out of place. One reason why no more has been said, is because we have had as many students as our facilities would accommodate comfortably.

When the school first commenced, it was only as an experiment for one year or less. The desire to secure laborers in the cause of God prompted its establishment. The providence of God favored us with the experienced teachers of our choice. At our first term we had twenty-four students, gathered from different parts of New England. As they met together at the close of the first term, the sweet, melting Spirit of God seemed to unite the hearts of teachers and scholars, and set its seal to their efforts.

During our second term we had an enrollment of fifty-seven names, and the same spirit which

THE SECOND ADVENT.

(Concluded.)

IN Daniel 7 another prophecy is given us from which we learn that the second advent of Christ is now at hand. Here the same historical events presented in the image of Dan. 2, are again symbolized, with some sharply-outlined subdivisions, and the fixed limitations of a prophetic period. As in Dan. 2, so here, Babylon is followed by Medo-Persia, Grecia, and Rome, in the procession of earthly kingdoms; and then the saints take the dominion under the whole heaven. But Rome, before its history is finished, breaks up into ten divisions symbolized by ten horns; and the rise of the papacy to rule and domineer among these kingdoms through all the dark ages, is symbolized by another horn rising to power and continuing 1260 years. Commencing in 538, this period of 1260 years ended in 1798. The last specified act of this horn was the utterance of "great words," which we think were emphatically spoken by the Ecumenical Council of 1870, in its decree of papal infallibility. In consequence of these words, and apparently after no great lapse of time, Daniel saw the beast slain and his body given to the burning flame. Dan 7: 11. But the burning flame in which the papacy perishes, is nothing less than the spirit of Christ's mouth, and the brightness of his coming literally manifested at his second advent in the clouds of heaven. 2 Thess. 2: 8. Of our proximity to that event, the reader can now judge.

Again in Daniel 8, the rise and fall of Medo-Persia, Grecia, and Rome, are given us, to be succeeded by the kingdom of God. Another longer and more important prophetic period is measured off which terminated in 1844, and the event to which it brought us was the last brief division of the work of our Saviour as mediator for the world, nearly forty years of which are already in the past. His exalted position as King of kings and Lord of lords is next inevitably to come, and that speedily.

In the closing verses of Daniel 11, the prophet depicts the last scenes in the history of a power now fast sinking to its inevitable doom. Of the Turkish power, as the "king of the north" it is written "He shall come to his end and none shall help him. And at that time shall Michael [Christ] stand up [that is, commence his reign]." The question "How near is the Turkish power to its utter extinction?" is to the student of prophecy simply this: "How near is the setting up of the eternal kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ?" To this question let politicians and statesmen anywhere respond, and we will abide by the answer.

In Rev. 12 and 13 we are carried through the pagan and papal forms of the Roman government, forward to our own time and our own nation. Certain religious movements which are already appearing in embryo, are here to be developed, when this government, with the papacy, in conjunction with which it performs its last acts of religious oppression, is suddenly arrested in its career, and perishes in its pride, at the second coming of Christ. Rev. 13: 13, 14; 19: 20.

Such is a small portion, briefly stated, of the historical evidence that history itself is soon to cease in the opening scenes of the eternal world. Further evidence of this is found in—

2. Natural phenomena.—It might be expected that nature, in her various modes of operation, would give premonitions of the approach of the final catastrophe. We are not surprised, therefore, to read the predictions that the sun should be darkened, the moon refuse her light, the stars fall from heaven, strange sights appear above, fiercer and more frequent convulsions shake the earth beneath, and the great deep lift up its waves as if it would leap in terror from its ancient bed. All these phenomena have appeared. The dark day and night of May 19, 1780, the great meteoric shower of Nov. 13, 1833, wonderful auroras, cyclones and cloud bursts on land, water spouts and tidal waves at sea, are all matters of record and of growing wonder and alarm. What do they presage? Prophecy says, "The great and notable day of the Lord." Joel 2: 30, 31; Acts 2: 19, 20; Luke 21: 25-27.

3. Political disturbances and perplexity among the nations.—In a line of consecutive events, national distresses and perplexities stand next preceding the shaking of the powers of heaven, and the appearing of the Son of man. Luke 21: 25-27. Nihilists in Russia, communists in Germany, monarchists in France, dynamiters in England, paupers and anarchists in Ireland, Mormons in America, capital oppressing labor, and labor combining against capital, here, there, and everywhere, till the world's mass of humanity is heaved and tossed like the troubled sea when it cannot rest,—all proclaim the prophecy fulfilled. Add to this the fact that millions are almost daily squandered on the invention of new and more murderous weapons of war, on experiments in attack and defense, on vast collections of the materials for war, and that even the heathen of the far East, China and Japan, are rapidly providing themselves with the improved modern implements of warfare, and that the millions of Mohammedans from Persia to Hindostan are ready to rise as a man in defense of their prophet, and we may well believe that "the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision," or concision, cutting off, as the margin reads. Joel 3: 9-14.

4. Moral and religious phenomena.—As the world draws near to its last day, its religious and moral condition was, according to prophecy, to be peculiar and abnormal. Satan comes down to work with increased energy, because he knows that his time to work will soon be past. Evil men and seducers wax worse and worse. Violence fills the earth, as in the days of Noah; licentiousness, as in the days of Lot. The moral barriers of society seem to be giving way. Professed Christians are borne down by the tide of evil influences, and sink to the same level with the world. Spiritualism with its fetid breath and polluting touch, stalks forth through all lands, to poison the last fountains of truth, and take all the world in its subtle snare. Rev. 12: 12; 2 Tim. 3: 1-5, 13; Luke 17: 26-30; Matt. 24: 24; 2 Thess. 2: 9-12; Rev. 13: 13; 16: 13, 14; 19: 20. But God counterworks by sending forth a last saving message, to prepare all who will receive it for the coming of his Son. The "gospel of the kingdom" goes to all the world. Matt. 24: 14. A threefold message, symbolized by the three angels of Rev. 14: 6-14, prepares a people for the coming of the Son of man upon the great white cloud. All this we witness in the world around us. What more remains to be done?

In view of this great event, the second coming of Christ and the end of all things, the church is exhorted to watchfulness (Mark 13: 36, 37; 1 Pet. 4: 7), sober, righteous, and godly living (Titus 2: 12, 13), patience and love to the brethren (Jas. 5: 8, 9), and all holiness and godliness in life and conversation. Obedience to these exhortations will secure us a preparation for that day. Disregarding them, we shall find our portion at last with hypocrites and unbelievers.

REQUEST FOR PRAYER.

SISTER Anna M. Oyer, who has filled an important place in our missionary work at Bâle during the period of nearly four years, is dangerously sick. She has acted as secretary, book-keeper, proof-reader on the French journal, and matron of this establishment. My own severe sickness has added greatly to her burdens. About the middle of January, she suddenly gave out from complete exhaustion. We have employed an excellent nurse for her, and have availed ourselves of the best medical skill, and withal we have sought God in anguish of spirit. Sometimes she has seemed a little better, but her symptoms at the present time are quite alarming. We therefore earnestly request the prayers of all our friends in her behalf. We have had many evidences of the willingness of God to help us, and we trust that he will send deliverance in this affliction also.

THE THIRD ANGEL'S MESSAGE.

FIFTH PAPER.

IN 1854, Eld. James White and wife made their first visit to Wisconsin, appointing a meeting in Koshkonong, Jefferson Co. But they were not used to holding meetings in States which had no railroads, and the notice proved too short, as very few received the appointment in time to get to the meeting. This was unfortunate for the work there, and a disappointment on all sides, as no general meeting was possible under the circumstances. However, they visited a number of places, and much good was the result. Many were strongly confirmed in the faith.

Elds. Stephenson and Hall, for a time after this visit, professed much confidence in the work of Sister White, and in the Testimonies given through her. But soon they began to see the effect which the teaching of the message was having on the Age to Come, which they had so diligently preached in Wisconsin. They were traveling among the churches of Sabbath-keepers, where they taught "publicly and from house to house" their favorite doctrine. A few were dissatisfied with such a course on their part; but many had believed that doctrine before they kept the Sabbath, and as Elders S. and H. were known to be able preachers, the majority were opposed to doing anything which would cripple them in their labors. As I had had so good opportunities to know what the Age-to-Come theory was, and that it was impossible to harmonize the third angel's message with it, I could not conscientiously labor with them or give countenance to their preaching. Accordingly I retired from the field, and took a position in a printing office in Oshkosh until there should come a change.

About the same time a disaffection arose in Jackson, Mich., where the message was first preached in this State. Difficulties had arisen between some members, which was not unusual, as some had imbibed very erroneous views of the text, "Many shall be purified and made white and tried." Trials appearing to be necessary to purification, they seemed to think they were bringing their brethren and sisters under great obligations to them if they succeeded in keeping them under trial. Sister White had a message of reproof for one party. This gave the other party great satisfaction; they heartily indorsed the Testimony, and with strong emphasis, and with no small degree of exultation, declared that they knew it was right,—that the message was from the Lord. But that very night a message was given to Sister White for the other party. This message did not take a particle from the force of the preceding one, but it strongly condemned the spirit of exultation with which they had indorsed

TRUTH VS. ERROR.

BY VIOLA FISH.

Like the billow on the ocean,
Bearing down its living freight;
Like the cyclone on the prairie,
Sweeping all within its wake;
So the mighty wave of error
Sweeping far o'er sea and land,
Buries millions 'neath its billows
With a mighty tyrant hand.

Yet the car of truth rides safely,
Guided by the Master's hand,
Lifting sinking souls from ruin,
Filling hearts with hopes so grand;
And the joyful, glad fruition
Soon will lift them far above
All the depths of sin and error,
To a home of peace and love.

OUR SURROUNDINGS.

BY ELD. R. F. COTTRELL.

WE are apt to think that if our circumstances and surroundings were changed so as to be more favorable, we should certainly be able to live a life of devotion to God and his cause. If there was nothing to try our patience, how patient we would be! Perhaps you have heard some one say that it was impossible for one to live a Christian in the situation in which he was placed. To such we may reply, It is impossible for the carnal mind to be subject to the will of God. No one can be a Christian without the change which we call conversion—a crucifixion of the old man, or the carnal mind, and a putting on of the new man; in other words, partaking of the mind that was in Christ and becoming like him.

To be a Christian is to follow Christ, and be like him. When he undertook our cause, he did not place himself in the most favorable surroundings. He met the adversary for us in the wilderness of temptation, where he fasted forty days. He obtained the victory, and thus showed us the way; and he still loves us, and will permit our circumstances to be such as are best calculated to purge away our dross, that we may come forth from the furnace like the pure gold or silver that has been tried by the fire. No change of surroundings can do the needed work for us. The change must be in us. We are to get the victory in the situation in which we are. All things work together for good to those who love God. Submit to the will of God, and follow Christ, and we shall overcome, as he did, and we shall be seated upon his throne and share his glory.

SIGNS IN THE SUN AND STARS.

BY ELD. J. N. LOUGHBOROUGH.

WHEN speaking of the darkening of the sun in 1780, and the falling stars of 1833, in America, we are often met with the inquiry, "If these were signs of Christ's coming, why have they not been given in other parts of the world?" Our Saviour said, "There shall be signs in the sun." Now while there was on the American Continent a day of supernatural darkness in 1780, three years later there were startling phenomena on the European Continent, which were thus recorded in the public prints of that year:—

"In 1783, Mount Hecla vomited forth lava from April to September. The Island of Iceland was covered with a cloud of blue, sulphurous vapor. Toward the month of August, a strange fog spread itself over all Europe, and Great Britain, France, Switzerland, and Italy were in a black vapor. The sun was without brightness, and had a disagreeable aspect. The heavens took a strange appearance. Even the summits of the Alps were obscured, and a general consternation seized the people.

"The churches were filled with an affrighted multitude who prayed, and the astronomers were obliged to tranquilize the people by giving some scientific explanation of these rare phenomena. At Amsterdam a complete obscurity reigned during three hours in the midst of the day, and the great city was as dark as night. The alarm was very great, and in the general confusion innumerable accidents occurred."

This account is from a "History of Pestilences" by Dr. Noah Webster, vol. 1, p. 270-74.

It may be said that this obscuration of the sun was the final result of the eruption of Hecla. Though this may be so, we ask, Was it not God's power that caused this eruption and darkness by extraordinary means?

Of the falling stars we learn from the testimony of the "British National Encyclopedia," that in addition to the ordinary and occasional "shooting stars" of our atmosphere, there is in our solar system a vast nebulous substance which throws off a stream of meteors. It has been ascertained that these nebulae have now a regular orbit around the sun, and that it requires about thirty-three and one-fourth years to traverse their orbit. Once in about thirty-three years, our earth passes near the nebulae, when there is visible what astronomers have called the "star-shower." It has been conjectured, upon good grounds, that the meteoric storm was originally a vast mass of nebulous matter, drawn into the solar system by the distinct action of some of the larger planets, in the same manner as Lexell's comet had been thrown into a new orbit, and rendered visible by the disturbing action of Jupiter. See "National Encyclopedia," vol. 8, p. 1014.

The approach of the nebulae to our system was first noted in 1766, and again in 1799; but the first brilliant and distinct display of the "star-shower" was on Nov. 13, 1833. Of the display of meteors on that occasion, Prof. Olmstead of Yale College said:—

"Those who were so fortunate as to witness the exhibition of shooting stars on the morning of Nov. 13, 1833, probably saw the greatest display of celestial fire-works that has ever been seen since the creation of the world, or at least within the annals covered by the pages of history."

Our Saviour predicted such an exhibition of falling stars which should follow after the darkening of the sun. He did not say how this would be accomplished, but only stated the fact. From the testimony of the astronomers, we learn that, on approaching the time for the accomplishment of this prediction, a vast mass of meteoric substance (through the action of the planets) was "drawn into" our solar system, and when this substance came in contact with our atmosphere, there was witnessed this grand display of "celestial fire-works," giving an appearance "as though all the stars of heaven were falling," impressing the mind of the beholder that this was indeed the sign foretold by our Lord.

The falling stars which were witnessed on so grand a scale in America Nov. 13, 1833, fell, to a less extent, in the Eastern Continent on Nov. 13, 1866. We call the attention of our readers to the testimony of eye-witnesses of the event.

The London Times of Nov. 15, 1866, speaks thus: "The fiery shower, foretold by the science of America and Europe for the night of the 13th of November in this year, was seen in full splendor yesterday morning between the hours of twelve and two. Look where we would, it was the same; in the far west, and throughout the entire north, there was either the bright glancing speck of light, or the long train, or what seemed an actual ball of light, that illuminated the country, and was slow to die away. As the night advanced, the meteors chased one another across the sky, following in one another's track, or running side by side. The heavens seemed alive with this unwonted host. There were times when it seemed as if a mighty wind had caught the old stars, loosed them from their holdings and swept them across the firmament. It was a spectacle which cannot be imagined or forgotten."

The London Morning Post of the same date says: "The wondrous sight began soon after midnight, and from that period until after five o'clock it was witnessed with but few intervals of time. So near did some of these meteors appear, that their resemblance to rockets occurred to every one, and we almost seemed to listen for the rush through the air. During the transit of the meteors, the light of the other stars was scarcely to be noticed. The effect produced during the simultaneous passage of meteors in the various parts of the heavens was inexpressibly impressing. The noiseless course gave a thrill that no artificial splendors could ever produce."

The Liverpool correspondent of the London News says: "Some of the meteors illuminated the whole sky with a glare like that of the aurora borealis in its grandest phases. Some were like balls of light; others expanded from a small nucleus to a large volume of light, then darted across the heavens with the speed of thought, and were lost in the obscurity of the west. Some of the meteors had all the appearance of sky-rockets, shedding, as they pursued their course, trails of fire."

The Dover correspondent of the London Times says: "About ten o'clock, many singular aerolites were seen darting from the horizon to the eastward. They continued, without much variation, as far as regards number, until a little after midnight, when they increased in size, brilliancy, and velocity until the maximum was reached, at about one o'clock. The sight then was exceedingly startling; hundreds of blazing meteors were darting at the same moment from a point in the heavens in the constellation Leo, which was the great center whence they started in all directions." It will be seen from this that the star-shower proceeded from the same point as the one in America of 1833.

The Edinburgh Scotsman of Nov. 15, says: "Standing on Carlton Hill, it was very easy for the eye to delude the imagination into fancying some distant enemy bombarding Edinburgh Castle from long range; and the occasional cessation of the shower for a few seconds, only to break out again with more numerous and more brilliant drops of fire, seemed to countenance this fancy."

Prof. Grant of the Glasgow Observatory, in the Glasgow Herald says: "Multitudes of beautiful meteors were everywhere visible, but especially in the eastern regions of the heavens, where the constellation Leo was to be seen as he gradually ascended in his course toward the meridian. Hundreds of the meteors far surpassed in brilliance the stars of first magnitude. In multitudes of instances, they were brighter than Jupiter; and some of them even equaled Venus when she is at her greatest brilliancy. Their prevailing color was white; while others had a bluish tinge. In every instance, they were accompanied by a straight, narrow train of well-defined light of a beautiful emerald-green color. At 1:18 a whole group of brilliant meteors were seen to burst out and diverge like a fan from the radiant point in Leo. At 12:20, I counted the number of meteors visible in one minute; and I found them to amount to fifty-seven, but this, in all probability, did not exceed one-third of the number really visible in every part of the heavens. At 1:42 the most remarkable meteoric phenomenon presented itself to us in the constellation Ursa Major; but, unfortunately, none of us caught the commencement of it. The blaze of light which this meteor emitted at the time of vanishing was extraordinary. It left behind it a curved residue of faint light, having the form of a horseshoe. As it gradually grew fainter, it expanded its dimensions until it vanished. This singular phenomenon continued visible in the heavens for twenty minutes after it first attracted our attention."

A Dublin correspondent of the London Morning Post writes, Nov. 14: "The shower of meteors, or shooting stars, made its appearance at a little before midnight, and from that hour until about a quarter after 1 A. M., the dark sky was illuminated by countless numbers of those luminous bodies darting almost unintermittently from east to west. Some of them were of most dazzling brilliancy, and left behind them a long trail of light, which was visible for some minutes after the head, or nucleus, had vanished. Many of them were seen to explode in the air; and some persons assert that, on these occasions, a faint sulphurous odor was perceptible."

An observer at Saragossa, Spain, in a letter to the London Times, says: "My attention was first directed to the falling stars at about twelve o'clock at night. Showers of meteors seemed to be pouring into the place, a score or more at a time, exploding with a brilliant flame at different points, and leaving long, luminous trains behind them, some of which lasted as streaks in the sky several seconds after the explosion of the meteors. The meteors seemed to be most abundant towards the north and northwest, and I noticed a particular stream of them not far from the constellation of the Great Bear. During the short time I observed them, many hundreds of meteors fell; and as there was no perceptible diminution in their number, I have no doubt that during the night their number must have been tens of thousands."

The Independence Belge, of Nov. 16, gives the following description of the meteoric shower as it appeared in France: "At first but a few stars were noticeable, darting off with great rapidity through space. Then they shot off in pairs, then in groups, flying in all directions, until at length it became impossible to count them. The majority of them left behind a luminous trail, and exploded immediately before disappearing. In their rapid courses through the heavens, they appeared to chase one another. The whole firmament was nothing but a brilliant race-course. This remarkable sight lasted from two to three hours, during which time one might have observed several millions of these celestial visitors."

It will readily appear to our readers that there is a great contrast between the display of falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833, and that of Nov. 13, 1866; both as to the extent of territory covered, and the number of falling stars visible at any one time. The meteoric display of 1833 covered all of North America, and extended from the middle of the Atlantic to the middle of the Pacific ocean. The scene of 1866 did not cover one tenth part as much surface. Again, those describing the falling stars of 1833 say that they fell as thick as snow-flakes, from one o'clock at night until day-dawn; and that it was all this time as difficult to count the stars as it would be to count the sparks flying off a magnificent piece of fire works. In the star shower of 1866, with one exception (in Spain), and that of only a few minutes duration, none of the writers pretend that these stars could not be fully counted.

Now as to the periodical recurrence of falling stars, or the "star shower." It must be evident that while in 1766, and in 1799 there were indications of the approach to our system of the great star-shower-producing nebulae, yet the grand display that fulfilled so strikingly our Saviour's prediction (Matt. 24; Rev. 6) occurred Nov. 13, 1833. The recurrence of the star shower in 1866 gave the inhabitants of the Eastern continent an opportunity to see, on a limited scale, falling stars. But, we ask, was not the limited display of 1866 a proof that the great nebulous substance which had been drawn into our system had fulfilled its mission, and was rapidly receding again into the regions of space, outside our earth's orbit?

THE HIDDEN SERPENT.

WEARIED and thirsty, from the chase
Once rode the Persian king,
And longed for a refreshing draught
From out some mountain spring.
Beside him, on a halberd perched,
His well-trained falcon rode,
And through the long and tiresome way
The dusty dragoons strode.

What was it, trickling down the cliff,
And sparkling in the sun?
The precious drops of liquid light
Were gathered one by one,
And when the golden cup was filled (Which many a banquet graced),
The monarch lifted with a smile
The cooling draught to taste.

But suddenly, the falcon stretched
Her dark wings, strong and wide,
As if in rude unconsciousness,
And dashed the cup aside.
The earth absorbed the water which
The Persian monarch craved;
The treasure gained for kingly lips
The weeds and tall grass laved.

Thrice was the golden goblet filled,
Though slowly, to its brim,
And dashed aside, ere yet the king
Had touched its jeweled rim.
Then blazed his anger fiercely forth,
And with a cruel blow,
He swore revenge by all the gods,
And laid the falcon low.

The henchman climbed the rocky cliff,
In haste the draught to bear,
But shrieked, and fled in horror from
The sight which met him there;
For, lo! a dreadful serpent lay Coiled in the crystal well,
Whose poisonous venom filled with death
Each sparkling drop that fell.

How many, like the Persian king,
Clasp eagerly the cup
Which holds the poisonous beverage,
In haste to drink it up;
Who scorn the friendly hand which strives
To dash the cup aside,
And turn from friendship's kind appeals
In bitterness and pride;

But learn by sad experience
How like an adder's sting,
Or like a serpent's deadly bite,
Is the accursed thing.
Who tastes, will drink and drink again,
With thirst beyond control,
Till poisoned by the liquid fire
Are body, mind, and soul.

LYMAN BEECHER'S ILLUSTRATION.

"YOUNG gentlemen," said Dr. Beecher, pausing in the midst of a lecture on the Divine Decrees, and raising his spectacles over his forehead in a way he had when some extemporaneous thought struck him, "theology is a mighty deep. It has its calms and its storms, its joys and its dangers. And many weak souls and some strong ones are wrecked because they venture too far without taking the proper bearings. I go out myself sometimes, but I try to be careful. I walk along the shore and pick out some sturdy old stump of a doctrine, which has stood there firmly for thousands of years and never pulled out. I make fast to that, and so when I miss my footing I haul on the line. I don't know where I am, but I know where that stump is. I settled that point before I started."—Sel.

WHERE GOES YOUR MONEY?

THE following figures are astounding. Read carefully, and then ask yourself to which sum you contribute most:—

We spend annually for saving 700,000,000 blood-bought heathen souls, the sum of not more than $2,500,000, while the total contributions of all the churches in America for all causes do not exceed $77,000,000. For intoxicating drinks, on the other hand, we spend $900,000,000 every year. For tobacco, $80,000,000! For ladies' foreign dress goods, about $125,000,000! New York alone spends for theater-going and other amusements, three times as much as our whole country gives to foreign missions. The kid gloves it imports alone cost ten times as much. The ladies of America actually spend more for artificial flowers each year than do all the churches for the spread of the gospel! How does this seem to the conscience? For Christ, $77,000,000. For vanity, liquor and tobacco, $1,105,000,000.—The Vanguard.

A SINGULAR STORY.

A SINGULAR story is told in a Sheffield paper of a burglary committed two or three years ago at an old-fashioned house in a southern country. The lady who occupied the house retired to her room shortly before midnight, and found a man under her bed. She feared to go to the door and unlock it, lest the burglar should suspect that she was about to summon help, and should intercept her. To gain time, she sat down and took her Bible from her dressing-table. Opening the sacred book at random, it so happened that the chapter lighted on was that containing the parable of the prodigal son. Kneeling down when the chapter was ended, she prayed aloud,—prayed earnestly and fervently. She besought safety for herself during the perils of the night, and cast herself in supreme confidence on the Divine protection. Then she prayed for others who might have been tempted into ill-doing, that they might be led from evil, and brought into the fold of Christ; that to such might be vouchsafed the tender mercy and kindness promised to all who truly repent of their sins. Lastly, she prayed that, if he willed it, even to-night some such sinner might be saved from the wrath to come, might, like the prodigal, be made to see that he had sinned, and might be welcomed back with the joy that awaits even one penitent. The lady rose from her knees and went to bed. The man got up as noiselessly as he could, and said, "I mean you no harm, ma'am; I am going to leave the house, and I thank you for your prayers." With difficulty he opened the bedroom door, and presently she heard him open a window in another part of the house, and drop down into the garden.

The lady was recently visiting at a friend's house in the north of England, and while there was asked to go to hear, in a Dissenting place of worship, a minister who was a "reformed character." In the course of the sermon, the preacher told all the incidents of this terrible night exactly as they occurred. After the sermon she went into the vestry, and asked him who had told him this story. After some hesitation, he said that he was the burglar, but that her earnest supplication and intercession sank deep into his heart, and as he listened, he then and there resolved not only to give up his guilty design, but to live a reformed life altogether. To that resolution he had adhered, and to her was owing whatever good he had since been able to do as a minister of the gospel.—Sel.

SABBATH HUNGER.

THE hunger I now notice induces a thankful recognition of the Sabbath sometime before it arrives. It is well to be on the lookout for such a friend as the Sabbath, and a hungry hearer will discern the beauty of it through the mists of the week. Hungry people have thought of their dinner-hour before it overtakes them; and it is nothing strange that one hungry for the word should have pleasing anticipations of the feast-day.

And he is not going to be late at public worship. Hunger for food, especially when it pinches, drives one up. You will not have to ring for that man often; nor will the dinner be likely to cool by delaying for him. So the hungry hearer will hasten to his repast. He has an excellent appetite, and will lose no part of the feast; hence the untimely uproar of the church and pew door will not give notice of his arrival at the sanctuary.

And you will not catch the hungry hearer drowsy. Hunger and drowsiness are not often

(Concluded.)

IN verse 15, the Saviour turns his discourse back again to the destruction of Jerusalem, making evident allusion to the prophecy of Dan. 9:26, 27, in which Rome in its pagan form is called an "abomination." When Cestius Gallus in October, A. D. 66, drew his legions up around Jerusalem and commenced the siege of the devoted city, the disciples recognized the sign; and when, without any visible cause, he suddenly withdrew it, they saw their opportunity, and fled in haste, as the Lord had instructed them. Safe sheltered in the little village of Pella, they escaped the horrors of Jerusalem's overthrow. The prayer which the Saviour taught them to use (verse 20), that they might not be obliged to flee in the winter, nor on the Sabbath day, thus recognizing the existence of the Sabbath as late as A. D. 66 to 70, was fulfilled.

Verses 21 and 22 look far into the future from that day and bring to view the next most prominent feature in the experience of the church. From the great tribulation of the Jews, the mind is naturally carried forward by the word "then," which is occasionally used in the Scriptures to cover a long period, as in verse 9, to the unparalleled affliction which his own people would suffer. This was fulfilled during the Dark Ages, when the little horn of Daniel 7, the "man of sin," the papacy, made war, for centuries, on the saints of the Most High and wore them out, till twenty times as many of the servants of Christ went to a martyr's death under this professedly Christian power, as had perished under the long rule of paganism.

"Those days" (of persecution, not the prophetic period which marked the papal supremacy) were shortened for the elect's sake, in the introduction and subsequent maintenance of the work of the great Reformation of the 16th century. Verse 22.

From this point we are again carried forward by the word "then," to the time when the subject of the second coming of Christ should be agitated, as we have seen it in our own day. The false Christs and false prophets have appeared, in modern spiritualism, which boldly claims to be the coming of Christ and the ushering in of a new spiritual dispensation. But Christ charges us not to be moved by their "lo here's" or "lo there's;" for the coming of Christ is not to occur in the "secret chambers" where spiritual circles are held, or death-bed scenes transpire, nor in the work of conversion by the Holy Spirit (in which sense Christ is "always" with his people), nor in "the desert" where the Mormons have erected their pseudo heavenly kingdom; for his coming is to be as literal and visible as the lightnings flashing across the heavens, and all will know it for themselves. And the saints, as subsequently stated, will be gathered together by the angels; but the judgments of God, like the eagles, will fall upon and devour the carcass, the wicked, wherever it is found. Under these circumstances, none will be left in doubt when his coming takes place.

In verse 29, we are again taken back into the past, but only so far as to take in the signs in the natural world which should betoken the approach of the Son of man; for, as if in sympathy with her divine Lord, Nature herself gives signs in her domain, of the coming of that glorious restitution which shall banish all her woe. We are pointed to the time immediately following the tribulation before referred to. A little past the middle of the 18th century the last act of martyrdom occurred, said to be in the year 1762. (Dowling's Romanism, p. 609.) In 1780, May 19, the sun was supernaturally darkened. A summary of the facts in the case is well given in the Explanatory Vocabulary of Noted Names, etc., of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary; and to this only we refer, as the general reader can perhaps the most easily verify it:—

"Dark Day, The. May 19, 1780;—so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day extending over all New England. In some places persons could not see to read common print in the open air for several hours together. Birds sang their evening song, disappeared, and became silent; fowls went to roost; cattle sought the barnyard; and candles were lighted in the houses. The obscuration began about ten o'clock in the morning, and continued till the middle of the next night. . . . The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known."

The darkness extended far beyond the limits of New England. Herschel calls it "The dark day of North America." See "Our First Century," by Devens. The moon refused to give her light the following night, when, as expressed by Mr. Tenney in "Gage to the Historical Society," the darkness "was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty fiat gave birth to light."

A little more than fifty years elapsed, and the predicted falling of the stars was fulfilled in the great meteoric shower of Nov. 13, 1883. This was the most notable exhibition of the kind that ever occurred, and covered extensive but undefined portions of the western hemisphere. A star shower almost equally striking, fulfilled it to the eastern world, if that were necessary, in 1866.

Fifty years have again gone by since 1833, and the world has plunged into an era of atmospheric convulsions which finds no parallel in the past. Next after the falling of the stars, the prophecy mentions the shaking of the powers of the heavens. If the atmospheric heavens are intended, are we not witnessing the fulfillment? Devastating floods in some regions, disastrous drouths in others; ocean gales, tornadoes, electric storms, and deadly cyclones all over the land, stir men's hearts with fear; while more recently the twilight conflagrations in the sky, baffling their subtlest philosophy, are exciting large comment and wonder. May not these strange meteorological conditions be justly called the shaking of the powers of the heavens? If so, the sign of the coming Son of man cannot be far distant.

And when he comes, the tribes of the earth, the nations who have rejected him, they who will "mourn" because of him, see him. John says (Rev. 1:7) that when he cometh with clouds every eye shall see him; and to show that this includes the wicked, he adds, "and they also which pierced him." Yet men now rise up and say that nobody will see him except a few righteous; in other words, that "every" does not mean "every," and that "see" does not mean "see." We spend no time to refute such contradictions of the Scriptures, but leave those who make them to answer for their folly at the bar of God.

To give his declarations double strength, the Lord now introduces the parable of the fig tree. Verses 32-35. At the first signs of returning vegetable life, while the bud is yet most tender, our convictions are established and sure, that summer is nigh. And no such expectation was ever yet disappointed. The summer always comes. Just so surely those who see the signs he has given are to know that his coming is at hand. And he concludes with a solemn affirmation that "this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled."

What is meant by the generation? and what generation is referred to? These are questions which have exercised many minds. And to those who insist upon finding some definite points for the beginning and ending of the generation, and gauging its length by some well-defined measuring rod, the remarks here made will not be at all satisfactory; for we attempt nothing in this direction. It does not seem to us necessary. Christ addresses those who had seen "all" of a certain class of events; and those events were the ones which are mentioned as "signs" of the great event which is here the object of discourse; namely, the appearing of Christ in the clouds of heaven. Those who saw only the darkening of the sun, had not seen all these things; those who saw the falling of the stars had not seen them. Those now living, who have a historical knowledge of the past, and see what we see—those before whom all these things are held up, as they are now, in consolidated array, as signs of the end, have seen them, and do see them. We believe the language is addressed to the mass of the people now living; that the present is the generation; and that this generation shall not pass before all is consummated; that is, that the mass of the world's inhabitants now living will witness the coming of the Son of man. We say this with a full appreciation of the fact that one person dies and more are born every second of time, and that with this rapid influx and exit, it takes no great length of time to change the mass of the world's inhabitants; yet we believe the Lord is now so near, that the people living at the present time, as a body, will behold his coming.

A striking illustration based on a reference to the days of Noah follows, and the chapter closes with a solemn admonition to the servants to watch, to give the household meat in due season, and to avoid the fate of the evil servant who says in his heart, "My Lord delayeth his coming." And a blessing is pronounced upon that servant who when his Lord cometh shall be found in the faithful discharge of all his duty.

"IT DOES MOVE"—BUT WHITHER."

SUCH is the title of an article from the pen of R. L. Stanton, D. D., in the Independent of Jan. 17, 1884. It relates to the great question whether the world is growing better or worse. The writer confidently affirms his opinion that "the world 'does move,' and that we are making constant and steady progression, instead of 'going to the bad,' as some fear;" yet the heading would nevertheless imply a doubt even in his mind as to the direction in which the world is moving.

Those who set themselves to show that the world is growing better, have an embarrassing problem on their hands. There are hydra-headed evils springing up on every side, plain to all observers. They are virulent, persistent, and growing. It is evident that unless they can be checked, everything will "go to the bad." But they cannot be checked without exposing, denouncing, and vigorously warring against them. But how to do this and still maintain the impression that the world is all the time growing better is the question. If this latter view is instilled into the minds of the people, its tendency will be to paralyze the necessary opposition to the evils in question. For if the world is constantly growing better, too many, if they come to believe this, will decide to sit down and let it grow, knowing that in due time the evils must yield to the prevailing good, in the natural course of events. But this will never do. Hence the optimists are obliged to content themselves largely with bare assertions as to the world's improvement, while on the other hand they are forced to grapple with many new and alarming conditions of things.

Such is the case with the article in question.

conclude from what he published a month that they believed none of these children could have been saved, because they were not believers in '44. They were laboring with all their might for the salvation of those who they thought could not be saved. This may be their conclusion, but certainly not ours. We know, therefore, that they held views of the shut door as opposers attribute to them.

The November number of Present Truth, pages 10-12, we have an account of the conversion of several persons, and the baptism of one who must have been too young to have been a believer in 1844. The passage occurs in a letter of S. W. Rhodes, who was a prominent laborer at that time, and shows the kind of a shut door they believed in.

The last page of the last number of Present Truth in a letter from Eld. Joseph Bates, we find the following: "Our meeting at Waitsfield was blessed. Bro. and Sr. Butler came from Waterbury. Bro. Chamberlain and Churchill; Bro. Hart and Valley came from Northfield; and those in the family with Bro. Lockwood's family, composed our meeting. Bro. Butler finally yielded to the truth." I personally remember this time as though it were yesterday, although it was in 1850. Mother had been keeping the Sabbath about a year. Father had much opposed to it, though a strong believer in the Advent movement of the past. The light on the sanctuary subject brought him to accept the seventh-day Sabbath. We notice this meeting by the name of Bro. Churchill is mentioned. His was one of the very first cases of conversion from the world to the present truth, which occurred after 1844.

As we have said, their work hitherto had been almost wholly for the "lost sheep of the house of Israel"—the old Advent believers. They saw that unbelievers showed no interest in the truths which were so precious to them, and therefore their mission was directed to those who loved the Advent truth, and they labored ardently for them. This, evidently, was in the order of God. Heman Churchill, of Lowell, Vt., the one here mentioned, had not been engaged in the Advent movement of 1844. He was married, after this, a daughter of Sr. Benson, a Baptist minister. I remember him well as he came to Waterbury, Vt., and attended meeting in my father's house, where a few met from time to time. They were quite surprised at first that one who had been an unbeliever should manifest an interest in the Advent doctrine. He was not repulsed but welcomed. He was earnest and zealous; and as they discerned his sincerity, they accepted him as a true convert. I cannot remember the exact date when he commenced to seek God, though I recollect clearly his attending meetings in Waterbury, Vt. But we know from this letter of Eld. Bates, that it was previous to the meeting held in the fall of 1850; for he was then the meeting referred to in Waitsfield, Vt., as a true convert. Bro. Bates calls him "Brother." His conversion was noised abroad quite extensively. Now our opponents were correct in their statements that the believers held to a shut door which entirely excluded all except old Adventists, how could Heman Churchill have been received as a true convert? This is positive evidence that their assertions are untrue. It is not an instance which can be found in the history of this cause where any one manifested sincerity in seeking God was ever repulsed. They were most glad of any evidence that such desired the kingdom of God.

A letter recently received from Bro. Ira Abbey, of North Brookfield, N. Y., whose name is signed to the statement at the close of this article, I take the liberty of making the following extract:—

"After the time passed I was a strong shut door believer. But when the third angel's message was preached, I with my wife embraced it. Between 1844 and 1850 Bro. and Sr. White came to our house, and were very zealous for the children and those who had not rejected the truth. They labored for converted souls, and never do I remember of hearing Sr. White say that there were no hopes of the unconverted; but there were hopes of the backsliders, those that had not rejected the truth."

This is an extract from a private letter and was not written for publication; but the testimony is so clear and venturesome to insert it.

We next present an extract from a statement written by Marion C. Truesdail, and signed by herself and five others:—

"During Miss Harmon's (now Mrs. White) visit to Paris, Me., in the summer of 1845, I stated to her particulars of a dear friend of mine whose father had prevented her attending our meetings; consequently she had not rejected light. She smilingly replied, 'God never has shown me that there is no salvation for such persons. It is only those who have had the light of truth presented to them and knowingly rejected it.' Miss Harmon's reply coincided with my idea of a shut door, and in justice no other could be derived from it."

The fact here presented is certainly a decisive one as to the nature of the shut door in which they believed, even as early as 1845.

We now present a very explicit and comprehensive statement covering this whole shut door experience, of believers in the third angel's message previous to the year 1851. There are a goodly number of living witnesses who embraced the truth at that early date, who know whether these statements are true or not. Why should not their testimony be considered in this connection? We have obtained the signatures of quite a number, all of whom embraced the truth as early as 1850, and all were in the '44 movement:—

"We, the undersigned, having been well acquainted with the Advent movement in 1844 at the passing of the time, and having also embraced the truths of the third angel's message as early as 1850, hereby cheerfully subscribe our names to the following statement concerning the shut door doctrine held by believers in the third angel's message from the time of its rise to the last mentioned date, and onward.

"They believed, in harmony with Rev. 3: 7, 8, and other scriptures, that at the close of the 2300 days of Dan. 8: 14 Christ closed his work in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary, and changed his ministration to the most holy, and entered upon the work of the Judgment, changing his relation in this respect to the plan of salvation. Here was a door opened and a door shut.

"They believed that those who had the clear light upon the first angel's message and turned against it, bitterly opposing it, were rejected of God. But they did not believe that those who had not had the light or those who had not come to years of accountability previous to 1844, if they should seek God with honest hearts, would be rejected.

"While they believed with William Miller and the great mass of Adventists immediately after the passing of the time, that their work for the world was done, and that the Lord would come very soon, yet after the light upon the sanctuary and the third message explained their disappointment, they did not believe that mercy was past save for those who had rejected the light."

Here is an argument which it will be hard to answer,—more than a score of living witnesses testifying clearly and emphatically to what they know concerning the shut door doctrine. On the other hand, our opponents who raise such a hue and cry about the shut door had no practical knowledge of the matter. They were not in the movement themselves, and they have obtained at second hand what knowledge they have concerning it, while the witnesses we have quoted were actors in the message, and know whereof they affirm. We have demonstrated beyond all question that our opponents accuse the early believers falsely when they say they taught there was no salvation save for those who were Advent believers previous to 1844.

IS THE END NEAR?—NO. 3.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE SUN, MOON, AND STARS.

Just before our Saviour's crucifixion the disciples asked him a most important question: "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. 24: 3. If such a question should be asked of the divines of the present day, they would doubtless reply, "That is an event concerning which it is impossible to impart any information. It may come at any time or not for countless ages. We can tell nothing about it; and no sign will herald its approach." But our Saviour gave a very different answer. He recognized the question as a proper one; and concerning the subject, he immediately gave one of the most striking prophetic discourses to be found anywhere in the word of God. The next verse says, "Jesus answered." If he did answer the question, he certainly must have presented information of great value to his people; for no event has ever transpired in the past, nor will any occur in the future, that can be compared in importance to the one under consideration.

Did he tell them what would be the sign of his coming? Verse 33 reads as follows: "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [he, margin] is near, even at the doors." To be "near, even at the doors," must signify to be very close at hand. There are, then, signs which will precede the coming of Christ and demonstrate its proximity. What are these? "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Verses 29-31.

Here are set forth certain striking events which are said to immediately precede the appearing of the Son of God. They are three in number; the darkening of the sun and moon, and the falling of the stars. The others mentioned take place after the close of probation, in close connection with Christ's appearing; as the shaking of the powers of heaven, the appearing of the sign of the Son of man, and the mourning of the tribes of the earth at his coming. The first of these is caused by the voice of God saying, "It is done." Rev. 16: 17. "Then there are voices, thunderings, lightnings, and a great earthquake; and every island fled away, and the mountains were not found."

The signs, then, which precede Christ's coming are the three first mentioned. These are given as signs in many other scriptures. Mark 13: 24-26: "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light; and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming," etc. Luke 21: 25-27: "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars, and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken; and then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." Rev. 6: 12-14: "And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood, and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together, and every mountain and island were moved out of their places." Then they call for mountains to fall upon them to hide them from him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. Joel 3: 14, 15, 16: "Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision; for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake." Isaiah 13: 9-13: "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine. And I will punish the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity," etc.

How plainly these scriptures demonstrate that the darkening of the sun and moon, and the falling of the stars, are the great signs which God will give to show when the end is near. There are none others given in the word of God which are made so prominent. Have these events transpired? If so, the Lord's coming must be very near. If they have not transpired, we are not entitled to look as yet for it. Can we define the time when these signs must commence? St. Matthew says: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened." Mark says: "In those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened," etc. "The tribulation of those days" must be a period spoken of in prophecy, when God would permit his people to suffer the greatest tribulation and persecution ever endured by them in any age. Such a period is pointed out in many prophecies. Dan. 7:25; 11:33-35; 2 Thess. 2:3, 4; Rev. 6:8; 12:6; 13:7; and other scriptures.

There can be no question whatever, that this tribulation refers to the 1260 years of papal persecution, when upwards of fifty millions of people, whom the Catholic church called heretics, were put to death by the sword, the fagot, and the rack. They suffered in dungeons, in crusades, and in every way of persecution that man could invent. This terrible state of affairs commenced with the Catholic supremacy A. D. 538, and consequently would terminate 1260 years later, or in 1798. Our Saviour refers to this period in this same 24th chapter of Matthew, verses 21, 22: "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And expect those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." More people were put to death for conscience' sake during this period than during all the rest of the six thousand years of human history.

Truly this was the "great tribulation" spoken of. It was to be shortened for the elect's sake. This shows it was a tribulation upon the elect, or God's people. The prophecies indicate that it was to continue 1260 years, or till 1798; but the Saviour says that the tribulation should be shortened, so that a seed of the elect might be preserved. This was accomplished during the great Protestant Reformation under Martin Luther, when the papacy was so crippled it could no longer persecute as before. There have been no general persecutions since 1750. There were, therefore, nearly fifty years between the close of the tribulation, or persecution, and the end of the days in 1798. Our Saviour says that after the closing of the persecution, but before the ending of the days, the sun should be darkened. Did this prove true? In all the late editions of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, in the appendix of names of noted persons, places, etc., is given the following:—

"Dark Day, The, May 19, 1780;—so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day, extending over all New England. In some places persons could not see to read common print in the open air for several hours together. . . . The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known."

We have not the space to give the many pages of description of this event which we have in our possession. It certainly was one of the most remarkable which was ever recorded in history. Such expressions as the following were used:—

The Concord (N. H.) People calls it "the silent spreading of the pall-cloth over the earth by strong, invisible hands."

The Boston Gazette, of May 22, 1780, says: "The printers acknowledge their incapacity of describing the phenomenon which appeared in that town on Friday last. Such a phenomenon was never before seen here by the oldest person living."

The Connecticut Journal, of May 25, 1780, says: "The greatest darkness was, at least, equal to what is commonly called 'candle-light' in the evening."

Rev. Elam Potter, M. A., in a sermon delivered on the 28th of May, 1780, spoke of it as a "wonderful darkness,—such a darkness as probably was never known before since the crucifixion of our Lord. Some thought whether the day of Judgment was not drawing on."

Milo Bostwick, another eye witness, said: "There were not any clouds; but there was an uncommon appearance in the sun. My father and mother thought the day of Judgment was near."

The American Tract Society, in their "Life of Edward Lee," call it "a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear."

Prof. Dwight, in his "Historical Collections," says: "The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of Judgment was at hand."

Whittier, the poet, describes it as follows:—

"Birds ceased to sing, and all the barn-yard fowls
Roosted; the cattle at the pasture bars
Lowed, and looked homeward; bats on leathern wings
Flitted abroad; the sounds of labor died;
Men prayed, and women wept; all ears grew sharp
To hear the doom blast of the trumpet shatter
The black sky."

We might multiply these expressions from many authors. This was no ordinary occurrence. We defy any man to find another day in history described in such terms as were applied to this one by a great variety of authors. What, then, have we shown? It came at the exact time the Scriptures said it would, between the close of the great persecution and the ending of the 1260 days; that is to say, "in those days after that tribulation," the sun was darkened in the most remarkable manner ever recorded in history. If the great papal persecution was the greatest tribulation ever visited upon Christians, this was also the most remarkable dark day ever witnessed. Both fulfilled the prophecy.

The darkening of the moon on the following night was as remarkable as the darkening of the day. One witness says, "If every light in the universe had been blotted out, it could not have been darker." Another states that it was a darkness that could be felt, which even terrified the dumb beasts; that horses in many instances could not be forced to leave the stable. One other describes the moon as having the appearance of blood. It was at full moon when this great darkness prevailed.

The falling stars occurred Nov. 13, 1833. The star shower covered the whole of the Western continents, and extended from the middle of the Pacific to the middle of the Atlantic.

The Old Countryman (a newspaper) immediately after it occurred speaks as follows: "We pronounce the raining of fire which we saw Wednesday morning last, an awful type, a sure forerunner, a merciful sign of that great and dreadful day which the inhabitants of the earth will witness when the sixth seal shall be opened."

Horace Greeley, the famous editor of the New York Tribune, said: "While a mere lad, I was waked in the night to see a pale, frightened face bending over me, and to hear, 'Get up! get up! the day of Judgment has come, I believe, for the stars are all falling!'"

Mr. Henry Dana Ward, while quoting the description in Rev. 6,— "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind,"—said if he were to hunt through all nature for a simile, he could not have found one so exact as that used by the prophet in describing this wonderful scene.

Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, calls it "the greatest display of celestial fire-works that was ever seen since the creation of the world; or at least within the annals covered by the pages of history." He demonstrates that these were real stars, originating far outside of our atmosphere.

These testimonies might be greatly multiplied, but they are enough to forever settle the question that here we have the complete fulfillment of the prediction of Holy Writ upon the signs to precede Christ's coming. They have been fulfilled before the eyes of the present generation. What next? "Now, learn a parable of the fig-tree; when its branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh; so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Matt. 24:32-35. There is nothing surer in nature than this, that when the trees put forth their leaves, summer is right upon us. Christ says, when these events occur in connection with the heavenly bodies that we may be just as sure his coming is near. We may know it is "near, even at the doors,"—the next great event in prophecy. But this brings in the generation that should see the complete fulfillment of these signs. He declares that it shall never pass away till the event itself appears.

This three-fold sign was not completed until the falling of the stars in 1833. It then becomes an evidence to the people living that Christ's coming was now to be expected. The sign given by our Saviour contained three important particulars. These are now fulfilled. Before the last occurred they had no right to look for the Lord because the sign was not completed. But they were authorized and required to believe his coming was near as soon as they knew this sign was fulfilled. Since that, we have been in the waiting time. Every student of prophecy may now know that the coming of the Lord is due. This generation will not pass off the stage until Christ appears. The word of the Lord is pledged for it.

In 1833 they began to look for the coming of the Lord. We have now entered upon 1885. Fifty-two years are nearly passed. Those who were living when this sign was fulfilled are now becoming old.

Can we doubt the truthfulness of our Lord's declaration, made so solemn and forcible by his own words:—"Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away." If the dark day of 1780 be the one predicted by our Saviour, then his words can never prove true. He said it would occur those days after the tribulation of the long period which terminated in 1798. The persecution ceased about 1750. There was a little space of marked off between these dates where this darkening of the sun and moon occurred. If it did not then, his words would be untrue; because the period of 1260 years cannot be extended beyond 1798. If it did occur then, the signs of which he spoke have fulfilled, and we must be very near the great day of God. How can we doubt the truthfulness of his words? May God help us to prepare for that event.

REVIVAL MEETINGS IN BATTLE CREEK.

It was thought best to close the lecture course with a special effort to spiritually benefit all within reach. Our friends in small churches can little realize the extent of a successful revival interest in Battle Creek, and what an amount of work it involves, like moving a whole Conference. Indeed, there were more Sabbath-keepers in Battle Creek than in many of our Conferences. There are nearly six hundred members of the church, and several hundred who are members. There are not over seven or eight Conferences which have more Sabbath-keepers than this one church, while there are twenty Conferences which have not so many members each.

A revival effort which will stir such a body of people is a great undertaking. But the Lord gave us favorable circumstances. The lecture course had prepared and solemnized the minds of the people. Young brethren in the church and young ministers of the College had been laboring among the people for weeks, and were in a good condition to enter into the work. God had providentially sent us much help. Eld. Canright was brought back to us by the death of his child, and not being able to return at once to New England, stayed with us for weeks, and greatly helped in the lectures and in singing and praying with the people. Eld. Farnsworth stopped over the Sabbath on his way to New England, and waited here a week for Eld. Haskell, who was just starting for California and Australia. Farnsworth took hold and helped in the College and other places. Our Michigan ministers came to the College course, and they also joined in the work. So we had much help, and they all seemed to come providentially.

Never in my knowledge of Battle Creek was there ever made such a thorough, systematic course of evangelizing. We tried to see all the backsliders, and were many, and all others we could reach. The four days of the week were wholly given up to the work by many. The Office closed each afternoon, and meetings were held in all the districts in the city, including two or three at the College, one at the infirmary, and one at the Office. These meetings were generally attended. At night the Tabernacle was crowded, and the work continued there. It was a season of excitement, but a serious, solemn spirit prevailed. Many were anxious about their souls' salvation; they broke down with weeping and earnestly sought the Lord. Many made a profession for the first time. Our meetings were excellent. There was so much urging as we often see, but more spontaneous action. We cannot yet speak of results, as the work is still in progress. Yesterday (Sabbath) forty were received by the church,—twenty-three by profession, the remainder by profession and by letter.

Many others have presented themselves for baptism, but their cases have not been fully examined. We are trying to move carefully, that the best results may be attained.

God has been very good to us the last week in Battle Creek, much better than we feared or deserved. Praise his holy name. May our people still remember us in their prayers.

—God's presence is enough for toil and enough rest. If he journey with us by the way, he will be with us when night-fall comes; and his companionship will be sufficient for direction on the road for solace and safety in the evening camp.—Matthew 11:12

—By doing good with his money, a man, as it were, stamps the image of God upon it, and makes it pass current in the merchandise of heaven.

reigned as king over Israel, the nation was tributary to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. Part of the nation had already gone into captivity, and the time had come when, on account of their continued persistence in transgression, God would have the remainder of the nation go into captivity to Babylon. Jeremiah had been sent to proclaim a message to this effect, and because of counseling the people to go over to the king of Babylon he had been shut up in prison. Zedekiah, filled with forebodings for the future, held a secret interview with the prophet. Jeremiah plainly told him that if he would surrender to the king of Babylon, his soul should live, and Jerusalem should not be burned with fire. But Zedekiah pleaded that he was afraid the Jews that had fallen captive to the king of Babylon would mock him, and so he refused to hear the message from the Lord. It was not long before he reaped the fruit of his refusal; for he was soon taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, and compelled to witness the horrible death of his sons and nobles. Then his eyes were put out, and he was carried in chains to Babylon. Jerusalem was burned and laid waste for upwards of a hundred and fifty years. See Jer. 38, 39.

I wonder if Zedekiah in his blind bondage ever lamented over the folly of his course in permitting the fear of man instead of the fear of God to control him. What sadness must have possessed his heart as the long weary days of his captivity passed away! Surely he must have seen the folly of having his own way, but alas! too late to avail him anything. Jerusalem was in heaps, and the temple of Solomon, the costliest structure that ever adorned the earth, was in ruins. God sometimes uses rigorous measures to show his disapproval of sin. Do you ask the reason why? It is because sin is the most hideous and unreasonable monster in the universe.

ST. PAUL'S FAITH.—NO. 6.

BY. ELD. R. A. UNDERWOOD.

THE SECOND ADVENT OF CHRIST.

"For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." Phil. 3:20, 21. The coming of Christ to change our vile bodies and make them like unto the glorious body of the Son of God, was the "blessed hope" the apostle ever kept in view. Had he lived in these last days, when faith in the personal coming of Christ is waning; had he heard the last-day "mockers" saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?" the apostle would have charged them with being "willingly" ignorant, if not willfully so, concerning the second advent of Christ. Christ will come the second time to this earth; for he says: "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself." John 14:3. "While they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight. And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said: . . . This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts 1:9-11. "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. 4:16, 17.

It is the "same Jesus," "the Lord himself," that is to come again. The "I" that goes away is the "I" that returns in the same manner in which he went away. We are commanded to "watch," "wait" and "look for" the Master's return; yea, and to "love his appearing."

The children of God will not be in darkness concerning that most solemn and glorious event. The "signs" given whereby they may "know" when it is "near even at the doors" will be discerned by them. They will be "waiting" "looking for" and "loving" the appearing of the Man of sorrows; and he will receive such unto himself.

But, alas for the ease-loving, honor-seeking, popular professors who say: "I do not want to be disturbed about the second advent of Christ. If I am ready to die, that is enough. It is nonsense to worry our brains about the prophecies and the coming of Christ. They are not for us to understand." These are almost the exact words addressed to the writer by a friend a few weeks since. On another occasion a friend having asked a question requiring a Bible answer, which could not be given without quoting scriptures that related to the second advent of Christ, said: "Don't quote Bible to me about Christ's second coming; for you cannot make an Adventist of me." The above were both professed children of Christ. They represent a large class who claim that they love Christ more than all else besides; yet the simple quotation of a text which refers to the "advent" of Christ to this dark world of sin to receive his own dear children unto himself, is distasteful to, if not despised by, them, even though they profess to be his children.

Can a child love a parent, and treat him thus? Can a bride love her absent husband, if she does not desire to know anything of his return? Let me say to such, We need not worry about something we cannot understand. In the time of the end "the wise shall understand." Dan. 12:9, 10. "But ye, brethren are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." 1 Thess. 5:4. You tell me that you love the Saviour. My friend, can this be if you do not want to hear anything about his personal coming? Do not deceive yourself. Thousands think that they love the Son of God, when they do not want to see him, nor even hear of his return to this world the second time! All your feigned words of love for an absent friend would not convince him nor others of your love, if all the evidence of, and even conversation concerning, his return was repulsed by you. You would have more discretion than to try to palm off such a fraud upon those of any discernment. Do not persuade yourself into the vain delusion that because you may say "Lord, Lord," and are not guilty of out-breaking crimes, you are prepared to die. Many ridicule the doctrine of the soon coming of Christ, and reproach those that believe it: yet they dream of heaven. The prophet had his eye on this class, with others, when he wrote: "Hear the word of the Lord, ye that tremble at his word: your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my name's sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified: but he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be ashamed." Isa. 66:5.

It is to those that "tremble" at the word of the Lord, and "look for him" that he shall "appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Heb. 9:28. Only to this class will his coming be with joy, while shame and confusion will cover those who have said with their lips, "Let the Lord be glorified," while by their actions they have lightly esteemed the word of God, and cast reproach upon his waiting people.

The change of body referred to by the apostle must be preceded by a moral change, which will make a radical change of the whole life and all its interests. St. Paul experienced this moral change, and this led him to look upon the world from a different stand-point than formerly, as it will all that have the faith of Paul. The invisible, eternal riches in Christ had been sought at the loss of all by him. "What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ. . . That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his suffering, being made conformable unto his death." Phil. 3:7-10. Few men ever have been placed where they were called to give up more, and few have done it more cheerfully, than the apostle Paul. For the honors, wealth, and fascinating pleasures of this world he purchased the "pearl of great price." While making this exchange he says: "I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake."

To the extent that our souls are infused with the spirit of Christ, we are constrained by the love of souls to labor with all the talents of intellect, knowledge, opportunities, means, and the powers of our being to save souls, even at the loss of life. When the whole life is absorbed in this work, our treasures are transferred to the eternal world;

"For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." If our treasure is here, our hearts and conversation are here, and we shall always stay here on this earth. Man is born here, lives and dies here, and is buried here. All will be raised here, and all who have their treasure here, will perish here. Rev. 20:9; Mal. 4:1. This class will not have the privilege of leaving this old earth, even for a time. But if our treasures are transferred to heaven, our hearts will be there, our conversation will be there, and we shall go to the city of God. All the powers of earth cannot hold us here. Do not be deceived in this matter.

St. Paul had laid up his treasure in heaven. His talents had been devoted to the work of God. He could be a minister, a colporter, or anything, that he might save souls. He thought it just as honorable to go from house to house to show them the word of the Lord with weeping, as to preach a sermon. Of his work he writes: "But have showed you, and have taught you publicly, and from house to house; . . . by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears." Acts 20:20-31. Such labor, mingled with stripes, imprisonments, pain, hunger, thirst, cold, nakedness, and the care of all the churches, was cheerfully performed by the great apostle. When he started out he was not told that he would have an easy time, nor was he promised a good salary for labor. But "he said unto me, Depart; for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles." Acts 22:21. "For I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake." Acts 9:16. Did this discourage the servant of God?—No; not for one moment. See how he counted the cost: "If so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us. . . Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecutions, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? . . . Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us." Rom. 8:17-37. If this was the living faith and courage of the ambassadors of Christ in the early Church, how much more should it be ours now at the close of the gospel age!

Let the same power of faith, courage, and unselfish work be manifested by the professed soldiers in the Church of God as was seen in the life of St. Paul, and soon this world would be lighted with the last message, and the conflict would end. This is what we need, and when attained the work will close in power. Let us ever keep the glorious truth in view that Jesus is soon to "come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." 2 Thess. 1:10. It is "unto them that look for him" that he shall "appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Heb. 9:28. "Surely I come quickly." Let all say: "Amen. Even so, Come, Lord Jesus." Rev. 22:20.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

BY R. S. DONNELL.

No other doctrine is more clearly set forth in the word of God than that of the second coming of Christ; and yet no other is so little dwelt upon by the religious teachers of to-day. The Bible points to it as the grand consummation of the Christian's hope. Speaking of the fulfillment of the signs that were to indicate the nearness of that event, the Saviour says: "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." Luke 21:28. Paul declares: "And unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Heb. 9:28. It is pointed out as the time when the people of God are to be rewarded. At the close of his labors, the apostle Paul spoke of it as the time when he expected to receive his crown: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." 2 Tim. 4:7, 8. Upon this point the Saviour bears positive testimony: "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works." Matt. 16:27.

The people of Christ will be looking for him, "teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Titus 2:12, 13. "And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." Isa. 25:9.

Can a person be said to be waiting for a certain event, and not be looking for it? If waiting and looking, then they must know something about when it will take place. This the Scriptures also teach. Not the day nor the hour, but the nearness, of that event, or the time when to look for it, is pointed out. The Saviour said that of his coming there would be signs in the sun, moon, and stars (Luke 21:35; Matt. 24:29); and then adds: "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things [signs], know that it is near, even at the doors." Matt. 24:33. Have no guess-work in the matter, but "know that it is near."

Again we find testimony to the point in 1 Thess. 5:1-4. In this scripture two classes are brought to view; viz., those upon whom that day will come as a thief, represented by the term "they," who evidently are not looking, but are crying peace and safety, and no doubt preaching a converted world before the coming of Christ; and those whom Paul designates as, "Ye, brethren," and says: "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." Verse 4. Paul continues to describe them as the children of the light; that is, they are heeding the light that shines from the word of God upon this subject, of which the apostle says, "Ye, brethren, are not in darkness," and which Peter terms "a more sure word of prophecy." 2 Pet. 1:19. In the Bible, from the days of Daniel to the end, there is given a complete outline of this world's history. The four universal empires, the rise and development of the man of sin, the signs in the sun, moon, and stars,—all stand as finger-boards upon the great highway of time, showing unmissably to the student of prophecy our whereabouts in this world's history.

That the four great kingdoms, Babylon, Medo-Persia, Grecia, and Rome, are in the past, and that the man of sin has run his allotted career, no careful student of prophecy and history will attempt to deny. That we have also passed the three great signs referred to by our Saviour, which were to take place in the sun, moon, and stars, it is just as easy to prove. In the 24th chapter of Matthew, we find the Lord answering a question directly addressed to him upon this point; and in so doing, he traces the history of this world in connection with the history of the Church, from the destruction of Jerusalem to his second advent. Reaching a certain period in that history, he says (verse 29), "Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken."

It will be noticed that these signs were to take place after the ending of a certain tribulation. That tribulation he brings to view in verse 21, and mentions it as being the greatest through which the Church would ever be called to pass. This occurred under the reign of Paul's "man of sin" (2 Thess. 2:1-8), or during the supremacy of the little horn of Dan. 7:8. This power was to literally "wear out the saints of the Most High." Dan. 7:21, 25. Neither before nor since the Dark Ages have the people of God been called upon to endure such relentless persecution as was heaped upon them during the reign of the papacy. In Dan. 7:25, we find the 1260 years given as the duration of the supremacy of this power in the "time, times, and the dividing of times." This supremacy was reached in A. D. 538, at the going into effect of the decree of Justinian, placing the Bishop of Rome at the head of the churches, and granting him power to punish heretics. Adding 1260 to 538 would bring us to 1798, where the days of supremacy would end. And here they did end; for in 1798, Berthier, a French general, entered Rome, proclaimed a republic, took the pope prisoner, and for a time abolished the papacy.

Now we see from Matt. 24:22 that the days of tribulation (that is, the tribulation of the 1260 years) were to be shortened. In other words, the tribulation would cease before the days ended. This we find was the case. Through the preaching of the reformers and other kindred hindrances, the persecutions were brought to an end before the expiration of the days allotted to this power.

It was after the persecution ceased, but before the days ended, that the sun was to be darkened. Mark says: "In those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened," etc. Chap. 13:24. By 1776, or not later than 1778, the tribulation ceased; so we must look for the darkening of the sun between this time and 1798; and here we find it. As a fulfillment of this prophecy, I refer to the memorable dark day of May 19, 1780, just eighteen years before the days ended, but in a very short time after the tribulation had ceased. Much proof might be offered upon this point, but we only refer to Webster's unabridged dictionary, edition of 1869, p. 1556, heading, "The Dark Day." The following night, the moon also was darkened. As a fulfillment of the falling of the stars, witness the great meteoric shower of Nov. 13, 1833. Many living witnesses of this are among us to-day. This falling of the stars is the fulfillment of the great threefold sign given by the Saviour as an indication of his near approach; and to those that were to witness it, he says (verse 34): "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled;" that is, some who saw the falling of the stars, should live to see the coming of Christ in the clouds of heaven. If this be so, dear reader, where are we?—Just fifty-two years this side of the fulfillment of this threefold sign which tells us that the coming of our Lord is near, "even at the doors." The witnesses are gray-headed; yet the Saviour has pledged his word for it that this generation shall not pass before he returns. May we all be ready to welcome our Master when he shall come.

HOW WE SHOULD SPEAK.

BY GEORGE THOMPSON.

THE tongue is that "unruly member" which it is so hard to control. How many are the "hard speeches" which we call to remembrance as we look back upon our past lives. And in view of the solemn declarations of Scripture upon this point, we are made to tremble: "But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of Judgment." Matt. 12:36. James says: "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." Chap. 3:2. Again: "If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain." Chap. 1:26. Solomon has told us that "death and life are in the power of the tongue." Prov. 18:21.

If we direct our words aright, we may have eternal life; while, on the other hand, if our words are vain and uncalled for, and death or the Judgment overtake us, the awful second death will be ours. Moses was "very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth" (Num. 12:3); yet we read of him that he once "spoke unadvisedly with his lips." Christ was a perfect pattern of meekness. He "did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth: who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously." 1 Pet. 2:22, 23.

But how must we speak? We dare not set up our own standard. Has not the Bible told us? It certainly has; for it contains the "whole duty of man." James says: "So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the perfect law of liberty." Chap. 2:12. And 1 Pet. 4:11 tells us pointedly how men should speak: "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God." Are we informed what the "oracles of God" are?—Yes: "This is that Moses, which said unto the children of Israel, A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear. This is he, that was in the church in the wilderness with the angel which spake to him in the Mount Sina, and with our fathers; who received the lively oracles to give unto us." Acts 7:37, 38. Again: "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? Much every way: chiefly because that unto them were committed the oracles of God." Rom. 3:1, 2. No language could be more plain. The "oracles of God" are the moral law, the ten commandments, which contain the "whole duty of man." Eccl. 12:13.

Man, then, ought to speak in harmony with the law of God. How many are doing this? All over the land ministers are heard proclaiming that the law is abolished, and man is no longer under obligations to obey it. Others say that it is in full force, but the fourth commandment has been changed, so that it no longer enforces the keeping holy of the seventh day. The rest day of the Creator is set aside, and another day, of papal origin is made to take its place—"the venerable day of the sun." Do those who teach this "speak as the oracles of God"?—They certainly do not.

CHAFF WITH THE WHEAT.

BY F. PREBODY.

I entered a book-store not long ago, and asked for a book of recitations on the subject of temperance. Having examined one, I remarked to the merchant, that there were some good selections in the book, but many of which I would not approve. His answer was, "We must take the chaff with the wheat." The thought struck me forcibly. If you want good temperance literature, you must take ninety per cent of nonsense or chaff. The other ten per cent may be worthy a perusal. It is so in almost everything in these days. Chaff, when we speak of the husk of grain, is good for some purposes; but when applied to nonsense, it is of no use. It is so as regards almost every article put into the market. It is even so in the lecture room and in the pulpit. A very little wheat with a great amount of chaff is a commodity in great demand. "What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord. Is not my word like as fire?" I felt thankful that we had the word of God, of which David says: "Thy word is very pure; therefore thy servant loveth it."—So say I. "We must take the chaff with the wheat" does not apply here. "Add thou not unto his words, lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar."

How thankful the Christian ought to be that God has given us his truth unmixed! "The words of the Lord are pure words: as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times."

DOGS.

BY M. E. STEWARD.

"BEWARE of dogs." Phil. 3:2. The first class mentioned which are without the city of God is dogs. Rev. 22:15. The peculiar characteristic of this animal is named in Gal. 5:15: "But if ye bite and devour one another," etc. Lambs are affectionate and tractable; dogs, cruel and unmanageable, a terror to every one.

The psalmist says of the Saviour, "Dogs have compassed me: the assembly of the wicked have inclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet." In the judgment hall and at the cross they bit Him with false accusations, and devoured him like dogs with no pity for his awful sufferings.

"If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another." Nothing will alienate affection quicker than fault-finding. The happiness of families has been destroyed by it. Let us not "bite" those we love by thoughtless criticism. Dare we indulge a spirit of censure in the holy Church of God! As this cruel spirit enters the heart, that of Christ is lost; and he who goes about seeking whom he may devour, "consumes" the precious graces of the Spirit, and gradually gains control of the entire man. Then let us watch against the first appearance of this evil. We may fancy written over it, "Beware of dogs," as the Romans chained their dogs at the doors of their houses with this inscription over them: "Beware of this dog."

—If men were as ready to commend what they approve as they are to condemn what they disapprove, life would be rendered much more pleasant, and many thorns that now pierce men's hearts would never enter them.

Forty hours after leaving Barbadoes, we landed at Georgetown, British Guiana, S. A., after a journey of twelve and a half days from New York. I can only say we are grateful to God for his care, and thankful we are at our destination, for the present at least. In reference to this place, and other points of interest, we shall speak more fully hereafter.

A LIVING WITNESS OF THE DARK DAY.

THE Ogden (Iowa) Reporter of Jan. 20, 1887, contains the following sketch of a person now living who was old enough on the notable "Dark Day" of May 19, 1780 to remember the particulars of that occasion:—

"One of the oldest known persons in the world is Aunt Millie Denton, now a resident of Kansas City, Mo. She was born a slave, near the village of Colshon, on the western shores of Maryland, and when but three years old was taken to what was then called 'The territory south of the Ohio River.' Ninety years ago, when the State of Tennessee was admitted into the Union, she was an inhabitant of that State, and had at that time a large family of children, none of whom are living at the present time, and but one grandchild, Lizzie Corporal, forty years of age, with whom she now lives. She then belonged to the Denton family, members of which figured largely in the political affairs of Tennessee in its early history, and from whom she derives her name. The Denton family removed with slaves to Arkansas fifty years before it became a State. There the family separated, and a number of years later she lost her husband, and with the remnant of the family found her way north to Springfield, Mo. Here they accumulated some property, which, it seems, was in possession of the Hon. John S. Phelps, late Governor and Congressman of Missouri; and here the light of freedom first dawned upon the remaining members of the family, consisting of the subject of this sketch and an only son who died several years ago. Although slaves, they virtually were free several years before, as they were both unable to work. 'Aunt Millie' can now walk a mile each day if necessary. The 'Dark Day,' which occurred the 19th day of May, 1780, when New England was engulfed in darkness and gloom for a space of thirty hours, when the birds sang their evening songs, and fowls of all kinds retired to roost, when the cows came in from the range, and the church bells tolled for the last roll-call, and prayers went up to God from the Alleghany Mountains to the river St. Lawrence, and not an infidel could be found in all the land, this day of remarkable occurrences she remembers with great distinctness. She was then a bright, rugged, barefooted girl on a Tennessee plantation."

THE "AMERICAN SENTINEL" AND "MARVEL OF NATIONS" CANVASS.

By the advice of the Indiana Conference, Eld. A. W. Bartlett began canvassing in the capitol about three weeks ago. He first visited the governor, who gave him his order for the Sentinel, and stated that he had been visited by members of the National Reform party who had requested his influence in their behalf. He was glad to get something that would inform him more fully in regard to the real designs of this party. He advised Eld. Bartlett to canvass the Senate first, and then the House of Representatives. He found three of the five supreme judges, and obtained their orders. Twenty-five of the fifty senators ordered the "Marvel of Nations" and the Sentinel. The same was true of the House of Representatives. He secured the order of the president of the Senate and of the speaker of the House. He told them the nature of the book, by whom it is published, and its design. The higher officers, as a rule, were informed in regard to the movements of the Reform party, but many, especially of the House of Representatives, knew very little concerning it, and were in a condition to have been greatly imposed upon by this crafty movement.

It is very clearly our duty to inform the men who make our laws and sit as judges in our courts, in regard to the hidden wickedness of this vampire of our liberties. Nearly every officer, except the clerical officials, was in favor of liberty. Forty-five of the fifty senators promised to stand by the law as it now exists in our statute, giving liberty of conscience to those who keep the seventh day, and the legal right to labor on Sunday. About the same proportion of the lower House did the same.

Nearly all were very kind to Bro. Bartlett, and treated him with much respect. Seventy-one books were delivered in connection with the American Sentinel, in one day in the State house. Only one refused to take the book who had ordered it. Several were out on committee work in various parts of the State, who will yet take their books. About eighty, in all, were sold in the building. Several were found who expressed much interest in the seventh-day Sabbath. One senator has almost decided to keep it. Several reporters became interested, and promised to report the matter favorably in the city papers. One senator suggested that it would be much more in harmony with the spirit of Christianity to put God and Christ in the hearts of the people than in the Constitution of the country. It is evident that the highest officials in each State should be canvassed at the earliest possible opportunity; also a personal canvass of all the lawyers and judges throughout the country should be made, even if it requires our leading ministers to present the subject to them.

The work may be greatly facilitated by informing the leading men of the country of our real designs and of their danger. A large amount of patriotism and love for liberty prevails in the hearts of those who are not creed-bound. There is not a ray of hope left us from the ministry and priesthood of this country. Should the clergy succeed in capturing the offices, or in putting in a majority in Congress or in the legislative bodies of the country, of those pledged to them, then our liberties would be gone, and Rome would rule. It lies within our reach now to do much toward having liberties granted us in this closing work. Just now there is a rift in the clouds, which should cause us to work with greater diligence, for soon the night will come, when no man can work. Let none withhold their influence and means from God's cause now while we yet have the opportunity to spread the light of truth. Let us be faithful.

WM. COVERT.

EX-MINISTER WALLACE ON "THE TURKS."

It was my pleasure a few evenings ago, to listen to a lecture by Gen. Lewis Wallace, our ex-minister from Turkey and the author of the famous book "Ben Hur." His subject was "The Turks." His stay in the Ottoman Empire gave him opportunity to observe the much-maligned Turk, and to see many places of beauty in his country. He declared the banks of the Bosphorus to be the best summering place this side of Paradise, and vividly portrayed charming bits of scenery to sustain his opinion. Constantinople appeared to him like a city in air, with minarets, towers, and dainty pinnacles glittering in the sun. The beauty of its architecture surpasses that of all cities. He declared it to be the Congress of cities, as all nations were there represented. The costumes of the Turks make the streets gay and picturesque, though the Turks, he said, had no artistic sense. Their abhorrence of images led them to utterly destroy all the fine statuary that at one time graced the city. The first view of Constantinople suggests poetic fancies, which are vigorously dispelled by foul odors as soon as you enter the streets. You are next assailed by beggars and dogs. The genuine Turk has no mechanical or business faculty. People of other lands carry on the business and ply the trades.

The ladies of the empire are by no means prisoners, and yet after marriage they are prohibited from the society of all but ladies and their own husbands. Father, brother, and friend are bidden a life-long farewell. They do their own trading, however, and appear on the streets only with veiled faces. The veil does not so conceal the features that their pretty faces are obscured. They are comely in appearance. Their dress is very gay and picturesque. The costume consists of loose silken trousers of some bright color, with slippers of the same hue, richly embroidered with pearls, beads, etc. The skirt is a sort of drapery sash, and the bodice short and sleeveless, and trimmed extravagantly. Their arms are decked with bracelets, and a circle of flashing jewels adorns the brow. Mrs. Wallace, who has visited their harems, says "they seem happy and ordinarily intelligent." The harem is the Turk's home, and it is sacredly esteemed. When the husband enters the door of the harem, he is regarded as if at worship. Even an officer dare not enter to arrest a criminal guilty of murder, if he find his slippers at the door of the harem.

The Turks' respect for women is profound. A comical incident was related by Gen. Wallace to illustrate this feeling. One day he found the business place of a certain officer surrounded by a mob of women whose husbands were striking for higher wages by proxy. The officer looked the picture of dismay. "Why don't you send them away?" asked the general. "They are too many for me," answered the officer. "Well, get the police, then." The officer looked indignant, and said, "They are for the men, not women." "But how will you get home?" "Oh I have a secret entrance for just such emergencies," he replied.

The Turk is polite to a nicety. The proverbial politeness of the Frenchman consists in flourishes. The Germans are gravely ceremonial. He said that English politeness is a sort of pretense, but the Turk's courtesy is almost reverence. They are a temperance people. Gen. Wallace had seen many men of many lands and professions drunken in their cities, but never had seen a Turk in that state. They are uniformly kind to dumb animals and children. Their religion is still green and fresh to them. They believe heartily that God is God, and that Mahomet is his one true prophet. They are very devout, and step aside by the way to pray. They remove their shoes and solemnly and reverently address their prayers to the skies. Their reverence might well be imitated by our irreverent Americans.

The present sultan was highly praised by the ex-minister. The sultan is of fine personal appearance, and has great mental powers. He is not bigoted or intolerant in regard to the faith of others. He read the general's book, but seemed to feel sorry that he did not believe in Mahomet. He said, "Moses was a great prophet, Jesus was greater, but Mahomet was the greatest." He respects Americans and their country. According to the lecturer, he is the master of ministers and the arbiter of policies. Phenomenal wisdom has been displayed by the sultan in playing off the powers against each other and away from the dreaded "scramble for his territory." He lives in daily suspicion that some of his court will turn traitor. From the guard at his chamber door to the cook in the kitchen, he knows not whom to trust. Inevitable ruin awaits the sultan and his dying nation. The lecturer declared that there is a skeleton under the sultan's throne. No one knows when it will rear its ghastly head and spring to its height; but when it does, the throne will be destroyed, and the Turk will flee from his ancient dominion. On the tact and diplomacy of the sultan hangs the sword that will fall on Europe whenever he makes an unwise move. When Russia, Austria, France, Germany, and England decide how to apportion the domain of the sultan, the long dreaded moment will have come when the star and crescent will go down to rise no more; and when it comes, we will hear the crash of a ruined empire.

contain a chapel and tenement houses. This is customary in this city, with Baptists, Presbyterians, and other denominations, so that this would not be thought a strange or objectionable feature if Seventh-day Adventists should work on the same plan. There can be some tenements, at least, under the control of Sabbath-keepers, and a house of worship, respectable and plain, but convenient, where Sabbath-keepers may worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Sunday we addressed the people again. Our meeting lasted over three hours, because the plans and designs for building the new chapel were fully discussed. We went to see the land chosen upon which to erect the church building. A small lot had been purchased, but this gave those who should purchase the adjoining lot the privilege to build close against the walls of the chapel, and thus shut out the very light and sunshine which they so much needed. We advised that the adjoining lot, also, be purchased, which situates them on a corner lot, and where no building can be erected anywhere near them.

I was too weary to sleep that night, and the report of cannons which reverberated among the mountains, sounded as though the massive battlements of rock near us were crashing to pieces. This kept up till near morning, making sleep for me an impossibility. As we were to leave in the early morning, we arose at three o'clock. We walked one mile to the depot, I feeling that I was doing my last work for Switzerland. We had laid the case of the building of the church before the people, and given them the advice, "Let us arise and build"—let all be united to do their very utmost, offering their supplications to God for wisdom, and exerting themselves in faith to make changes in the situation, and endeavoring to the utmost of their ability to press against difficulties and discouragements, while listening to the voice of their Leader, "Go forward." For the Lord always helps those who help themselves. The Lord is acquainted with all the circumstances, and will work for those who do their very best. If they can raise a certain amount themselves, they can hire all the rest that is necessary from the bank, at a low rate and on long time. This we think they will succeed in doing.

There are worthy souls embracing the truth in Chaux-de-Fonds, in Bienne, and in Lausanne. All are similarly situated as far as places for worship are concerned. Meeting-houses must be built, and in these missionary fields the work must go and will go with power, if the believers will do their duty; suitable places of worship will be secured under their own control.

The next Sabbath I spoke for the last time in Basel, and in the afternoon I labored for individual members of the church. The next day I was unable to sit up, and could not eat; but an appointment had been made for me at Zurich, a large hall had been hired, notices had gone out, and not liking to disappoint them I took the cars in a rain-storm, accompanied by W. C. White and Sr. Sarah Mc Interfer.

SECOND VISIT TO ZURICH.

We rode three hours on the cars, when we arrived at our destination. We found three hundred and sixty people assembled in the hall, apparently of the best class of society, and, as is frequently the case, the Lord strengthened me. I forgot my infirmities. Bro. Conradi interpreted for me. As soon as I sat down, I became ill again, and took a hack and returned to Bro. Ertzenberger's home. I returned to Basel next morning, where I suffered from a severe attack of malaria, having a slow fever, which made me quite weak and nervous. But Tuesday, at 9 o'clock p. m., again, in company with Sr. Ings, I stepped on board the cars to attend previous appointments.

VOH WINKEL, PRUSSIA.

Some of the churches were to come together for a general meeting in Voh Winkel, Prussia. The outlook was rather dark, as I was unable to eat, was weak, and had trembling nerves. We rode all night upon the hard seats, not an easy bed. Bro. Conradi joined us before we reached the place, and as Sr. Ings also speaks German, we had no trouble in this line. We found the churches in need of help, as they were in difficulty. The Lord gave me a testimony for them, and after speaking to them on Sabbath, I advised, as is our custom, a social meeting. Bro. Conradi said they had never had a social meeting in this place, and, with the exception of two or three who had visited Basel, knew not what a social meeting was. They usually assembled and prayed together, when they had no minister, and then parted for their homes. I advised that there be a move made then and there, and the result was, we had an excellent social meeting, and the Spirit of the Lord was certainly in our midst.

I spoke three times in this place, with much freedom. Bro. Conradi labored most earnestly day and far into the night, and a much better state of things was inaugurated. The people in this place were weavers of silk handkerchiefs. One fine-looking man was a weaver of brocade silk, which sells for eight dollars per yard. He can weave only three fourths of a yard per day, and obtains one dollar and a half per yard. This is a very fine, beautiful fabric, requiring skill and experience to execute the work.

I was much pleased with the opportunity to visit this place and become acquainted with our German brethren. I felt sorry that they had had so little labor from experienced brethren. There were quite a number who attended the meeting who were not of our faith. Some of these were in sympathy with us, and convinced of the Sabbath, but their position as business men was a hinderance to their accepting the truth. The Sabbath is a great cross. Those who lift it here in Europe know generally how hard it is. To lose their employment, is to them a great dread: there are so many who cannot obtain work, and who go hungry and almost destitute of clothing. When one is turned out of a position, there are many who stand ready to step into his place. Therefore it requires stern faith and firm principle to place the feet upon the platform of truth. It means to lift and carry a heavy cross, following in the footsteps of Jesus, the world's Redeemer.

While we were assembled together in this humble place of worship, I felt indeed the peace of Christ. I felt that Jesus and angels were present; and the testimonies given were of a character that bore evidence that the truth was appreciated; and I felt sure that these souls who loved God and were honoring him by obeying his commandments, would be loved and honored of God. They had enlisted in the army of the Lord; but false maxims, evil customs, worldly inducements, and social influences will be temptations they all must meet, for Satan will assuredly leave no means untried to turn every soul away from the light. Satan is opposed to any soul's reaching the high standard of righteousness, and opposed to one's bending his footsteps in the path where Christ leads the way. And when any soul shall press his way up against the current of the world, Satan will seek, by every means in his power, to make the way as trying and as painful as possible.

In consideration that all who embrace the truth, Bible truth, will be tempted, will be opposed by the world, by Satan, and by his host, these little companies who have had the moral courage to come out from the world and be separate, should be often visited and strengthened in the most holy faith. And it should be their earnest, constant effort to preserve the unity of the faith; to cherish love and affection for each other as children of God. I thought if even two or three were united in the truth as it is in Jesus, what good they might do! What precious promises are given to them! Where two or three are agreed together as touching anything they shall ask in the name of Jesus, it shall be done for them. These souls, then, if of one heart, of one mind, of one purpose, will see of the salvation of God, and will be blessed.

Here was quite a large company assembled, nearly all of whom bore their testimony, and seemed to feel all that they said. My heart was made glad in the Lord to see so many who were indeed lights in the world. Let these little companies who seldom have preaching cling more firmly to Jesus. Let them settle this point first of all, that they are willing to walk in the narrow, cross-bearing path where Jesus has traveled before them. Then let them appropriate to themselves God's promises of divine guidance. "He calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out. And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice." "The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him."

With these precious promises, we need not be discouraged. God is not ignorant of the trials and the temptations of any one of his dear children. And if they cherish love and peace and harmony in their midst, how pleasing is this to Jesus! He prayed to his Father that his disciples might be one as he was one with the Father. Now if every one, whatever may be the surroundings, whatever the circumstances, will labor to answer the prayer of Christ in their feelings, and their words, and their actions toward each other, then they will be co-operating with the Lord Jesus in his work, and all heaven will rejoice. What great good a very few may do if they are wholly united in Christ! The Holy Spirit will make impressions upon their hearts and lives, and they will reflect the light and blessing given to them upon all who are connected with them. Thus they are channels of light to the world.

Let each individual member of the church feel that he is responsible in a large measure for the strength and prosperity of the church. While you do to the very utmost of your ability, God will as surely do his part, giving you divine enlightenment. God will work, and you must work to the same end to accomplish the same purpose, as faithful soldiers of an army work in harmony with the plans and purposes of their officers. Our will must be surrendered to the will of God. These churches that are small may be living, healthy, strong churches.

I shall never forget this little company and the pleasant associations we have had with them in the worship of God. I should have been pleased to speak to these precious souls directly, but I am thankful that I had the privilege of speaking to them through an interpreter. A Paul may plant, an Apollos may water, but God gives the increase. My prayer is that the Lord may make this meeting one of great blessing to the church.

LAST DAY TOKENS.—NO. 2.

BY A. SMITH.

DARKENING OF THE SUN AND MOON.

NEARLY twenty-five years had passed away since the great earthquake, with no special token of the approaching end. The attention of Europe and America was absorbed in the great Revolutionary War of the latter country. The growing influence of the Reformation had put a stop to sanguine persecutions of the people of God by the papacy, the last public act of martyrdom having occurred, according to Dowling's "History of Romanism," in 1762. The papacy was yet in the exercise of its arrogant, political assumptions, modified, it is true, by the growing influence of Protestantism, yet a factor of some importance in the solution of international problems.

The time had come when the Saviour's prediction, "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light," was to be fulfilled, thus marking another stage in the closing drama of earth's history. See Mark 13:24. Although similar phenomena had been witnessed Oct. 21, 1716, and again at the West, over a vast extent of country, Oct. 19, 1762, the dark day of May 19, 1780, was the pre-eminently dark day since that upon which our Lord was crucified.

Concerning this phenomenon, Webster, in his dictionary, edition of 1884, p. 1604, says:—

The dark day, May 19, 1780; so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day, extending over all New England. In some places, persons could not see to read common print in the open air for several hours together. . . . The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known.

The following concerning this event is from the Ogden (Iowa) Reporter of Jan. 20, 1887:—

New England was engulfed in darkness and gloom for a space of thirty hours; the birds sang their evening songs, and fowls of all kinds retired to roost; the cows came in from the range, and the church bells tolled for the last roll-call, and prayers went up to God from the Alleghany Mountains to the river St. Lawrence, and not an infidel could be found in all the land.

Business in some cases was suspended, and a gloom or dread seemed to rest upon the people, who generally believed that the Judgment day had come or was impending.

Mr. Tenney, of Exeter, N. H., as quoted by Dr. Gage to the Historical Society, says:—

The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as had ever been observed since the Almighty fiat gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes was equally invisible with the blackest velvet.

This darkness was all the more remarkable from the fact that the moon had full the day before, and an eclipse, therefore, was impossible. No other event since the beginning of the Christian era has even approximately fulfilled the prediction of Christ, that, as a sign of his second appearing "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." Mark 13:24. The fact that the phenomenon was a local one also locates the causes, however mysterious or unknown, which produced it, the sun and moon being only relatively darkened, just as we understand the terms "rising" or "setting" of the sun not as actual but as relative events, due entirely to mundane progression; but this fact does not invalidate the phenomenon as a fulfillment of prophecy, or as one of the most mysterious and unaccountable freaks of nature ever known or recorded.

GUMBO.

BY S. O. JAMES.

ON the Old Missouri Bottom, in places there is a kind of soil called "gumbo." In wet weather this mud will adhere to the wheels of a wagon so that a team can scarcely move along with it. I have seen great pieces of it, as large as a tub, where some poor tired teamster had stopped and pushed it off with a paddle. This load did not accumulate all at once; it was gathered up by small particles, till at last it stopped the wheels—a burden to the faithful horses, and a source of perplexity to all in the wagon.

Does this illustrate a state of things in our midst? We have long talked about a revival, a great revival. We need one. The dear Lord knows how much we need it. We ought to see the car of truth roll on, and our dear neighbors taking passage with us for glory. Then why do we not see it? Will not the Lord work for us? He is working wonders in some localities. Is he partial? Will he pour out showers of blessings on other gardens and leave ours dry? God forbid. Who of us are standing on the wheels? Is it I?

Dearly beloved, while we have cherished sins we cannot work for God, neither can he work for and with us. Think how pure he is, hating covetousness, which is idolatry; yes, and all sin. Are we free from these, walking in all the light given? Why, then, this dearth, and our neighbors not interested? Are they harder to move than others? Let us know for ourselves assuredly that we have removed every obstacle, at least on our part. How anxious are we to see good accomplished? Can we tell? Perhaps our anxiety may have to reach a degree of intensity of which we have scarcely dreamed. What! must we be fanatics?—Not exactly; but let us do something that God may help us, though we be regarded as such by some. Let us be no longer cowardly, but full of faith and courage for the love which our Master bore us. As a father tenderly pities an unfortunate, erring son or daughter, so the Lord pities us, no doubt, who keenly feel the loss we have suffered by past wrongs. But sleepy children rouse up for a moment, and really think they will get up and robe themselves for duty; but they only settle back to dream that they are doing great things, while they are actually missing the reality. Some of them do thus. Shall we be of that class? Let us unclog the wheels, and have the blessing to-day.

—“An American traveler who had made the tour of Europe on foot, was asked what guided him in selecting a resting-place at night; he replied, ‘The presence of flowers. Whenever I find flowers in the yard or garden, well cultivated, I am sure of meeting people with generous hearts. They may be ignorant of books and of the world, but I always find them hospitable and kind to a stranger. Flowers to me,’ he said, ‘are the sign and indication of an elevated humanity.’”

A SONG OF PRAISE. PS. 23.

BY MRS. M. M. STOWELL.

THE Lord's my shepherd I'll not want Tho' poverty surround;
For in him doth all fullness dwell,
And every good abound.

In pastures green he leadeth me
Beside the waters still,
And in the paths of righteousness;
Therefore I'll fear no ill.

If thro' the dark and shad'wy vale
My pathway e'er should lie,
Thy rod and staff shall comfort me,
For thou art ever nigh.

A table thou preparest me
Mine enemies before,
My head with oil thou dost anoint,
My cup—it runneth o'er.

Goodness and mercy follow me
Thro' all my weary days,
And I a tribute render thee,
Of grateful thanks and praise.

FAST FULFILLING PROPHECY.

BY T. M. LANE.

AS most of the readers of the REVIEW are acquainted with the exposition of the tenth chapter of the Revelation, it will not be necessary to dwell at length upon the chapter and its connection, to show where it is that the last verse applies; but to show that this verse is now in process of fulfillment would require only a little time and space. John, standing as the representative of the church, was addressed by the angel as follows: “And he said unto me, Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings.”

This, then, is another message or work signifying that one preceded it, which we find, by going back a little, was a mighty angel declaring that time should be no longer, from the little book now open in his hand, which was once closed. Dan. 12:4. We are carried down over the prophetic chain till we come to the expiration of all prophetic time, which we know to be 1844, A. D., when we reach the limits of that message; and the proper application of the eleventh verse could not be discerned till the time movement was developed, and we passed 1844. Here, then, we reach the hour of his judgment (chap. 14:6, 7), at which point comes another prophecy (chap. 10:11), with no more to follow, clearly pointing out that it is the last, and something of great importance, or it would not be heralded to many peoples, nations, tongues, and kings.

“Thou must prophesy,” does not mean that in any way you are to add to the Bible, but, according to the original, to speak from the impulse of divine inspiration, showing that in the fulfillment of this a people must carry the word of God to the world in a sense that no others are doing it. So we ask, Has there been any class of people within the last forty years that have been engaged in Bible work as no others have, lifting all the down-trodden truths and restoring them to their proper places, elevating all its principles and virtues, showing the importance of rendering obedience to God's word instead of the commandments of men, building the old waste places, raising up the foundations of many generations, restoring the old paths, making plain the word of revelation, and intimately connecting with all this the facts of Scripture that show the end of all things to be at hand; that the nations are angry and in great distress; that the mystery of the gospel is nearly finished; that the hour of Judgment is soon to close, and the great consummation is at hand?—Yes, there has been a class of people doing just this kind of work.

Then we inquire, further, How extensive has been this effort? Has it gone to many peoples? We could have answered in the affirmative more than twenty years ago. But how about going to many nations, has this been accomplished?—Most assuredly, years in the past. Does it embrace different languages in these nations?—Yes; different nationalities are engaged in its promulgation, so that some over twenty different periodicals, in different tongues, are going continually to the ends of the earth; and besides, books, tracts, and missionary letters are being sent in large quantities to all countries and missionary stations; also the living preacher, canvasser, and colporter are following these to most nations and the islands of the seas, and this, too, in the interests of a great and closing reform, based entirely upon the Bible, the word of divine inspiration.

But, last of all, it is to go before the kings of the earth. The word “kings” does not always signify a person sitting on a throne and bearing that title, but as here used has reference to the great and leading men of the nations,—the influential and representative men, those who hold the reins of government and society, the legislative and law-making powers of earth where this reform and message have been published. This, Christian friends, will be the closing and final step that will declare the mystery finished and bring the Son of God, our Saviour, to earth the second time.

To the inquiring mind, desiring to know how the Third Angel's Message will reach the representative men and potentates of earth,—whether through the minister direct or some missionary operation,—we will simply cite one or two cases as examples. Moses went down into Egypt to bring up the Lord's people from bondage; but where did he end his work there before he brought them forth? Was it not before Pharaoh or in the king's court? Again, how was it with Christ as he finished his earthly ministry? Was he not led to the judgment hall, brought before Herod and Pilate, and, last of all, before the leading men of the country? Take the case of Paul. He labored hard for many years in the cause of God, but at the close was brought to Rome to answer for his course in the presence of the law-making powers and men of authority.

Thus it has been with most great reforms in God's work all the way along, and shall we expect anything less at the close and final triumph of the plan of salvation, when Satan will work with all power?—No, indeed! But as a token of what may be expected in the future in this work, we have but to refer to the cases of our own brethren in the States of Arkansas and Tennessee; also to Eld. Conradi's trip to Russia, etc. But we ask all to remember that when victory turns on Zion's side, and the great song of deliverance is sung by those who have been faithful through the last crisis, they exclaim with ecstatic joy, “Just and true are thy ways, thou King of nations” (margin). Rev. 15:3. The ways of the kings of earth have been oppressive and hard, even to confiscation of property and imprisonment; nevertheless deliverance comes, they ascend on high, realizing the difference between true and false ways. Then “strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees. Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense, he will come and save you.”

CONVERSION.

BY E. E. MARVIN.

ALL Christians agree that “except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.” Matt. 18:3. But many and varied are the views as to what constitutes true conversion. Although the sinner may pass this revolutionary point called conversion, and then fall away, and eventually be lost, yet it is absolutely certain that no sinner can have even a hope of salvation who has not been converted. Then, if conversion is an absolute necessity in every case, it becomes all-important to know just what conversion is; for there can be no substitute for this essential experience.

It is held by many that God does all the work for us, and to verify this, reference is made to such passages as Eze. 36:26, 27: “A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes.” From this it is claimed that God in his own good time will not only convert us, but that he will see to it that we walk in his statutes, i. e., obey his commandments; and from these premises it is easily inferred that if God desired us to keep the Sabbath statute, he would be true to his word to cause us to walk in it. But it is wrong to thus deal with God's word. Let us read Eze. 18:30, 31: “Re-

HAVE FAITH

"WHATSOEVER YE SHALL ASK IN MY NAME, THAT WILL I DO." John 14:13.

Nothing with God is great or small.
He hears our cries, and heeds them all.
Granted, they be but prayers of faith,
They reach the ear of him who saith,
"I will that men pray everywhere."
A life of faith breathes but in prayer.
Who talks with God alone can find True science—healing of the mind.
Who talks with God and God with him,
Has doubtless learned the cure of sin.
Who talks with God has reached the goal
Where man becomes a living soul.
Pour then your wishes and your care
Into our Heavenly Father's ear,
Nor deem the smallest care too small
For him who notes the sparrow's fall.

PRINCIPLES BY WHICH TO INTERPRET PROPHECY.—NO. 2.

BY. ELD. D. T. BOURDEAU.

I. We should distinguish between literal and symbolic prophecies, making the symbolic prophecies bend to the literal, and not the literal to the symbolic. Take as an illustration the signs in the sun, moon, and stars, noticed in our previous article. We say they are literal because they are presented in a literal prophecy. The parable of the fig tree is used by the Saviour as a striking comparison, to give more force to signs which were to come under the observation of those who should witness them, as well as to benefit all those to whom they were designed to teach the important lesson concerning the nearness of Christ's literal coming.

Again, Christ and also the prophets place them unmistakably in the literal heavens. In Luke 21:25 the Saviour says: "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring." Here the signs are spoken of as occurring in a region distinct from our earth, though witnessed by those dwelling on the earth. They occur in the sun, moon, and stars. And if these are not to be taken in their literal sense, how do we know but that the earth on which is to be distress of nations is some other planet? It were preposterous to suppose such a thing. It is the very earth on which there is "distress of nations with perplexity," and to which Christ is coming, that the Saviour is speaking about; and he also places the signs of his coming, in the sun, moon, and stars, which are connected with our earth.

The same truth is taught in Joel 2:30, 31: "And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come." Here the heavens are spoken of as being distinct from the earth; and the sun that is to be turned into darkness and the moon into blood are in the very heavens in which the Lord is to show wonders, before the great and terrible day shall come.

John speaks of the same signs, and adds: "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together." Rev. 6:13, 14. Isaiah had used similar language centuries before Christ. Isa. 34:4: "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree." Here, as in Rev. 6:13, the manner in which the stars were to fall is given. What force would there be in applying this to nations? Think of their falling "like a fig-tree that casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind." But it was just in this way that the stars, or meteors, fell Nov. 13, 1833. They did not fall perpendicularly to the earth, but they shot off in every direction, crossing and recrossing one another in their fall, thus presenting the appearance of a perfect network.

Also, individuality is given to the signs in the sun and moon, thus: "And the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood." Rev. 6:12. (See also Joel 2:31.) This fitly presents the appearance of the sun and that of the moon, on the dark day of May 19, 1780. The sun arose in its clearness, without a cloud to be seen in the heavens. Soon a yellowish tinge appeared around it, and it became more and more dense, till the sun presented the appearance of sackcloth of hair. Its rays were obstructed as would be those of a lamp around which was thrown a sack made of hair. Candles were lighted, schools were dismissed, the fowls retired to roost, wild beasts made doleful noises as they do in the night, the domestic animals gathered around man, as if to seek his protection against some awful calamity. Mere instinct was sufficient to teach them a lesson which many of those who lay claim to superiority over the brute beasts, refuse to learn. And the first appearance of the moon, as she merged out of the darkness the night following, was as if she had been dipped in blood.

Thus the prophecy was literally fulfilled by the very event it clearly pointed out. The hand of God was in it, and all the powers and wisdom of scoffing men and evil angels cannot neutralize and counteract it. The signs in the sun, moon, and stars are like a nail driven in a sure place by the Master of Assemblies, defying the might of the mightiest of earth, and the sophistry of those who would be wise above what is written, and wiser than their Maker.

And, as might be expected, the leading signs of so important an event as the coming of the dear Saviour, are predicted in language that is clear, unequivocal, unmistakable, and the literal prophecies describing them cannot be made to bend to symbolic prophecies. That were bringing indefiniteness and confusion on that which is definite and harmonious,—turning the truth of God into a lie, and helping the enemies of God and his truth in swelling the tide of unbelief in a message and work on which hang the destiny of the present generation.

Some, overlooking this principle, seize Rev. 8:12, where, under the fourth trumpet, the sun, moon, and stars are used symbolically, to represent governments, and fall back on the signs as given by the Saviour in Matthew 24, and say they also are symbolical, and represent the overturn of nations and kingdoms. But this interpretation is inadmissible in the light of the principle already laid down, and sustained by plain scriptures that cannot be turned out of their natural meaning by symbolic prophecies, which, though teaching the truth, are not intended to give a law for interpreting the literal portions of God's word.

The principle under consideration is in perfect accord with reason and science. It is reasonable that in Bible science, as well as in the sciences outside of Holy Writ, that which is plain and easy should have the priority, and be allowed to explain that which is difficult. To ignore so fundamental a principle as this in the study of prophecy, would be to prepare the way to violate one of the fundamental principles of Protestantism; namely, that the Bible is its own expositor. For what would tend more to put human interpretation in the place of divine, than to shut up one's self to that which is difficult in prophecy, and not evoke the aid of those portions of Scripture that are plain and easily understood, and that furnish the key to its real sense and true interpretation.

Such a course would, if generally followed, produce as many interpretations of prophecy as there are tastes and favorite opinions. And, indeed, such is the result that has been reached by following this very course. And what is the effect produced?—Bringing the prophecies into disrepute, and leading many who claim that the Bible is a sufficient rule of faith and practice, and that it is the privilege of every man endowed with reasoning faculties to understand its teachings, to regard the prophetic portions of Scripture as impenetrable mysteries.

A true shepherd puts food and provender within the reach of his sheep; and when Jesus and the prophets undertake to feed us with truth relating to the coming of the Lord of glory, they will not put the spiritual food we so much need so high that we cannot reach it, nor be benefited thereby. In science, plain, fundamental principles are first laid down to serve as means to explain the principles and difficulties that follow. If we pursue this course in the study of prophecy, noble achievements, sweet harmony, and great encouragement will be sure to follow.

BROTHERLY LOVE.

BY ELD. S. J. HERSUM.

THE apostle speaks of love as originating with God, and therefore coming from him (1 John 4:7); and the two great commandments enjoin upon man the duty to love God with all his heart, and love his neighbor as himself. Matt. 22:37-40. One evidence that we have passed from death unto life, is, "because we love the brethren." 1 John 3:14. But on the other hand, the apostle

WHAT WOULD IT BE?

THE bone and muscle of the National Reform movement are very sensitive over the charge that a union of church and state would be the result of the success of their movement. But their attempts to explain away the charge, and dodge the issue, do not seem to affect the ideas of the generality of the people; for scarcely one in a hundred who discusses the subject from a Constitutional stand-point, fails to devote a part of his effort to the discussion of the question of church and state in this country, as if that were so evidently involved in the project as not to admit of any question at all. The Press, of Cleveland, O., in its issue of Feb. 12, 1889, replies to an article in the Cleveland Leader, which advocates the teaching of the Christian religion by law in the public schools. The Press charges the Leader with advocating, in this movement, a union of church and state, which the framers of the Constitution had the good sense to avoid. It says:—

"Some religious instruction should find a place in them." Thus the Leader concludes a long article upon the public schools. Let us see where this would lead. The public schools are the creation of law. Whatever is taught in them is provided by law. Law is the result of the public will as expressed at the ballot-box. Therefore, it follows that if religion is to be taught in the common schools, it must be the religion of those who hold the greatest number of votes. This would mean that in some localities one kind of religion would be taught, while in others, other kinds would be taught. When majorities changed, the sort of religion given out in the schools would change. Does the Leader want a religion of majorities propagated at the expense of all? Would not this result in a denial of the right of conscience in a matter the most serious of all matters with most people? Suppose the Leader could have its way, and have religion taught in the public schools; and suppose the writer of the Leader article had a child which attended school, and in that school a style of religion was taught which was obnoxious to the said Leader writer. How would he like it? The hostility of the Leader to some forms of the Christian religion is too well known to make it necessary to consider further how it would like to take its own medicine in such a case. Nor is the Leader alone in the matter of religious prejudice. Probably seven out of ten of all people of adult age have ardent likes and dislikes on this subject. The framers of the National Constitution well understood what State-made religion meant, and they, therefore, concluded to have no union of church and state in this country. What the Leader advocates is what the framers of the Constitution intended to avoid, and what 100 years of experience have shown to have been wisdom. Politics are bad enough now, with their elements of office-seeking and business greed as factors to sway men's actions at the polls. To interject the rivalries and intense prejudices of religious opinion into elections, would be a thing so serious that one cannot forbear concluding that the article from which the above quotation is taken was written with more reference to local popularity than as a serious general proposition of good policy.

INFIDEL PHILOSOPHY ON THE "DARK DAY."

THE most prominent characteristic of infidel philosophy is its supreme self-confidence. Armed with the mighty weapon of human intelligence, there are few mysteries in the universe with which it will not undertake to grapple, especially if it sees any occasion for disproving the existence of the supernatural. It is bound not to admit the existence of any higher Intelligence than itself, and therefore must needs eliminate the element of the mysterious from all phenomena pointing in this direction. One of its latest attempts in this line is an explanation of the memorable Dark Day of May 19, 1780, showing it to have been nothing more than the result of a little chance acting in unison with some of the well-known laws of nature. This "explanation" appears in the Boston Investigator of Jan. 30. The writer opens up the subject thus:—

Mr. EDITOR: Remarkable as to extent, duration, and intensity, yet clearly within the domain of natural physics, ranks the mysterious Dark Day of May 19, 1780.

Passing over the writer's statement of the characteristics of the occurrence, which are too well known to our readers to need repeating, we quote what is said as to the extent of the phenomenon and its duration:—

It was on Friday, and the beginning of this remarkable gloom was between the hours of ten and eleven in the forenoon. Its continuation was past the middle of the following night, with somewhat varying features in different localities. The wind came generally from the southwest, and the darkness seemed to come with it from that direction. Soon the gloom became too intense to see common print distinctly, and household duties had mainly to be performed with lighted candles. The obscuration extended all along the New England coast; westward as far as Albany (N. Y.); southward along the coast of Maryland, South Carolina, and Georgia; and northward as far as any American settlement extended. How far beyond these boundaries this phenomenon was manifest, will never be known, but in all likelihood, as will appear further on in the explanation of this mystery, a large part of the area of the present United States may have been involved.

A phenomenon so wide-spread in its manifestation and so awe-inspiring in its features, ought, it would seem, to have awakened a spirit of investigation which would have led to the speedy discovery of the causes which produced it, were those causes merely such as occur in the common processes of nature. To account for the absence of any such discovery, the writer is obliged to suppose that "the 'scientists' of the time, if there were any, were under too much religious domination to be either analytical or logical; or were in realms too remote to adjust to home-happenings—had focussed their gaze too far away—as the incubating graduate is sometimes more conversant with the mysteries of the 'Milky Way' than with the township boundaries of his county." He also assumes that there existed at the time a dense ignorance of "the great physical interior of this great country," the exact place where the chief cause of the phenomenon, as he assigns it, originated. Both these suppositions, and especially the latter, require a considerable amount of proof (which is not forthcoming) to make them tenable.

Having given a brief summary of the meteorological observations made shortly before and during the prevalence of the darkness, and having noticed a few of the untenable theories by which others have sought to explain it, he proceeds to assign the true cause, by which, as he says, this phenomenon is "found to yield readily to solution," the opinions of Herschel, the "Advents," and others to the contrary notwithstanding. A brief statement of the conditions of the problem is first given, as follows:—

The atmosphere was heavily charged with a large quantity of vapor floating or resting near the surface of the earth. This vapor was a palpable, visible, material substance, discernible to the sight, sensible to feeling, perceptible to the taste, and recognizable to the smell. These are four important witnesses, whose testimony is worthy of profound consideration. There was a foreign ingredient in the atmosphere, and this, to exhibit any of the characteristics noticed, . . . could only come from a limited field of sources.

This "foreign ingredient," the writer further says, "was not any of the forms of the aqueous, as any of these would condense and precipitate long before attaining any such volume of opacity." Then what was it? Ans.—An immense volume of smoke and soot from a vast conflagration raging somewhere in the then unknown interior of the American continent. We quote again:—

On the occasion under consideration, there was no one to report the vast conflagrations that raged over perhaps many hundreds of square miles of dry leaves or dry grass, perhaps fanned by brisk gales, and the vapor and sooty substance carried high up by ascending air-currents, to be loaded on favoring breezes to be wafted over the land of the Pilgrims, there to meet, as it were, an atmospheric barrier, and gather volume and thicken as already indicated. This condition would continue just so long as the gravity and pressure of resisting currents remained in statu quo. So soon as this dam gave way, the accumulated substance would move on and disperse.

This, then, is all there was to it; and the memorable and mysterious Dark Day, which has created such a profound impression from that time to the present; which has been universally associated with a divine agency; which many have even regarded as a fulfillment of the prophetic word, is relegated from the realm of the supernatural to that of occurrences whose variation in character from the commonplace is due solely to the intervention of chance. The prophetic statement that "in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light" (Mark 13: 24) has only the smoke of an immense burning forest or prairie, combined with favorable atmospheric conditions, for its fulfillment. So infidel philosophy invites us to believe.

But unfortunately for this theory, it is out of harmony with facts. Exploration and settlement to the southwest of New England had long preceded the advent of the Dark Day, as a reference to almost any American history will show. We quote from Johnson's Cyclopedia in reference to the early settlement of Missouri and Illinois, territory as far removed from New England in the line of this alleged conflagration as could well be supposed to have been the scene of its occurrence. In Vol. IV., p. 195, is this reference to Illinois:—

The first white settlements in this State were made by the French from Canada, and were the result of the enterprise of the great explorer, the Sieur de la Salle. He came from Canada in 1679 to the Illinois River, which he named from an Indian tribe which he called Illini, living on its banks. In 1682 he came again with a colony of Canadians and made settlements at Kaskaskia, Cahokia, etc. These settlements increased, and the Jesuit missionaries visited the region early in the eighteenth century. . . . In 1763 the English Government, by the conquest of Canada, succeeded to the dominion over all this region.

From Vol. V., p. 481, we quote in reference to Missouri:—

The present State of Missouri was known as Upper Louisiana. Under this name its lead mines began to be known as early as 1720, and settlements were made not long after, at St. Louis, Cape Girardeau, and (probably about 1755) at St. Genevieve. In 1763 it was ceded to Spain with the rest of the Louisiana or Mississippi country, while all east of the river came into possession of the English in 1775. St. Louis had attained some reputation as a fur-depot and trading-station, and had about 800 inhabitants, and St. Genevieve about half as many. New Madrid had been founded some time before.

It needs no argument, indeed, to show that at the time of these settlements, there must have been hunters, trappers, and other adventurers scattered all through this territory, to say nothing of the Indian tribes which had long made the region their home; and the same could not have been less true of any portion of country less remote from the frontiers of civilization. The supposition, therefore, that "on the occasion under consideration there was no one to report the vast conflagrations that raged over perhaps many hundreds of square miles" somewhere to the southwest of New England, in the light of a few historical facts, loses at once all traces of plausibility. A conflagration of such magnitude as would have been required to darken the Atlantic coast from Maine to South Carolina, besides obscuring an unknown extent of country inland, could not have escaped observation by a person anywhere in its vicinity; and the fact that no report has ever been made of such an occurrence, either in the traditions of the early settlers or of the native tribes, is conclusive evidence that nothing of the kind took place.

But this theory of accounting for the Dark Day, though perhaps new to the readers of the Investigator, has been long known to investigative science, and by it thoroughly considered and disposed of. We quote again from the foregoing cyclopedia (Vol. II., pp. 851, 852) an extract from an article on the subject of the Dark Day, by Mr. F. A. P. Barnard. Speaking of dark days in general, he says:—

The several hypotheses which have been suggested in explanation of this subject, and which seem to exhaust the limited list of possibilities, are as follows: (1) The smoke of vast burning forests, loading the atmosphere, and shutting out the light of the sun.

Then follow other hypotheses which it is not the purpose of this article to consider. Coming to the separate consideration of each, the writer continues:—

The first of these hypotheses is disposed of by Dr. [Noah] Webster very summarily, by presenting two conclusive considerations, which are: (1.) that there has been no evidence of the occurrence of great forest conflagrations immediately before these days of darkness or simultaneously with them; and (2.) that if such conflagrations had existed, the cause is not adequate to the observed effect. "Had the woods," he remarks, "from the 40th to the 50th parallel of latitude been consumed in a day, the smoke would have been insufficient to produce the darkness of the 19th of May, 1780." And as a further confirmation of this conclusion, he adds that the color of smoke is very different from that of the obscuring stratum on the day referred to.

Further evidence on the subject is unnecessary. To the minds of the party represented by the Investigator, this solution of the phenomenon of the Dark Day may be very satisfactory; but while the philosophy of which that journal is the expositor, turns from this attempt to its regular and ever-progressive job of "upsetting Moses," the memorable occurrence of May 19, 1780, will remain undivested, so far as this "solution" is concerned, of that mystery which has made it, in the minds of most Americans, an occasion of awe and wonder, and vividly suggestive in its characteristics, of a direct exercise of supernatural power.

"IN THEIR MOUTH WAS FOUND NO GUILE."

THIS declaration is made by the beloved John, concerning the 144,000 who are "redeemed from among men;" i. e., those who are translated from among the living at the coming of Christ. That we have properly located the 144,000 as the living saints who are taken to heaven from among the people at the second advent of our Redeemer, is easy of demonstration. They are a special company who are sealed with the seal of the living God (God's holy Sabbath) in the last days (Revelation 7), under the opening of the sixth seal, after the signs of Christ's second coming are given. So important is this sealing work, that God commissions holy angels to hold in check for a season the winds of strife, war, and commotion among the angry nations, till it is accomplished. How remarkably this has been in process of fulfillment during the last quarter of a century!

These are seen with the Lamb (Rev. 14:1) on Mount Zion as soon as they are translated, at the close of the work of the two-horned beast,—the last political power developed on our earth. They are a special company, distinct from all the rest of the saved. Doubtless this is because the perils through which they have passed have been greater, as the last days are most perilous of all (2 Tim. 3:1), and the circumstances of their salvation (they being translated without death) are very different. And may we not believe that their holiness and purity will be conspicuous also, in view of the statements made concerning them? "They are without fault before the throne of God." They have no guile in their mouths. They are a pure, sincere, and holy people. They are "redeemed from among men;" i. e., in an instant, while alive among the mass of mankind around them, these receive the touch of immortality, without going through the gates of death and the resurrection, and soar away to heaven with Jesus their Redeemer. They follow the "Lamb whithersoever he goeth." He forever favors this special company with his presence. What a glorious prospect before the 144,000!

Seventh-day Adventists have ever believed this company to be those who were to be saved when Christ comes. They are pure as virgins,—free from defilement with apostate churches, symbolized in the text as "women." They are to meet the fearful scenes connected with the closing of human probation. It will be the highest possible honor to belong to this class. As the scenes through which they pass are the grandest, most awful, and most dangerous of any through which God's people have ever had to pass, and as the purity with which the inspired writer characterizes them is of the highest possible order,—they are "without fault,"—it surely becomes us as a people, now in close proximity to the end, to examine ourselves critically, to ascertain if we possess these characteristics.

The preparation and purification are to be wrought in us here in the days of probation. The moral change precedes the translation to heaven. If these characteristics are not possessed before Christ comes, they never will be. For when Christ closes his work as priest, before he comes after his people as "King of kings and Lord of lords," the solemn decree goes forth, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still." "Behold, I come quickly." Rev. 22:11, 12. There is no moral change after this. All that remains is the touch of immortality, and the going home to reign with Christ.

Dear reader, is there "guile" in our mouths now? If so, it must certainly be put away, or we shall never belong to that blessed company. Webster defines "guile" as "craft, cunning, artifice, duplicity, deceit." He defines "cunning," one of the definitions of guile, as "the faculty or act of using stratagem to accomplish a purpose," etc. He defines "artifice" as "artful or skillful contrivance, an artful, ingenious device," etc., and "deceit" as "any declaration, artifice, or practice which misleads another, or causes him to believe what is false," etc.

The original words from which "guile" is translated have substantially the same meaning. It is evident, then, that "guile" is the opposite of sincerity, probity, truthfulness, frankness, uprightness, and openness of heart. It embraces all dissembling and that worldly policy and finesse which endeavors to lead one to believe that which really is not true. It covers all forms of untruthfulness and deception.

As our Saviour teaches that all our words, acts, and thoughts proceed from the heart, it follows that those who have no "guile" in their mouths, will have honest, sincere, and truthful hearts. They will discard all deception and pretense, and will think, speak, and act truthfully.

As we look about us in this world, we find it filled with every form of deception. Comparatively few are the persons whom we can really trust. Treachery and deceit exist everywhere. The commercial world is filled with them. In buying and selling, we expect to meet untruthful laudation or unjust depreciation, and have to guard against them at every turn. And we often find ourselves cheated in the end. High positions in the business world often cover great rascality. It is thought by many that success in trade is impossible, without more or less dissimulation. Tradesmen's promises are often wholly unreliable. It is fortunate that there are some honorable exceptions, or we should be obliged to lose all faith in humanity.

Even in the government of nations we see abundance of deception. "Politicians' promises" have passed into a proverb to represent something wholly unreliable. It has even come to that pass where the representative men of great parties meet by hundreds and thousands to formulate "platforms" of principles upon which to go before the people, containing promises and professions they never expect to carry out, in case they are raised to power, but by which they hope to deceive the people into voting for them. We can but merely glance at the ever-varying forms and all-prevailing presence of deception in the world in general. How is it among the people who expect to compose that company of 144,000 in number, concerning whom it can be said of every person in it, "In their mouth was found no guile"? Alas! we greatly fear that surprising changes will have to be seen among both ministers and people, before this can be said of us.

We often ask ourselves the question, "Are our people really better than other professed Christians around them, in their daily lives, their dealings with others, their honesty, integrity, truthfulness, their upright characters, their purity, generosity, sense of honor, their compassion for the sick and suffering?" We know their zeal for the success of the cause, their desire to see it go to all the world, their belief in important doctrines,—in the Lord's soon coming, etc. These are excellent things to believe—great truths, which we should not neglect. But if they make us no better men and women in our personal characters, no more truthful, pure in heart, free from deception, cheating, lying, etc., surely the coming of the Lord will be of no personal benefit to us. If guile is found in our mouths, deceit in our conduct, dissembling and lying in words and acts, we shall not go with the 144,000, but be without the city, where all liars dwell, "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." This thought, kind reader, is worthy of your candid consideration.

From much observation we are led to believe there are many among us who do not scruple to actually cheat and deceive in business dealings. They will recommend their own property too highly, by actual exaggeration, or by a neglect to make known the faults and blemishes or other evil things in that which they wish to trade or sell, so that the other party is really deceived by their presentation of the case; and they wish him to be deceived. They may not actually tell a lie in words, but they really do it by acts or omissions, so that the other party fails to understand the matter in its true light. Let us never forget that all exaggeration is a falsehood just to the extent that it goes beyond the truth; and that we can deceive by concealing the truth as really as by actual falsehood. The motive before God is the same in both cases. Both show the guile within. Covetousness, which is forbidden by the tenth commandment; lying, which is forbidden by the ninth; and stealing, the transgression of the eighth, are often all perpetrated in such dealings. We shall find in the judgment that these commands of God are of the same obligation as the fourth. How astonishing it is that those who profess to be looking for the Lord to come will befoul their characters and blight their hopes and ruin their souls, to gain a little filthy lucre through covetousness and deception!

Tradesmen and professional men fall into habits of small lying by the exigencies of business, often times almost without knowing it. The shoemaker, blacksmith, etc., being driven by a pressure of work, form the habit of making promises they well know, with a moment's reflection, they can never fulfill. They thus benumb their consciences into the habit of telling many little lies each day. This is "guile," and very foolish at that; for the one who does it but damages his own reputation, and in the end forfeits the confidence of his customers till they will not believe him when he does tell the truth.

Physicians and other professional men pressed upon by those desiring their services, fall into such habits in much the same way. They say, "I will see you in a few minutes," or "in five minutes," or promise to meet a certain appointment at such and such a time, when a moment's thought would show them that they cannot do so. Hours upon hours, others, depending upon them, wait upon their promises, till after awhile no confidence whatever is had in any appointment they make. Men otherwise highly esteemed, through carelessness and lack of conscience, fall into such wretched habits as this—fall into falsehood and common lying—we can call it nothing less. Is this not "guile"?

Habits of gossip, so generally indulged in, generate this evil enormously. Flying reports, idle stories, and evil insinuations, pass current among all classes. In some of them there may perhaps be grains of truth. The one who originated them is not the one wholly responsible for their circulation; for if confined to the originator, they would do comparatively little damage! The one who circulates idle gossip prejudicial to the reputation of others, is really as guilty as the one who sets it in motion. Though the one who repeats it may be ignorant of its true nature, yet its effects upon the reputation of others is none the less in-this is at a time when he says the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Verse 8. We read of the remnant of the woman's seed (Rev. 12:17), who keep the commandments of God. This remnant must certainly be the last of the church on earth before the Lord comes, and therefore are the ones who live in the time of the end. Upon them the dragon, the Devil, makes bitter war because of their obedience to all the commandments of God. They are again spoken of in Rev. 14:12.

By carefully comparing Revelation 13 with chapters 14 and 7, it will be clearly seen that the part of the law on which their test will come, is the command which contains the Lamb's Father's name. Rev. 14:1. This is none other than the fourth precept of the law, which enjoins the Sabbath of the Lord, the memorial and seal of the living God. Rev. 7:2. The conflict will be fierce and the test terrible. Like the prophet Daniel and his three companions, they will be appointed to death unless they yield up their loyalty to God. Rev. 13:15. Then may they look with profit to the example of those ancient, holy commandment-keepers, and be encouraged by their experience: as the angel of the Lord was sent to keep the prophet from harm in the midst of those ravenous, wild beasts; and as one like the Son of God walked with the three worthies in the glowing fiery furnace and not even the smell of fire passed on them, so will he manifest his mighty power to keep his faithful, obedient, remnant people, and show himself strong in behalf of those whose hearts are perfect toward him. "Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. [See Rev. 14:1.] He shall call upon me and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honor him." Ps. 91:14, 15.

AMERICA AS A MISSIONARY FIELD.

BY ETHAN LANPHEAR.

WHILE our country is a professedly Christian nation, it seems to us, from statistics, that we are far from Christian as a people, and that the United States is one of the nations open to missionary work, if there is a nation in the world that is. Statistics show that our country west of the Mississippi River has a population of 12,000,000, and of that number only about 2,500,000 are members of, or adherents to, any denomination. It has also been stated that only about seven out of each one hundred young men in our whole country between the ages of sixteen and thirty, attend church of any kind. This seems like rather a dark picture for a Christian nation. It would seem from these figures that we have plenty of heathen at our own door. These people are not entirely ignorant of the gospel of salvation, but lack for want of a teacher or missionary to explain to them the unsearchable riches of God's mercy and grace set forth in his word.

But how can they hear without a preacher? Should not a missionary be sent to every settlement in our land, and to every dark corner of our cities? Every Sabbath-keeper in our land should be in readiness to aid in the work of establishing missions among these people, that they may be properly taught of God's law, of the Sabbath, and salvation from sin—the transgression of the law of the true God. Let these people be properly taught, and they will have a desire to worship the true God, and to revere his commandments, and the seventh day of the week as his Sabbath, instead of the Sunday and the sun god or the gods of Baal. Seventh-day Adventists, Seventh-day Baptists, Jews, and Gentiles of America, is not the field open to all for a more earnest effort to convert our nation to the worship of the true God? Let this be thoroughly done, and no Sunday law will be demanded, neither wanted, for all would then be ready to keep the seventh day, the Sabbath of the Lord.

—Heaven always favors the honest purpose.

BY FANNIE BOLTON.
(Battle Creek, Mich.)

Take a look at the cross
When the way grows dreary,
When thy life seems loss,
And thy heart is weary.
Stop not to weep and bewail thy loss;
Turn to Calvary's hill. Take a look at the cross.

When griefs are thy part,
When, like thorns that harrow,
They encircle thy heart
With their prongs of sorrow,
O, think of Him who each grief hath borne!
O, look away to his crown of thorn!

Does there stretch in gloom,
The bars of a shadow,
O'er the fields of bloom
In thy life's fair meadow,
Darkening the joy that seemed all but thine?
What a shadow fell o'er the life divine!

It was all for thee,
That Christ took the path
Through Gethsemane
To the hill of wrath.
It was all for thee, that he counted loss
The joy of heaven, till he'd borne the cross.

Take a look at the cross
When the way grows dreary,
When thy life seems loss,
And thy heart is weary.
Lay thy bleeding heart at his bleeding side,
And assuage thy grief in the Crucified.

How the heart melts there!
How the sorrow ceases!
How falls the care!
How the burden eases!
Hast thou cause for plaint? Hast thou suffered loss?
O, what hast thou borne in the light of the cross?

And there at the cross
Is a way of vision,
Through all the earth—loss,
To the home elysian.
There's the Comforter's love, and the Saviour's breast.
O, weary one, look to the cross, and rest.

NEITHER SPIRIT NOR LETTER.

How Sunday is Generally Kept.

BY W. A. COLCORD.
(Battle Creek, Mich.)

THE following story related by the Rev. George H. Hubbard, of Norton, Mass., in the Sunday School Times of May 11, together with the reverend gentleman's comments and candid admissions, so correctly pictures the manner in which Sunday is generally observed at the present time by professors of religion, that we present it to the readers of the REVIEW.

SUNDAY CONVERSATION.

In the "good old days," when Sunday was observed with Puritanic strictness in New England, there lived a couple of worthy deacons in a little Massachusetts town. Like most orthodox New England deacons, they were exceedingly scrupulous in the fulfillment of all religious duties. They were also great lovers of horse-flesh, and shrewd in matters of trade.

It chanced, on a fine Sunday morning, so the story goes, as those two deacons drove up to the church-door with their families, that Deacon Smith had a new horse, which he had purchased only a few days before. Deacon Jones observed the fact, and took a good look at the animal. Nothing was said at the time; but after the morning service, while the "women folks" were discussing the latest scandal in a neighboring village, and the children were strolling about the churchyard, nibbling their lunches, Deacon Jones cautiously approached his brother deacon with the remark:—

"So you've got a new horse, eh? Quite a fair-looking nag, too. If it was n't Sunday, how would you trade with me?"

"Brother Jones," returned Deacon Smith, with just a shade of reproof in his tone, "you know I don't trade horses on the Lord's day. But seeing you've mentioned the subject, if it was n't Sunday, I'd like to talk with you. Your horse is a trifle old, you know, and can't do as much work as this one. I should probably want about fifty dollars to boot."

"If it was n't Sunday," rejoined Deacon Jones, "I'd give you twenty-five."

*"I am ashamed that I ever thought I had a hard time; that I ever complained of my trials. One look at the cross makes me feel that I have endured nothing for Jesus and his truth." Words spoken by Eld. James White a few weeks before his death.

Thus the "dickering" went on. Each time the offer was made with a saving clause, "If it was n't Sunday," until finally a point of agreement was reached, and it was mutually understood that they should meet on Monday morning and make the trade. Then they went into the church, and slept through the afternoon sermon with a peace only consistent with restful consciences and the assurance that they had strictly observed the sanctity of the Sabbath in all they had done.

This was in the days of "Puritanic strictness," and in the State of Massachusetts where Puritanic laws were enacted compelling men and women to attend church services on Sunday or lay themselves liable to a fine. These laws evidently did not have the power nor effect, however, of sanctifying that day in the hearts of these "worthy deacons." But let us pass down the stream of time a century or two, and see if such a manner of observing the day is confined to a few worldly-minded deacons. Mr. Hubbard's comments are to the point:—

We cannot vouch for the truthfulness of this particular story, but we can find its parallel any Sunday in every community in the land. Inconsistency no less ridiculous is a weekly occurrence. Very many persons who observe the Lord's day scrupulously, so far as their occupations are concerned, are utterly careless and indiscriminate in their choice of topics for Sunday conversation. Farmers who would not do five minutes' work in the field on Sunday will discuss crops with their families and neighbors on the way to and from church, and will occupy all the leisure hours of the day in walking about their fields, laying plans for the work of the coming week, and talking about various parts of their work. Tradesmen, in the same way, discuss market reports, business prospects, recent developments of trade, or failures in which they have an interest. Railroad men on Sunday talk of the incidents and accidents of railroad life. Mechanics discuss the latest invention, and its bearing on their work. Lawyers recount the interesting, amusing, or important cases of the week. Doctors converse freely on professional or business topics. And even ministers of the gospel too often amuse their friends with wholly irrelevant conversation upon innumerable topics. Ladies talk about the fashions. Children talk of school, lessons, and play. Unfortunately, too, people of all classes may be heard speaking one to another of topics less worthy than these. Political and social questions, the latest concert, base-ball game, boat race, walking-match, prize-fight, etc., are discussed on every side. In short, the Sunday conversation of the majority of our Christian families is pretty accurately reproduced in its variety and unsanctity by the average Sunday newspaper.

And such is Sunday-keeping to-day by "the majority of our Christian families!" Is it any wonder that the Sunday newspaper has found an existence, and supplied so large a class of readers when the thoughts and conversation of the greater portion of those who profess to keep the day, run in the same channel that the paper does? or to state it a little differently, is it any wonder that the Sunday paper deals so largely in sensational literature and mundane topics when such is the case? Is it any wonder that Sunday trains have been run, Sunday base-ball games been played, and the religious observance of the day fallen into such general desuetude?

The evident trouble is, the day has largely lost its supposed sacredness. The majority of these people are coming to understand that it is not the Sabbath. And what can be done to bring back the spiritual regard for an observance of the day? There is no divine command for its sanctification to fall back upon. The day has neither letter nor spirit to sustain it. The only thing that can be done other than to abandon the day entirely, will be to create a letter for it by enacting a Puritanical Sunday law. And then those who regard it will have the question to solve whether in keeping it they are worshipping God or the government, the answer to which we think in the majority of cases will not be so inspiring as to make horse-trading on Sunday incompatible with the decision.

PRINCIPLES BY WHICH TO INTERPRET PROPHECY.—NO. 26.

BY ELD. D. T. BOURDEAU.
(Battle Creek, Mich.)

XVIII. We should not be exacting, in asking for signs of Christ's coming which the Lord has not seen fit to give us, lest that we harden our hearts against ample evidence, and that even some signs we are waiting for, come to us when it is too late to prepare for the day of God.

How numerous, how plain, how ample and complete, are the signs of the near coming of Christ! Yet these signs are by some thought to be insufficient to answer to the prophetic utterances which foretell and describe the tokens of the proximity of the day of Christ. Even the plainest of these signs are treated as though they were commonplace events that can be accounted for on natural and scientific principles, and which have nothing to do with warning the world of the approach of the day of the Lord.

With such the darkening of the sun, May 19, 1780, the refusal of the moon to give her light the night following, and the fall of stars of Nov. 13, 1833, constitute no sign of the near coming of Christ. And these phenomena are belittled as follows:—

1. They were confined to America, whereas events constituting so prominent a sign will be witnessed throughout the world.

2. They were not extraordinary, as similar ones have been witnessed at different epochs in the past; and it is now thought by some that the showers of fire that terrified the ancients were showers of stars or meteors.

3. The falls of stars are periodic, occurring once in about thirty-three years, and can be accounted for on purely natural and scientific principles. They are governed by the eternal laws of nature.

4. There was a remarkable darkness in America, October 19, 1762. Will you take this, or the darkness of May 19, 1780, as a part of the sign given by the Saviour in Matt. 24:39?

5. Among the showers of stars which have occurred since 1780, we have one in 1799, another in 1833, another in 1839, another in 1866, and another in 1872. Which of these answers to the prediction of the Saviour, and marks or identifies the last generation? Do you have the last generation commence with each of these events, or when all these events have transpired?

6. How can it be said that Christ was at the door in 1833?

7. We look for and demand other events that will better fulfill the prophecy of the Saviour than those we have noticed.

To which we reply:—

1. Christ does not say that the sign in question was to be witnessed throughout the world. He simply says, "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. 24:29. So far as this prediction is concerned, it was not necessary for the events to be witnessed in more than one part of the world. Why may not Americans have the privilege of witnessing some of the signs of the coming of the dear Redeemer? Surely the inhabitants of the Old World have had their share of the signs, prominent among which are the stripping of the papacy of its civil power, the decay of the Turkish empire, the terrible ravages of the vineyards by destructive insects (see Joel 1), the extraordinary preparations for war, etc. See Jer. 25:27, 28; Joel 3:9-15; Rev. 7:1-4; 16:13-16, etc.

Should the inhabitants of the Old World, who alone have enjoyed these and other striking signs, reject a sign because Americans are the only ones who have witnessed it? God has so distributed the signs that all shall be without excuse when Christ appears; and no one will say to Christ at his appearing, "You did not notify us of your coming." We Americans accept the signs that have appeared in the Old World, because our brethren there have witnessed and recorded them. Let the inhabitants of the Old World treat the signs that are peculiar to America, similarly, because their American brethren have witnessed and recorded them. And we Americans should be the last ones to turn away from privileges and blessings that were primarily vouchsafed to us.

If this objection is sufficient to rule out this sign, what shall we say of the star which we have always thought constituted one of the signs of the first coming of Christ, and which was witnessed by only a few astronomers in Judea who did not even belong to the Jewish nation? Matt. 2:1, 2, French translation.

2. We are not prepared to admit that the phenomena under consideration were not extraordinary. Even the fact that similar ones have been witnessed in the past, would not prove that they were not extraordinary. All believers in the Bible regard the darkness that occurred at the time of the plagues in Egypt as extraordinary. Why should not a similar darkness (though shorter in duration) that occurred in 1780, be also regarded as extraordinary? That darkness was extraordinary which occurred when Christ hung upon the cross. It was not caused by an eclipse; for it took place about the time of full moon, when an eclipse of the sun is impossible. It took place about the middle of the first month, whose commencement had been marked by the first appearance of the new moon. Well might this phenomenon accompanied by the earthquake, etc., be regarded by those who witnessed it as an extraordinary occurrence. The same is true of the darkness of May 19, 1780. If God's special hand was in the darkness at the time of the plagues in Egypt and in that which occurred when Christ was crucified on Calvary, it was also in the darkness of May 19, 1780. If the first two of these obscurations were extraordinary, the third also was extraordinary.

And suppose it could even be shown that the showers of fire which the ancients witnessed were showers of stars or meteors, what bearing would such a discovery have on the shower of stars of 1833? Would it justify us in concluding that that occurrence was an ordinary affair? Could not both have been extraordinary? The first were more than ordinary events, for they terrified the ancients; the latter was of a similar character, for it produced the same effect. Is there a scriptural reason why God cannot give the moderns a wonder as a token of the near coming of Christ, while he gave the ancients one for a different object—perhaps to check them in their sinful course?

The learned and the unlearned who witnessed the phenomena under consideration regarded them as extraordinary. And they produced the very effect that tokens of the coming of Christ would naturally produce. They led men to think of the coming of Christ, of the judgment, and of the end of the world. When the sun was darkened, pious preachers gathered those over whom they presided, comforted them, and pointed them to God for protection and safety. (See "Tract No. 379," American Tract Society; "Life of Edward Lee.") In some cases, God-fearing ministers read and spoke from Matt. 24:39, claiming that that scripture was meeting its fulfillment in the wonderful event that was transpiring. The general topic among the masses was the end of the world, the judgment, and some feared that the judgment day had come.

And the darkness of the night following was most awful. As many who witnessed it have said, "It was darkness that could be felt." Mr. Tenney, quoted by Mr. Gage to the Historical Society, says of it, "The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty fiat gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete."

One of the most interesting and profitable interviews I have ever enjoyed, was one I had in the township of Patton, Province of Quebec, a few years ago, with an aged man who had witnessed the darkness of May 19, 1780. He gave me a description of it that agreed exactly with facts herein stated. A few of these old pilgrims are still alive.

Sears's "Guide to Knowledge" says: "Similar days have occasionally been known, though inferior in the degree or extent of their darkness. The causes of these phenomena are unknown.

They certainly were not the result of eclipses." Of this event Webster's Dictionary, under the heading of "Dark Day, The, May 19, 1780," says, "The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known."

On page 23 of Asa Smith's "Illustrated Astronomy," published in New York, I find the following interesting testimony respecting the fall of stars of Nov. 13, 1833:—

Ques.—When was the greatest meteoric display ever known?

Ans.—On the night of the 12th and 13th of November, 1833.

Q.—What was the altitude of the meteors on this occasion?

A.—Professor Olmstead says they were not less than 2,238 miles above the earth.

On the same page I find the following note:—

NOTE 2.—We now come to by far the most splendid display on record; and as it was the third in successive years, and on the same day of the month, it seemed to invest the meteoric showers with a periodical character; and hence originated the title of November meteors. An incessant play of dazzlingly brilliant meteors was kept up in the heavens for several hours. Some of these were of considerable magnitude, and peculiar in form. One of large size remained for some time almost stationary in the zenith, over the Falls of Niagara, emitting streams of light. The wild dash of the waters, as contrasted with the fiery uproar above them, formed a scene of unequaled sublimity.

In many districts the mass of the population were horror-struck, and the more enlightened were awed at contemplating so vivid a picture of the Apocalyptic image—that of the stars falling to the earth, even as a fig-tree casting her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. [See Rev. 6:13.]

A planter of South Carolina thus describes the effect of the scene upon the ignorant blacks: "I was suddenly awakened by the most distressing cries that ever fell on my ears. Shrieks of horror and cries for mercy I could hear from most of the negroes of three plantations, amounting in all to about six or eight hundred. While earnestly listening for the cause, I heard a faint voice near the door, calling my name. I arose, and, taking my sword, stood at the door. At this moment, I heard the same voice still beseeching me to rise, and saying, 'O my God, the world is on fire.' I then opened the door, and it is difficult to say which excited me the more, the awfulness of the scene, or the distressed cries of the negroes. Upwards of one hundred lay prostrate on the ground, some speechless, and some with the bitterest cries, but with their hands raised, imploring God to save the world and them. The scene was truly awful; for never did rain fall much thicker than the meteors fell toward the earth; east, west, north, and south, it was the same."

I have heard intelligent Canadians describe the scene as they had witnessed it near Montreal. They were crossing the St. Lawrence at the time, and bade adieu to their absent loved ones, because they thought the end of the world had come. The first French astronomy I opened at the time of my first visit in Europe, thirteen years ago, contained the statement that the shower of stars in question was the most wonderful one we have on record. Before me is another French astronomy. It is one of the numerous volumes on astronomy written by Camille Flammarion, and approved by the French Academy. I open it, and find the same truth in bold relief. The author speaks of the fall of 1866 only indirectly. He singles out one that occurred Nov. 27, 1872, but dwells largely on the one of Nov. 13, 1833, giving it the pre-eminence, thus:—

That of the night of November 12 and 13, 1833, was still more marvelous. The stars were so numerous, and manifested themselves at once in so many regions of the heavens, that those who tried to count them could barely hope to arrive at approximate results. The observer at Boston (Olmstead), making an estimate at the moment of the maximum, said that numerically they amounted to one-half of the number of flakes of snow in an ordinary snow-storm. When the phenomenon had considerably decreased, he counted 650 stars in fifteen minutes, although he limited his observation to a zone which did not embrace the tenth part of the visible horizon; and he estimated the grand total for the whole visible hemisphere [for that quarter of an hour] at 8,660. This would give 34,640 stars in one hour. The phenomenon lasted more than seven hours; therefore those that were seen at Boston exceeded 240,000!—Astronomie Populaire, p. 659.

On page 655 of the same volume, the author says: "Since 1833 the accounts given by ancient chroniclers have been studied." This shows that the fall that took place that year was of a character to arouse men of learning to inquire into the meaning of these phenomena.

A LIVING WITNESS OF THE DARK DAY.

[ONE of our canvassers for "Bible Readings," presenting in a Sunday-school of colored people in Pennsylvania the reading on the Dark Day, called out a testimony from a lady present that her grandmother, still living, was ten years of age when that occurrence took place, and remembered it well. The canvasser afterward saw the mother of this lady, the daughter of the one referred to in the following sketch, which was published in a Rhode Island paper three years ago, and both the daughter and granddaughter testify to the truthfulness of the statements herein made. Mrs. Dorsey being 117 years of age when this sketch was published, three years ago, she is now 120 years old. It is certainly a very remarkable and interesting case.—ED.]

AN AGED SOJOURNER—CATHERINE DORSEY CLAIMS TO BE 117 YEARS OF AGE—SHE WELL REMEMBERS THE DARK DAY OF MAY 19, 1780.

There are no people who lay greater claims to old age than the members of the colored race. Their years seem to multiply at a high rate after they have reached the allotted years of three score and ten, and very singularly their friends have become so accustomed to hearing the stories of advanced years that they, too, gradually become as certain of the facts narrated in substantiation of the assertions of the old men and women. Thus it is that wonderful accounts are given of this and that person who has turned the mile-stone on the first 100 years, and who is steadily covering the laps on the second turn. Very few of these cases, if investigated, can stand the test of inquiry. Too often the alleged centenarians are less than eighty years of age, and rarely do they run up into the nineties. Still there are authenticated instances, notably the inmate of the Home for Aged Women, who died a year or two ago, aged 102 years, and the inmate of the Johnston Poor Farm, whose record substantiates the claim that she has lived to see the dawn of another century in her own life.

There resides at No. 131 Lilac St., in this city, and at the home of Mrs. Celia Boone, the latter's mother, a wee bit of a woman, whose skin betrays the African blood within her veins, but whose features also assert a mixture of the Indian life-current. There is much interest centering around this little woman; for while she looks sprightly to a certain degree, and converses quite fluently, she claims to be 117 years of age. If wrinkled skin, whitened hair, and bent form can speak in support of her claim, then she has good advocates.

The little woman is Catherine Dorsey, and she says she was born in Anne Arundel County, Maryland, about twenty miles from Baltimore. Her mother and grandmother she knew were full-blooded Indians, while her father was a typical African. He never knew his right name, as he was stolen from a beach in Africa, and brought to this country when he was but three years of age. Her mother was born on the plantation of Margaret Hopkins, and she remained there until she was the mother of ten children. Two of these died when mere infants; the others were Joseph, Samuel, Anthony, John, Rachel, Darkey, Nancy, and Catherine. The old lady says she was born free, and had a certificate to that effect until quite recently, when she lost it. Her daughter, Mrs. Boone, had one dated June 23, 1854, which certified to her own birth as a free person. Her father, she says, was married before he became the husband of her mother, and by his first wife had seventeen children, making twenty-seven, in all, born to him. He lived, she says, to be 104 years of age.

These facts, she asserts, can be substantiated by reference to the books of record in Anne Arundel County. Her own children numbered thirteen, four of whom are now living. She first came north about twenty-eight years ago, and since then has made nine journeys to her former home. She fixes her age at 117 years, and in support of this says that she was ten years old on the "dark day," which, according to history, occurred on May 19, 1780. She remembers distinctly that the birds and barnyard fowls went to roost when darkness settled upon the land, and that the colored people were very much alarmed at the phenomenon. They sank upon their knees, and began to cry and pray, while she, not feeling frightened, tried to thread a needle to sew some doll's clothing. She could not do so on account of the darkness, and asked her mother to help her accomplish that act. Her mother reached forward, seized her, and made her kneel with the rest, telling her that the Lord had set his seal upon the land; that there would no longer be any sunshine, but that the earth would thereafter be shrouded in darkness. Her mother was the only religious-preaching woman in that place, and she remembers that the white people came over to the quarters, and joined in the worship which the terrors of the hour induced. Her father's name, as given to him by those who purchased him, was Isaac Deland, and after her brothers grew up, they changed their names because they were nicknamed Lamb. One of them selected the name of Dorsey, and very singularly she afterward married a man named Dorsey.

She remembers some of the incidents of the war of the Revolution, but does not recall ever having seen General Washington, although she heard him spoken of very often. She recalls visiting the camps, particularly of the Regulars, as she styled them, and of the militia, the latter being scattered through the woods. She rode on a cart to camp, and sold corn ponies to the soldiers. She can remember three wars, but cannot recall dates. The colored people in her days were very ignorant and hard-working, and to enjoy their religion were often compelled to go into the woods, where, undisturbed by wicked field-drivers or cruel overseers, they lifted their voices in humble prayers and simple supplications to Him who promised to free all in his own good time. Their work was hard then, not only lasting through the day, but sometimes running into the night. Corn bread was the principal food taken to the field. She had never been punished, and no white person's hand had ever been laid upon her in violence or anger. She had done everything in the field that a strong man could do, such as yoking up the steers, ploughing, sowing, hoeing, reaping, driving to the woods, loading up the fire-wood, and returning home and unloading it. She now has her faculties, can thread her own needle, does sewing for pay, and stands up to the tub and washes her own clothes. She rarely sleeps after four o'clock in the morning, and if the weather is good, walks about the streets near her daughter's residence before breakfast. Later in the day she makes trips about the neighborhood, and is frequently made the recipient of money and delicacies from ladies and gentlemen who are acquainted with her history. Such is the little old woman's story. It is an interesting narrative, and it may be that some one in the South will peruse it, and compare it with the records of Anne Arundel County, Maryland.

MORMONISM IN THE TERRITORIES.

The Idaho Test-oath Decision.

THERE will be jubilation in the Territories when the news that the Mormon test-oath has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, reaches the scattered settlers of Idaho, Utah, and Arizona. In Idaho, particularly, by the action of whose legislature the issue was raised, will the decision be received with popular rejoicing. Idaho has been the foremost of the Territories in endeavoring to oppose Mormonism by local enactments. The followers of Brigham Young have become strongly intrenched in Idaho's southern tier of counties, and though, according to Delegate Dubois, they constitute only ten or twelve per cent of the total population, they have been enabled, at times, to wield the balance of power in Territorial politics by means of a close alliance with the Democratic party. The governor of the Territory denounced this alliance in unsparing terms in his message in 1884, and declared the opinion that the "barbarous and blasphemous practices and tenets" of the Mormon sect "must be eradicated, or the destiny of this great and rich public domain will be periled beyond bloodless redemption." Aroused by the governor's vigorous appeal, the Territorial legislature of 1885, which had a large Republican and anti-Mormon majority, enacted a law requiring all county and precinct officials of the Territory to subscribe to the following stringent oath:—

That I am not a member of any order, sect, or organization which teaches, advises, or encourages the practice of bigamy or polygamy, or any other crimes defined by law as a duty or privilege resulting or arising from the faith or practice of such order, sect, or organization; or that teaches, counsels, encourages, or advises any person or persons to commit the crime of bigamy or polygamy, or any other crime defined by law, as a religious duty. That I am not a bigamist or polygamist. That I do not either publicly or privately teach, counsel, encourage, or advise any person or persons to enter into bigamous or polygamous relations, or into the relation known as "plural or celestial marriage." That I regard the Constitution of the United States and the laws thereof, and of this Territory, as interpreted by the courts, as the supreme law of the land; and that I will support and uphold the same, the teachings of any order, sect, or organization to the contrary notwithstanding, so help me God.

This is the oath the Constitutionality of which has just been sustained by the supreme tribunal of the Republic. It debars any Mormon from holding office in the Territory. As such, it is an overwhelming blow to the political ambitions of the Mormon priesthood, for in Utah the oath is already operative, and it will immediately be adopted in Arizona, where Mormonism has been actively endeavoring to improve its foot-hold. —Boston Journal.

STRENGTH OF EUROPEAN ARMIES.

THE Almanach de Gotha for 1890, which has been lately published, contains, as usual, statistical details concerning the military forces of the various European states. This portion of the work has been thoroughly revised, so as to secure the most accurate information accessible. It appears that it is practically impossible to ascertain the fighting strength of the German army when placed on a war footing, on account of the complicated arrangements by which portions of the territorial forces are worked into the strength of the regular corps. The peace establishments of Germany, France, and Russia are given by the Almanach as follows:—

Germany, 884 battalions, 465 squadrons, 364 batteries, 1,500 mounted guns, 19,457 officers, 468,409 rank and file. France, 26,763 officers, 534,100 rank and file, 480 field batteries, with 2,060 mounted guns. Russia, 848 battalions, or 386,312 infantry; 328 squadrons of cavalry, with 57,416 men; 344 batteries of field artillery, with 1,542 mounted guns and 61,880 men, 33½ battalions of engineers, having 18,977 men, besides 31,130 men of the "train" service, making a total of 562,500 men. To these should be added 288 squadrons of Cossacks, numbering 51,944 men; 112,850 local troops and 72,634 reserve men, which will bring up the strength of the Russian peace establishment to 799,928 men.

The Russian forces when on war footing are estimated as follows: 994,460 men of regular troops, with 4,030 pieces of artillery; 280,810 reserve men, with 640 guns; 137,730 Cossacks, with 240 guns of their own, and 189,500 supplementary reserve men, with 384 pieces of artillery. This estimate is exclusive of local troops.

The war footing strength of France is estimated by the Almanach at "about" the following: Active army, about 2,000,000, divided into ten classes, according to age; 1,022,000 of the territorial army, divided into five classes, according to age, and reserve troops, divided into six classes, numbering 762,000, the total amounting to 3,784,000 men.—World's Progress, January, 1890.

you. We are but your servants, and you demand of us that we shall be faithful to care for the interests and responsibilities you have placed in our hands! Now, what we need is this:—

1. That our brethren and sisters everywhere show faithfulness in contributing to foreign missions by giving an amount according as God has prospered them, on every first day, their first-day offering.

2. We ask those who have means, and who feel called on by the Spirit of God to do so, to send their contribution at once to W. H. Edwards, Review and Herald, Battle Creek, Mich. We shall look for liberal contributions.

3. Then there are others who could, without any inconvenience to themselves, loan to the General Conference larger or smaller amounts of money, without interest or a very small rate of interest, for a longer or shorter time, according to circumstances.

We know that our brethren and sisters are interested in the work, and do not wish the work crippled in any manner. Therefore we feel it our duty to place these facts before you, and give you an opportunity to help us in this time of need. The money we place in the books will not be consumed, but will be returned again to the publishing house, and be used to bring out more books. Our foreign publishing houses have not capital enough to meet the demand for the large orders that are being made at this time. Especially is this the case with our London house. Now we ask you, brethren, to place funds in the General Conference so that the General Conference can do its duty in carrying on the work that you have undertaken.

We ask for a speedy response to this appeal, for the case is an urgent one. All money should be sent to W. H. Edwards, whether it is a donation or a loan. Just now a number of laborers are either already on their way, or are making ready for a speedy departure for different foreign fields. Sister White, Elder W. C. White, and Elder G. B. Starr and wife are on their way to Australasia. They expect to sail Oct. 15. Elder L. C. Chadwick will soon start on his tour, to visit Mexico, Central and South America, the West Indies, and return by the west coast of Africa. This will be a very extended and important trip. Elder A. T. Robinson is closing up his work in New England, preparatory to leaving for South Africa. All this will require funds; for the outlay, as all can see, must be considerable.

Some may think that we are undertaking more than we ought to do. But, brethren, who can for a moment think of doing less? The great regret, as it appears to us, is that we are doing so little. We ought to be doing twenty times more than we are now doing.

But we will not argue the matter with you. We know that our people would not for a moment think of retrenching. We are intrusted with a great and important work,—a message to every kindred, tongue, and people, and there certainly is no time to retrench or delay. The harvest is fast being ripened for the day of God, and the wheat must be garnered for the kingdom of God. The chaff will soon be given to the flames. May we all sense the responsibility of the present now, and quit ourselves like men. In a short time the labor will be over, the world warned, the work accomplished, and God's remnant people made ready to meet their Lord. May it be ours in that day to hear the "Well done, good and faithful servant!"

O. A. OLSEN.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

TRADITIONS OF THE DELUGE.

E. Babelon, in Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, Paris, March and April, 1891, opens an article on "The Phrygian Tradition of the Deluge," with these words:—

"The scholars who have devoted themselves to Biblical exegesis have all been struck with this fact, that among a great many of the peoples scattered over the globe, there exists a tradition relative to a deluge or inundation, which, in primitive times, swallowed nearly a whole race of men, or even the entire human race."

FIGHT OR DISARM.

The "armed peace" of Europe is almost as exhaustive as continual war. There must therefore be a change soon of some kind. The question ever recurring to the minds of the people is. How will it end? In what direction will the change take place? It is either fight or disarm. Which will it be? The New York Recorder of July 20, 1891, speaking on this point, says:—

"Germany cannot go on forever arming, arming, arming."

"When Kaiser Wilhelm was saying this to Lord Salisbury, his Berlin organ was urging the crowding of German troops to the Russian frontier in order to counteract 'the threatening concentration of the troops of the Czar.'"

"Republican France, like imperial Germany, constitutional England, autocratic Russia, double-governed Austro-Hungary, and poverty-stricken, but ardent, Italy, keeps on arming, arming, arming, as requisite to preserving general peace, scarcely less ruinously costly than universal war."

"How will it all end? When will the strained bow break? Will Europe fight or disarm? If Germany's young sovereign really has the moral force to set the example which Salisbury is reported to have declared to rest with him, then, indeed, will the Kaiser prove himself worthy of the mission of 'The people's Emperor.'"

CHURCH AND STATE ALL WRONG.

The Minneapolis Journal, of July 17, 1891, speaking of the trouble in the Indian Bureau, about the Indian contract schools, says:—

"It is needless to say that this whole Church and State arrangement, by which our Government is paying the religious sects several hundred thousand dollars a year to teach sectarian religion in the government schools, is wrong and unlawful."

A LIVING WITNESS OF THE DARK DAY.

The Kennebec Daily Journal (Augusta, Me.), of Aug. 4, 1891, publishes an interview between a reporter and Mrs. Nancy Britt Kennedy, now living in Hallowell, Me., and being 118 years of age. During the course of the conversation, the subject of dark weather came up, when Mrs. Kennedy is reported to have said:—

"You should have seen the Dark Day. I remember it well. The hens went to roost. All the cattle came home. It was just like night. We had to light the candles. Oh, it was awful. I was six or seven. I was awful frightened. There hasn't been anything like it since. No, I don't remember what year it was. 'T was while father was away."

"Upon his arrival home, the reporter looked up the Dark Day in the encyclopædia, and found that it was on May 19, 1780."

Religious Liberty.

SUNDAY LAW AT DU QUOIN.

A BROTHER has just sent us the following clipping from a recent issue of a paper in Du Quoin, Ill., in regard to the "Law and Order League" of that place:—

"Brief mention was made in last night's News about the organization here by a large number of our best citizens for the purpose of suppressing all desecrations of the Sabbath within the corporate limits of this city. Investigation has developed the fact that the organization is being perfected, and is ready for action now. Able counsel has been retained, and the society proposes to prosecute, with vigor, all violations of our ordinances, regarding the Sabbath day in Du Quoin. And where the laws are violated near, or close to, the city limits, the violators will be prosecuted under the laws of this State. Base-ball, picnics, ratifications, etc., cannot be held with impunity in Du Quoin upon Sunday, without having to answer before our courts for it on Monday morning. Each and every case will be prosecuted without fear or favor. The matter is not only generally being talked about, but very warmly and seriously considered openly above board."

The fact that "Law and Order Leagues" are being formed in so many parts of our land, is a subject worthy of our consideration. Their ostensible purpose is to secure the enforcement of neglected laws. The work that they usually do, is to endeavor to enforce the observance of Sunday, and go through the farce of trying to suppress the liquor traffic by undertaking to close the saloons on that day, and what is now being attempted in Du Quoin, is only a sample of what is being done in many parts of the country, and what we may soon expect to see all over the world. The evidences of the fulfillment of Revelation 13 are so clear, that no one who is observing can fail to see it.

"That no person shall on Sunday keep open his or her place of business, or shall pursue his or her daily labor or occupation within the city; provided this section shall not be applicable to persons who conscientiously observe some other day of the week as Sabbath; nor in cases of necessity or charity, nor to hotels, eating-houses, drug-stores, butcher shops, tobacco stores, livery stables, or street-cars. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be subject to a fine of not less than five dollars and not more than one hundred dollars."

It will be seen that among the things allowed on Sunday is the sale of tobacco; thus placing tobacco selling above honest labor, for a man in Du Quoin may sell tobacco every day in the week; but if his conscience did not smite him for working on Sunday, he would have to suffer the penalty, if he chose to work, provided he would not keep another day. And that exemption to those who keep another day is only a little bait thrown out to keep us from opposing the movement until they can make it general, and then we know from the sure word of God what will be the consequences.

IOWA THREATENING.

A BROTHER from Manson, Ia., writes us that he has been threatened with prosecution for Sunday labor. Although such a prosecution could not justly be made under the laws of Iowa, he says since Bro. Longnecker's experience in Illinois, he doesn't know what will be attempted.

A. O. T.

—A State "Sabbath" convention is announced for Indianapolis, Ind., Sept. 29, 30. J. P. Mills, R. J. Wylie, and other prominent Sunday-law advocates are on the program. "National Responsibility touching the Sabbath," "Responsibility of the Church for Sabbath Desecration," "The Civil Sabbath," "Aims and Status of the Movement," are among the subjects to be discussed. The National Religious Liberty Association will have a representative there, and full reports will be given.

—We give below a letter just received at the office of the National Religious Liberty Association. It gives something of an idea of the expressions of interest that we are receiving in regard to the King case. The letter reads:—

"I saw an account of the decision of the United States District Court of Tennessee in the King case, and although I am not eligible to become a member of your honorable body, still I feel as though I would like to do something to help. Inclosed, find five dollars, which please apply on this case, and oblige."

"P. S.—If I knew that you had anything published on this case that would be handy to distribute, I would send for it, as I have not seen much of it myself, and I would like to show it to my friends."

In replying to his letter we were pleased to be able to send him some tracts bearing on this case, and also to call his attention to the proposed articles in the Sentinel, reviewing the decision of Judge Hammond.

Word has been received that sister E. G. White and company had secured very comfortable quarters for their voyage to Australia, and that they expected to sail the 12th inst.

The Biblical institute convened in the east vestry of the Tabernacle, Friday, Nov. 13, Elder A. T. Jones and Prof. W. W. Prescott being the instructors. Sixty-two students were enrolled at the first meeting, and more are expected.

A private note received from brother L. C. Chadwick, the past week, dated at the city of Mexico, Nov. 1, states that he is gaining much important information relative to that field, a field which he says ought to be occupied at no distant day. He promises interesting reports for the paper soon.

Sabbath, the 14th, Elder O. A. Olsen spoke in the Tabernacle in the forenoon, on the subject of consecration to the great work for the present time. In the afternoon a largely attended and excellent social meeting was enjoyed. Many of those who are in attendance at the ministerial institute were present, and were warmly welcomed by the church.

HANDS TIED.

HAVE the French had their hands tied? So a writer in a paper published in Florence, as quoted in the Literary Digest, asserts. Why is not such a writer denounced as fanatical and absurd? for that is the way many people treat interpreters of prophecy whenever they make a similar assertion. When we say that the binding of Satan, spoken of in Rev. 20:1, 2, means simply that a combination of circumstances; namely, the death of all the wicked inhabitants of the earth, and the translation to heaven of all the righteous, renders him powerless to carry on his nefarious work of deception and ruin among men, many affect to treat such a position with no small contempt. But any other people on any other subject, are allowed to use corresponding expressions, with a like meaning, without question. Thus the writer referred to above, says:—

"Against England, France can do nothing, and has to confine herself to protesting in diplomatic notes against the indefinite occupation of Egypt; but against Italy, France has done much, and would have done still more, if the Triple Alliance, so much blasphemed by the French and their friends, the Italian Radicals, had not tied her hands."

No one objects to such a figure in reference to secular and national movements, or considers it in any way strange or inconsistent. Why should any one, therefore, object to a like figure in the interpretation of the Scriptures?

COOL.

The London Echo of Oct. 31, 1891, prints the following paragraph:—

"Medhurst, the missionary, notices a tract written against him by a Chinese, who says: 'It is monstrous in barbarians attempting to improve us, when they are so miserably deficient themselves. Thus, introducing among the Chinese a poisonous drug, for their own benefit to the injury of others, they are deficient in benevolence; sending their fleets and armies to rob other nations of their possessions, they can make no pretensions to rectitude,' etc. The Englishman Mason, who has been convicted at Shanghai for supplying weapons to the secret societies, helps to confirm these opinions. Do what we will, we cannot knock it into the heads of the Chinese that we are not in their land for our own benefit, but theirs. They see the cargoes of Bibles, but they think there is stowed away in the hold an assortment of idols made in Birmingham as ballast."

Yes, but what about the opium forced on them at the point of English bayonets to their immeasurable damage, for the sake of English gain? The writer is carefully reticent on that point. Under the dark shadow of the opium curse, Bibles themselves must seem to the Chinese but an imposition. They are not slow to discern character and pass judgment accordingly. The cool audacity of the writer quoted above gives us about such language as the wolf might use concerning the lamb struggling to escape from his clutches: "Do what I will, I cannot knock it into the head of this stupid lamb, that it is for his benefit, not mine, that I have taken him in charge."

SUNDAY AND THE FAIR.

SPEAKING of the protest of the late Methodist Ecumenical Conference against Sunday opening of the World's Fair, the Philadelphia Record says:—

"It is entitled to weight and consideration more on account of the numerous and respectable body from which it has emanated, than because of the reasons it contains."

The Record, however, does not indorse the protest on such grounds; but utters some very stable truths against it in the following extract:—

"What would be gained for the cause of Christian morality by closing the Chicago Exposition on Sunday? The theaters, opera houses, restaurants, beer gardens, and other places of amusement are open on Sunday in Chicago, the same as on other days of the week. Should the Exposition be closed on Sunday, the throngs of visitors who might otherwise rationally enjoy themselves at the Fair grounds would be driven to lower forms of amusement, or would be penned up in their hotels and boarding-houses. The Fair on Sunday would afford to multitudes of strangers a wholesome and innocently enjoyable escape from the dissipations and excesses for which a city like Chicago presents so many opportunities and temptations. As a result of closing the Fair on Sunday, there would be more Sabbath-breaking and more breaking of the ten commandments than if it should be kept open on that day. The masses of the people can always be trusted to make rational use of their freedom. The mischief comes when freedom and reasonable opportunities of enjoyment are denied them." N. W. L.

BOOK NOTICE.

WE have received from the publisher, Chas. H. Woodman, 144 Hanover St., Boston, Mass., a copy of a work entitled "The Great Consummation, and the Signs that Herald its Approach," by Elder D. T. Taylor, author of "The Reign of Christ on Earth," "The Coming Glory," "The Coming Earthquake," etc., etc. The present is perhaps as impressive and interesting a volume as ever has come from the pen of this well-known author. It is devoted to an exposition of our Lord's great prophecy in Matthew 24 and parallel scriptures; and the subject is treated under such headings as, "The Return of Our Lord," "God's Wrath on the Jews," "The Abomination of Desolation," "The Great Tribulation," "The Tribulation Shortened," "The Uncounted Multitude," "Signs of Christ's Advent," "Wonders in Heaven," "Earthquakes," "Famines," "Pestilences," "Darkening of the Sun and Moon," "Falling of the Stars," "Signs in the Seas," "The Last great Convulsion," "The Burning Day," "Signs in the Sun," "Fears of Science," "The Beginning," "The Consummation."

The author is noted as a person of careful and exhaustive research, and this volume shows the fruit of many years of labor.

There are, of course, some applications of Scripture which do not accord with what seems to us to be the true interpretation, especially the application of the words, "this generation" (Matt. 24: 24), to the generation of the Jews then living, and whom Christ personally addressed, and then understanding the words following, "Till all these things be fulfilled," as meaning until all "these things begin to come to pass." (See remarks on this point in another column.)

But in the seven chapters on "The Abomination of Desolation" and "The Great Tribulation," we have a telling description of the long and bloody work of the Romish apostasy, that mother of harlots and abomination of the earth. The arraignment is a terrible one, and the figures appalling; but it is just and true. The testimony respecting the signs in the sun, moon, and stars, atmospheric disturbances, tidal waves, electric storms, earthquakes, famines, pestilences, etc., is very full, and the statistical information relative to these signs in the physical universe, showing their alarming increase in these latter years, is more extensive than has heretofore appeared.

The book contains 454 pages, neatly bound in muslin; price $1.25, to be had of the publisher as above.

DEATH OF BROTHER R. M. KING.

WE have just received the following letter from brother L. A. Callicott, dated Lane, Tenn., Nov. 12, 1891, giving the sad intelligence of the death of brother R. M. King, whose case has been so prominently before the country for the past two years:—

"It is with a sad heart I write to you of the death of our beloved brother, R. M. King, which occurred on the evening of the 10th inst., very suddenly and unexpectedly. He left home Monday last to go to canvassing for 'Bible Readings,' and the next day he went to stay over night with a friend who lives near his territory. After supper he complained some of palpitation of the heart, and also of a bad cold, but when asked if he wanted anything done for his heart trouble, he said no; he thought he would soon be all right. Then it was suggested that he take some quinine for his cold, and he did take a small dose. When bed-time arrived, he asked if they should have family prayer. His friend said he might if he wished. Then he read a chapter in the Bible, and prayed. After prayer he talked quite awhile about the way in which people should live, and about religion. He said he had forgotten his heart trouble, and thought he would be all right in the morning. His friend then took a light and showed him his room, left him for the night, and went to his own room and went to bed and to sleep; but he does not think he was in bed ten minutes when his wife awoke him, asking what was making that noise. He then went to brother King's room and called him, but received no answer. He then took a light, and going in, found him dead in bed. He was lying on his back, with his hands folded across his breast. His face was black, but there was no indication of his having made a struggle."

"Thus passed away one who had the courage to stand up for the truth in the thickest of the fight. May we all be as faithful as he."

152.—WOMEN SPEAKING IN MEETING. 1 COR. 14 : 34, 35.

Please give an exposition of 1 Cor. 14 : 34, 35, in the Question Chair, or refer me to one already given, and oblige. N. O.

Ans.—The question which arises at the present day, over this scripture, is, whether or not women have the privilege of taking part in the public exercises of the house of worship. Should they have this privilege, or should it be denied them? The first point to be settled in reference to this passage, is, Was this the question in Paul's day? Was this the point under discussion? If it was, then that is the question now; if it was not, then it is not the question now, so far as this scripture is concerned; and people are using it in a wrong way when they argue from it that it teaches the withholding from women of the privilege named?

But that it does not pertain to the ordinary exercises of public worship is evident from some statements the apostle has elsewhere made, in the same epistle. Turning back to chapter 11 : 4, we read: "Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoreth his head." Public prayer, and public teaching or preaching, here called "prophesying," constitute the ordinary exercises of public worship, or at least, do so to-day; and in this verse we have directions from the apostle, showing how men should engage in these exercises. But Paul goes right on and gives the same directions concerning women; thus (verse 5): "But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoreth her head," etc. What is the necessary conclusion from this?—It is, that, so far as the ordinary public services of the church were concerned, women were permitted to share in them equally with the men; and if this is so, it follows that the apostle does not refer to such exercises in chapter 14 : 34, 35; for he would not give directions in one place how women should engage in certain exercises, and then in only the fourth chapter following, forbid their taking part in such exercises at all. Hence, though we may not be able to tell just what the apostle does mean in the scripture under notice, inasmuch as it is evident that he does not refer to those circumstances on which the question in regard to women's speaking turns to-day, this scripture is at once removed from this controversy.

There are, however, some expressions used by the apostle here and elsewhere which seem to indicate the nature of the evil against which he is here speaking. He had previously written (see Gal. 3 : 28) that under the gospel all sexual and national distinctions were done away, with reference to Christian promises, hopes, and privileges; that there was neither male nor female, neither Jew nor Greek, but that all were one in Christ. Considering the condition in which women were held at that time in the heathen world around them, and to a great extent, also, under the Jewish economy, this no doubt seemed to the women a wonderful liberty granted them; and some were, in all probability, inclined to carry it to the extreme of license, and so take a course which was unbecoming and unseemly; and irregularities and abuses were thus liable to grow up in the church. The latter part of 1 Cor. 14 : 34, says that they (the women) are to be under obedience. This is in accordance with other injunctions, such as Eph. 5 : 22; Col. 3 : 18; Titus 2 : 5; 1 Pet. 3 : 1-6. The irregularities against which Paul warned the church, were, consequently, some actions which violated this principle of the true relationship of the woman to the man. This is further intimated in 1 Tim. 2 : 11, 12, where we read: "Let the women learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence."

Thus it appears clear that the trouble to which the apostle had reference, was some course on the part of the women by which they were putting themselves in the lead, dictating, or usurping authority over the men. But it is usurping no authority over man for a woman to pray in the public congregation, or to do what Paul, in 1 Cor. 14 : 3, says he means by "prophesying;" namely, speaking to edification, exhortation, and comfort.

THE NECESSITY OF AGITATION.

UNDER every republican form of government, institutions, customs, and laws rest upon and are upheld by public opinion. If that opinion be right, the institutions, customs, and laws are right and just; if it be wrong, they are unjust. It is of little consequence that laws are just, if there is no public sentiment to uphold them. Nor is it of very great consequence that they are unjust, if lacking this same support. Public opinion is supreme. The proper channel of its expression is, of course, the law of the land; popular sentiment alone is not sufficient. But the law rests upon the sentiment, and not the sentiment upon the law. It is obvious, therefore, that when abuses are to be corrected, public dangers averted, or reforms inaugurated, the work must begin by touching public opinion. It cannot be done by simply touching and altering the law. If popular sentiment is not what it should be, it must be molded into the proper form. This means education; and education is but another name for agitation.

We could, doubtless, better understand and appreciate this were we living in those stirring times which preceded our Civil War, when agitation was the order of the day,—when we might perhaps have listened to some of those great spirits who well understood its value as an educator of the public mind. They have, fortunately, left their testimony behind them. Of these, there was none greater than that peerless American orator, Wendell Phillips. In the long and fierce agitation upon the question of slavery, he was first and foremost. He made agitation his business. He believed firmly in the supreme potency of ideas, working upon the minds of an intelligent, thinking people. Better than most of the men of his day or of ours, he seems to have realized that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." His testimony upon this point is worth repeating. Would that it might ring forever in the ears of the sleepy sentinels to whose guardianship is intrusted the liberties which are ours to-day. Would that they were household words throughout the length and breadth of the land. The words are taken from one of his public speeches. He said:—

"Each man here, in fact, holds his property and his life dependent on the constant presence of an agitation like this of anti-slavery. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty; power is ever stealing from the many to the few. The manna of popular liberty must be gathered each day, or it is rotten. The living sap of to-day outgrows the dead rind of yesterday. The hand intrusted with power becomes, either from human depravity or esprit de corps, the necessary enemy of the people. Only by continual oversight can the democrat in office be prevented from hardening into a despot; only by unintermitted agitation can a people be kept sufficiently awake to principle not to let liberty be smothered in material prosperity. . . .

"Some men suppose that, in order to the people's governing themselves, it is only necessary, as Fisher Ames said, that the 'rights of man be printed, and that every citizen have a copy;' as the Epicureans two thousand years ago imagined God a being who arranged this marvelous machinery, set it going, and then sunk to sleep. Republics exist only on the tenure of being constantly agitated. The anti-slavery agitation is an important,—nay, an essential part of the machinery of the State. It is not a disease nor a medicine. No; it is a normal state—the normal state of the nation. Never, to our latest posterity, can we afford to do without prophets like Garrison to stir up the monotony of wealth and re-awaken the people to the great ideas that are constantly fading out of our minds,—to trouble the waters, that there may be health in their flow."

Ever since that agitation was drowned in the blood of civil war, the "great ideas" which pertain to individual liberty have been fading out of men's minds, and the mantle of Phillips seems to have fallen upon no successor. But his words are as true to-day as when they were first uttered. We cannot place dependence upon existing laws, or upon any future legal enactments, as bulwarks around our liberties, while agitation ceases to stir the popular mind upon the subject. Liberty stands secure only when it has reared about it a bulwark of enlightened public sentiment. L. A. S.

PRAISE.

THE glory of God is the supreme end of his creation. About his throne the song of praise is never ceasing. The four living creatures (Rev. 4 : 8) say continually, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come," and the four and twenty elders join with them, saying, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." We may well imagine that all the heavenly host are not silent listeners to their words.

Such is the relation between the Creator and his creatures, that the worship and praise of the latter contribute in the highest degree to the pleasure of both. This is as true in our own world as in the great unfallen universe around us. No one is compelled to praise God. No forced hallelujahs, drawn out by fear or omnipotent power, ascend about God's throne. All mankind are left perfectly free to choose whom they will serve, whether themselves or some other. God has withdrawn the sight of his visible power and majesty, leaving only persuading influences to lead men's minds to him, so that many even doubt his very existence. But those who open their hearts to the influence of his Spirit, realize no higher pleasure than in living to his praise. And this is the highest pleasure that any man can know. Man is so constituted that it cannot be otherwise. God is omnipotent, omniscient, independent. Man is wholly dependent,—infinitely removed from both omnipotence and omniscience. His happiness is to rise toward these infinite heights, and this is to rise toward God. The avenue to him is the avenue to all powers, all wisdom, all grace, all purity, all beauty and perfection; and it is God who has opened the avenue and enables us to mount through it. If we do this, through the provisions of his grace, we could not be happy should we withhold his praise. Not only our words but the very act itself, would bring praise and honor to him.

God has so ordered it, in his mysterious wisdom, that in the feeble words of our finite lips there is a wonderful power, and a wonderful privilege to us. "Whoso offereth praise," he has said, "glorifieth me." As his people meet together from Sabbath to Sabbath and from time to time to join for a brief space in the great anthem of praise which swells up from the heavenly host and from the vast universe, their words add to the Creator's glory. No seraph about the throne has a higher privilege than that of adding to the glory of God. L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

(Introduction.)

OUR Lord Jesus Christ is the grand central figure of the whole scheme of human salvation. "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." He ministers personally for men in the three-fold capacity of prophet, priest, and king. Through him the divine illumination comes to every true prophet who has communicated heavenly light to mankind. Moses foretold that "a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you . . . like unto me; him shall ye hear." Acts 7 : 37. When on earth, he fulfilled that prediction.

He serves as a priest-king in his Father's presence from his ascension till probation closes, after the priestly "order of Melchisedec" (Ps. 110:4; Heb. 7:1-17), and will reign as a king on David's throne over all the hosts of the redeemed, "from henceforth even forever." "And of his kingdom there shall be no end." Isa. 9:6, 7; Luke 1:31-33. While on earth, he filled the position of a prophet and teacher. Prophecy relates to past, present, and future, revealing in each of these periods of time that which concerns the well-being of man, which otherwise would not be known.

His prophetic power was constantly manifest during all his ministry here below. His enemies never caught him unawares, never laid a scheme he did not at once fathom. Satan's plots were open to him as the light of day. The condition and future of each individual, whether disciple or enemy, were to him like an open book. His mind took in past, present, and future alike. Eminent prophets were at times in doubt; till light came, they could see no further than other mortals. But all was naked and open to him at any moment. The minutest circumstances, and every contingency was provided for. The catching of a fish with a piece of silver in his mouth to pay the tribute money; the exact number of times the cock should crow and Peter should deny him; the way the upper room was prepared and the colt hitched upon which he should ride, are familiar instances. He never made a mistake. His enemies were astonished at his penetration and wisdom, knowing he had not been taught.

With the past he was perfectly familiar, having lived previous to, and ever since, the creation, and had been the leading actor, from the beginning, in all that concerned the human family. During all this period he looked forward and beheld two great eras in his own work, most conspicuous of all, and of greatest portent to the race of mankind—his first and second advents. Take these two events out of the plan of salvation, and all his work for man would be hidden from human view and dim of comprehension. Previous to the first of these, he was speaking through every true prophet, inspired words of grand import, of these manifestations of himself, and heavenly glory. These were their leading themes, constantly dwelt upon. It was by means of these predictions that the babe of Bethlehem, the youth of Nazareth, the prophet of Galilee, was identified as the long-looked-for Messiah, the Son of the ever-blessed God. He ever quoted these prophecies as strongest proof of his own mission. Multitudes of these prophetic references to Christ of the prophets of the old dispensation might be quoted, would time and space allow. Suffice it to say that they prove beyond question that Jesus of Nazareth was the true Messiah. The work of the Baptist, his messenger, who prepared the way for him, his ancestry in David's line, his virgin mother, the time of his birth, the place where he should be born, his flight to Egypt, the destruction of the innocents of Bethlehem, his life at Nazareth, his miracles, the length of his ministry, his death, the dividing of his garments, his unjust trial, his betrayal, his resurrection, his glorious ascension,—all these and many more noteworthy circumstances, were plainly referred to.

And now when he comes to the earth incarnated, he stands in Judea as the Great Prophet. Would it be reasonable to suppose when he should come to earth to enter upon his mission as the prophet whom the Lord should raise up, that he himself would fail to give any remarkable prediction concerning the future by which his people should be able to tell where they were in the stream of time? Would he have nothing to say concerning the time of his second advent, by which those longing for it could judge of its nearness? Other prophets had spoken of it, whom he had inspired and commissioned. Should their Master and instructor have little or nothing to say about it?

The event itself is the greatest and most important of any referred to in the canon of inspiration. The first advent makes provision for man's salvation, through the death of God's only Son. This marvelous exhibition of his love, agony, and death is the wonder of all ages. His humiliation, lowliness, patience, resignation, loving tenderness, and infinite love for man will be the theme of all worlds and of the redeemed to all eternity. His ministry and death opened the avenue of hope to a lost world of sinners. It enabled them to see beyond this world of sorrow a morn of glory, an unending day of joy and transcendent bliss. But the second advent brings that day itself. Realization is greater than hope. Life forever with that loving Saviour is more desirable than any prospect, however bright. A world where death is abolished, pain ceases, tears are never shed, sorrow never comes, but happiness and everlasting bliss forever reign, is greater and more precious than this world can possibly be with its weight of sorrow and woe. And the second advent means all of these, and vastly more, that we cannot now realize.

Did our Saviour in his role of the Great Prophet leave this great theme untouched?—Most certainly he did not. Just before his death, in that most solemn hour when about to enter his great agony, before giving himself into the hands of wicked men to be abused, insulted, and put to death, he laid before his disciples a historic prophecy, wonderfully full, concise, plain, and explicit, concerning the events of greatest moment to his disciples and people; reaching through the gospel dispensation to his second advent, yea, to the restitution of all things and the utter extermination of sin from our world. In this great prophecy he foretells the destruction of the Jewish polity and capital city, Jerusalem, the persecution of his disciples, and especially depicts the condition of the world in the last of this dispensation, and dwells with great clearness upon the signs that precede his second advent, and presents a vivid picture of that greatest of all events, so fraught with interest to the church and the world.

This discourse is partially given in Matthew 24, 25, Mark 13, and Luke 21. In the former it is given much more fully than in either of the others. This subject has been dwelt upon heretofore quite fully among us. Yet as time is prolonged, greater light shines upon the sacred page. New facts are from time to time brought to light. Our message is now reaching to the ends of the earth; and it is a matter of great interest that as the work advances, facts are brought to our notice which broaden our foundation, making it fit all portions of our world.

The coming of Christ is an event which should interest all mankind. The time will come when all will be interested in it whether willing or not. With the masses it will be too late for their eternal good. Christ will come in view of all mankind. All the kindreds of the earth will wail because of him. The signs of his coming will be of such a nature that all who choose to be intelligent concerning it, may have the proper evidences. It seems consistent that when additional light is brought out, believers should be quickened, and the world in general have the benefit of it. Renewed interest is being manifested on the subject of the second advent. Others not of our people are studying it and writing upon it. The writer hopes by a new grouping of the facts, to add some degree of interest to this most important subject. He would express special gratitude for the recent book, "The Great Consummation," by D. T. Taylor, who has made a lifelong study of the great mass of facts bearing upon this subject. It is a book of much interest, and presents startling facts of vast importance.

Yet none but those who have the special message for this time can treat this subject from our standpoint. Some of the conclusions of this valuable book we could not accept. Other points omitted in it are worthy of consideration. The whole subject will be set before the reader in a different order. Yet facts of deep interest will be quoted from it, to which due credit will be given.

No apology is needed for the presentation of the evidences bearing on this grandest of all subjects. They cannot be too often or too vividly presented. Fully believing from long study of the Scriptures that our Lord will very soon appear in his glory, we wish to present a comment on our Saviour's great prophecy, and array a portion at least of the many evidences of his near approach, that faith may be strengthened, and honest souls brought to realize the importance of this glorious subject.

"THE DAY APPROACHING." HEB. 10:25.

I HAVE received a copy of the Firm Foundation, published by the Disciples at Austin, Tex., dated Oct. 20. I find in it an article having the above title, which the sender of the paper wishes to have noticed. As the position taken by this writer is one that we have never encountered before, and others apparently take the same line of argument, we will notice some of these statements.

"I agree with brother Jackson that the 'day approaching,' here mentioned, refers to the first day of the week, coming with regularly recurring intervals."

He then makes a strong effort to prove that Paul was referring to the first day of the week instead of the judgment day. Thus he says:—

"The standard of obedience being that we do not forsake the assembling of ourselves together on any occasion when we could be present."

Again he says:—

"Beginning with the verse 19 and on to the end of this 10th chapter of Hebrews, all that is written has a reference to the Lord's Supper, the privileges of obedience, the consequences of disobedience, all therefore having a connection with the first day of the week (save verse 37), but the language is not such as would be used if those to whom he was writing could see the day approaching. It is a little while, as far as Christ is concerned; for a thousand years with him is as one day, but to man a thousand years is a long time."

Upon the above position we wish to make a few remarks and to offer a suggestion.

Notice, there is nothing said about exhorting on that day, but only as it is seen "approaching." Now if that day is Sunday, "recurring at regular intervals," and we are to exhort the more (do most of our exhorting), as we see the day approaching, then we shall certainly have to do most of our exhorting on Saturday; for there is no time during the week when we can see Sunday "approaching" as clearly as we can on Saturday.

How Heb. 10:19-39 has any more connection with the first day of the week than it has with the first day of the month, or the first day of the year, is more than we can see. Verses 26 and 27 tell us that if we sin willfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall "devour the adversaries." There is certainly no reference in these verses to any day of the week, but there is a very plain and unmistakable reference to the time when God in his indignation shall "devour the adversaries." Verses 28-31 refer to the punishments inflicted under Moses's law, and compares them with the "sorer punishment" when the Lord shall judge the people, and when all sinners will realize that it is a "fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

Any one who can see a connection between these words and the observance of the Lord's Supper, or the first day of the week, and who can see no evidence that the approaching day of verse 37 is the day of judgment, is able to see the smallest mote over the biggest beam of any one that we have ever seen.

Now we submit that it is just as sensible to hold that the coming referred to in verse 37 is the coming of Paul to the Sunday services, as it is to conclude that the "day approaching" refers to the first day of the week. We are willing to concede that the "day approaching" of verse 25, and the Answer.—The fact of individual responsibility for sin from a moral standpoint is more directly stated in Eze. 18 : 20, than in the passage quoted above from Jeremiah : "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father." Yet neither of these passages conflict with the second commandment; for this commandment speaks of iniquity from a different point of view, namely, as a consequence, not as a judicial punishment. The commandment does not say, "punishing the children for the iniquities of the parents," but "visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children," etc. The wrongs of parents in debauching their own moral natures, vitiating their blood, and corrupting their physical systems by evil practices, will by the law of heredity and the power of example, very likely be reproduced in their children, and they follow in the same wicked courses. Thus the iniquities of the fathers are visited upon the children. But in his moral accountability to God, every one shall answer for himself.

154.—ETERNAL LIFE—SECTION THREE.

Please give us Section 3 on the eternal life question by explaining 1 John 5 : 10-13, 20. Is it true that our Saviour did not have eternal life simply from the fact that he laid it down three days? Is it not implied in 1 John 3 : 15 that there are some that have eternal life? E. G. F.

Ans.—See explanation of the scripture first referred to, in REVIEW of Dec. 8, 1891, also in REVIEWS of Jan. 12, 1892, Feb. 2, 1892, and Feb. 9, 1892. See also explanation in verse 11 of the reference itself : "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." Why was this last clause added?—Simply to show that this life is not ours absolutely or in fact, but only relatively as we are connected with the Son. But is it not added, "He that hath the Son hath life;" and do we not have the Son? and have we not therefore in us the eternal life which is in him, and all that is brought to view in the text? To consider this, let us take in the next clause also : "He that hath not the Son of God hath not life." Now here are two persons, one of whom has the Son of God, in the sense of the text, and the other has not; that is, one is a Christian, and the other is a sinner; what is the difference between them? They have the same bodily organization, the same physical life, are dependent on the same means for subsistence, are subject to the same vicissitudes, are exposed to the same accidents, and liable alike to disease and death. Wherein do they differ? In what respect is the one who has the Son unlike the one who has him not? The only difference there is, is a difference in spiritual condition. The one who has the Son, orders his life according to his example, he walks according to the Spirit, not after the flesh. He has new hopes, feelings, aspirations, and desires. He is a new creature in Christ Jesus; and in the strength given him by the inworking of the Spirit of God, he lives a new spiritual life. But is this peculiar spiritual condition all there is to eternal life? Is this what the Scriptures mean when they speak of eternal life—simply a spiritual condition?—Impossible. Eternal life, consistently with the greatness and glory of God who has promised it, must be the perfection of all life of every name and nature, spiritual and physical; and when a person is once endowed with this life, he can no more be destroyed by sword or flame or flood, than can the angels of God in heaven. Anything less than this is a smaller hope than the Scriptures lead us to cherish. The spiritual condition implied by the expressions, "having the Son of God," or "being in him," is of course essential to the realization of this hope; and so in an accommodated sense this condition may be said to be the beginning of eternal life; for so long as we maintain this, we have it in certain prospect. It can only be used in this sense in 1 John 3 : 15.

The laying off of eternal life by the Son of God was not an event in the natural order of things, but was a special transaction for a special purpose, the mystery of which neither men nor angels can comprehend. Before he came to this earth, he had immortality, and life in himself, as God has life in himself. How he could lay that aside, man cannot tell; but the apostle says he "was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death." Had his sacrifice for the world come about by any natural law, or the natural order of events, then he could not be said to have had immortality or eternal life before his advent to this earth. His incarnation cannot therefore be used as having any bearing on this question.

WHEN, WHERE, AND WHY WAS THIS PROPHECY GIVEN?

OUR Saviour had come up to Jerusalem to give his life a sacrifice for sinful man. The people he came to save were about to put him to death. He rode into the city amid triumphant hosannas from a vast crowd of the common people, who received him gladly. He wept over it with deepest grief, as before his mind in prophetic outline passed the fearful scenes soon to transpire in its terrible destruction. Some days were evidently spent in and about the city, previous to his crucifixion, during which he taught in the temple daytimes, and at night returned to the Mount of Olives, where he and his disciples rested. Luke 21 : 37, 38. The great crisis in the plan of salvation was almost reached, his earthly ministry almost closed.

During this brief period, being fully conscious of all that awaited him, he was intensely active in closing his public instructions and ministry. The days and nights were full of earnest labor either for the people in general or for the preparation of his own disciples for the great change that awaited them. With divine power and authority he cast out the buyers and sellers from the temple, taught the people daily who heard him gladly, gave various parables concerning his coming and work, confounded the cunning hypocritical Pharisees and scribes who sought to entrap him in his talk, put the Sadducees to silence, denounced the wickedness, blindness, and great hypocrisy of the rulers, and announced the judgments which should come upon them and Jerusalem for their terrible sins. He instructed his disciples particularly about his coming death, celebrated with them the Passover Supper, washed their feet, and appointed the Lord's Supper for their future celebration, encouraging, admonishing, and praying with and for them preparatory to the terrible scenes of his death, and their anguish when it should occur; he was then betrayed, abused, and crucified.

During this period, the remarkable prophecy we are about to consider, was given, foretelling many of the great events of the Christian dispensation, his glorious coming, and the final reward of the righteous and wicked; but most clearly of all, the special signs of the close of the dispensation and his own glorious advent to save his people. This instruction seems not to have been altogether given in the form of one continued discourse in one place. Evidently neither of the evangelists have given all he said on the subject. Matthew presents far more than either of the others, and in a more connected, methodical manner. Mark gives mainly the same facts with some changes. Luke presents various points of interest on the same subject, but evidently from a somewhat different standpoint; while John says nothing about it.

From the remarkable statement of John (John 21 : 25), we cannot suppose we have anything like a full and complete record of all our Saviour said and did while here on earth. For he supposes that "the world itself could not contain the books that should be written." If all that he did was recorded, we would have an invaluable history. The Spirit of God inspired as much to be recorded as was necessary for us to know, to fully establish our faith as disciples of our blessed Lord.

We may therefore reasonably conclude that we have in our Saviour's remarkable prophecy only the substance of what he said on at least two different occasions. There is no contradiction or disagreement between the three gospel writers who have given us the record we have. They have simply written such portions as the Spirit indited, which we are to study and arrange according to the best light we can obtain in harmony with the written facts, doing violence to none of their statements, giving each its proper bearing, producing a harmony between them and other portions of the sacred Scriptures, upon the great subject these writers have treated, our Lord's second coming.

This discourse seems to have commenced as he was teaching in the temple (Luke 21 : 1-5), or perhaps at its gate, as he was about departing from it (Matt. 24 : 1; Mark 13 : 1), as some of his disciples called his attention to the great stones of which it was built. These were of white marble thirty-six feet long, eighteen feet broad, and twelve feet thick. (See Josephus' Antiquities, book 15, chap. 11, sec. 3.) They were of wonderful workmanship. Christ told them the time would come when not one of these should be left upon another that should not be thrown down. How long he continued his discourse on these topics at the temple gate, we are not told, but we know it was completed on the Mount of Olives half a mile away (Matt. 24 : 3), and probably at night when he had returned there. From Luke's record we should naturally draw the conclusion that what he records was spoken at the temple, though he does not say so directly, while Matthew and Mark both distinctly state that what they record was spoken at Olivet.

The temple was a public place where crowds were gathered at the great feast. His remarks as recorded by Luke are spoken more especially of the destruction of the Jewish nation and the city of Jerusalem, though not wholly confined to these, while Matthew and Mark expressly state that they record what was spoken to his disciples alone, something, therefore, of peculiar interest to his own church and people. Yet the destruction of Jerusalem is also mentioned in it as a prominent event. It would seem reasonable, then, to suppose that when the Saviour's attention was called to the beauty of the temple and its wonderful stones, he spoke quite fully before those present, of the fearful events awaiting it. And the disciples becoming anxious to learn more, made special inquiry of him when they had retired at the close of the day to the Mount of Olives.

Two great events had been brought to their attention by him; for their inquiry relates to both : "Tell us, when shall these things be? [i. e., When shall these terrible calamities befall the Jewish capital and nation?] and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. 24 : 3. Whether they supposed these events would occur at the same time, we know not. We do know, however, that they had no clear conception of the nature of Christ's kingdom. They were doubtless blinded by Jewish traditions, expecting it would resemble the glorious era in Israel's history—the reign of David and Solomon. They evidently had little conception of the spirituality and divine glory of it. They hoped to share in its earthly splendor, and even after his resurrection, before their eyes were spiritually illuminated at Pentecost, they still expected him to restore Israel's glory by subduing their enemies and reigning in person here on earth, in this mortal state. Matt. 20 : 20-28; Acts 1 : 6. But whatever may have been their conception concerning it or the relation between the destruction of Jerusalem and the coming of Christ, our Saviour's reply shows the clearest distinction between those two events. So it becomes utter folly for any to seek to confound them. This will more fully appear as we proceed.

This important prophecy, therefore, like many other of our Saviour's discourses, seems to have been called out by the occurrence of circumstances. One of his disciples, partaking perhaps of the national satisfaction in the great beauty of the temple structure, calls his attention to its solid workmanship. To teach those about him the instability of these things in view of the sins of this people, Jesus prophesies its sure destruction. Not one of these great stones would in a little while be left upon another. At night Peter, James, John, and Andrew, desiring to learn more about this wonderful prediction, and especially as to how they may know when he will come to earth the second time, come to him privately on Olivet at night, and inquire, "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. 24:1-3; Mark 13:1-3. The question concerned two great events only; Jerusalem's ruin and the signs to precede His advent, the coming of Christ and the end of the world, or Christian age, occurring at the same time. His answer while answering their questions fully, gave still further information of deepest interest, of great moment to his waiting people.

Let the reader carefully ponder the fact that the portion of his instruction given by Matthew and Mark was a private discourse to his own disciples, and not to the world in general. They desired special information concerning the signs that were to precede his coming, that they might know when it was near. He clearly and fully answered their queries. He thus recognized the propriety of their questions. He would not have answered them as he did, were it not a proper subject of inquiry. He therefore is pleased to have his disciples seek knowledge on this subject. It is not a forbidden theme, neither does the Lord desire us to be in ignorance upon this subject. It is a part of his revelation to his people. "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God: but those which are revealed belong unto us and to our children." Deut. 29:29. We are therefore fully authorized, yea, under great obligation, to study this portion of revelation as well as our Saviour's teachings on other subjects. It relates, as we shall see, to our salvation. The subject is most glorious,—the hope of the church of God in all ages, the theme of surpassing interest to all who truly love the Lord. Such will desire to know all they can of the time when he shall come after them to take them to the mansions he has gone to prepare for their eternal abode. John 14:1-3. How can any true disciple be indifferent to that which concerns his eternal welfare so greatly?

THE CHRISTIAN TAI-PINGS.

DURING the time of the Tai-ping rebellion, missionaries that were in different parts of China often journeyed among them to learn of them. Their writings at that time appeared in the English magazines. It is evident that they sought to be friendly with their brethren across the waters. They could not believe that the English people, when they learned of them, would crush them out of existence. They could not in fact believe that it was the Christian portion of England that was making war with them. The following extracts are from the narrative of a journey among the Tai-pings, by the Revs. Edkins, John, Macgowan, and Hall, bearing the date Shang-Hai, July 16, 1860:—

"From the information acquired, it is evident that the religious element enters very powerfully into this great revolutionary movement. Nothing can be more erroneous than the supposition that it is a purely political one, and that religion occupies but a subordinate place in it. So far is this from being the case, that on the contrary, it is the basis upon which the former rests, and is its life-perpetuating source. The downfall of idolatry and the establishment of the worship of the true God, are objects aimed at by them, with as much sincerity and devotion as the expulsion of the Manchus, and the conquest of the empire. In opposition to the pantheistic notions of the philosophers of the Sung dynasty, they hold the doctrine of the personality of the Deity; in opposition to the popular polytheistic notions, they have the clearest conceptions of the unity of God; and in opposition to the fatalism of the philosophical Buddhism, they believe in and teach the doctrine of an all-superintending Providence. This appears on the very surface, and no one can be among them for any length of time without being impressed with it. They feel that they have a work to accomplish, and the deep conviction that they are guided by an unerring finger, and supported by an omnipotent arm in its execution, is their inspiration. Success they ascribe to the goodness of the heavenly Father, and defeat, to his chastisements. The Deity is with them, not an abstract notion, not a stern implacable sovereign, but a loving Father, who watches tenderly over their affairs, and leads them by the hand. The scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are their proposed standard of faith now, as they were at the commencement of the movement.

"This feeling which they entertain toward foreigners is apparently of the most friendly nature; they are always addressed as 'our foreign brethren.' We worship the same heavenly Father, and believe in the same Elder Brother; why should we be at variance? They seem to be anxious for intercourse with foreigners, and desirous to promote the interests of trade. The opening up of the eighteen provinces to trade, they say, would be most pleasing to them. Some would say that policy would make them talk in this way. Suppose it did; how is it that policy, or something akin, does not make the imperialist speak in the same way? They say that foreigners will be respected whenever they pass through their territory; and the respectful attention that they paid to those who have visited them, is a sufficient proof of their sincerity.

"A great deal has been said about the cruelty of the long-haired rebels; but in this there has been much exaggeration and misrepresentation. In no instance have we witnessed any traces of willful destruction. It is true that they kill, but it is because they must do so or submit to be killed. They burn, but so far as our observation went, it is invariably in self-defense. Much of the burning is done by the imperialists before the arrival of the rebels, and the cases of suicide are far more numerous than those of murder. The fact that all the women have been allowed to leave Sung Kiang, and that they are known, in many cases, to have made attempts to save men and women who had plunged themselves into the canals and rivers, is a proof that they are not the cruel relentless marauders that they have been represented to be by many. They are revolutionists in the strictest sense of the term; both the work of slaughter and plunder are carried on so far as is necessary to secure the end. They are evils which necessarily accompany such a movement, and are justifiable or otherwise in so far as the movement itself is so."

These missionaries gave the above in a report to their secretary. Other reports from Rev. Griffiths John to Rev. Dr. Tidman and others might be quoted to show the sentiment of a large proportion of the missionaries who visited them and became acquainted with them.

Before taking the various cities, they would send a message of peace, but it was upon condition that they would renounce idolatry and accept the true God and Christianity. They sought that China would be in the great congress of nations, instead of standing aloof in childish pomposity. They desired that free access be given to the arts, sciences, and manufactures of other nations. In fact, they publicly expressed themselves as wishing the introduction of the various arts and productions of other nations. They desired that all their relations with foreign nations should be kindly relations, and that the resources of the country be developed by a liberal exchange of its products for those of other lands.

Certainly we can see that God in raising up this people of strict observers of the seventh-day Sabbath, went before his people, and he has cast great light upon China from time to time, which has not been appreciated by Christian nations or individuals that professed to be Christians. The rebellion lasted about fourteen years, and the number killed of these Christian Tai-pings is estimated at some over 2,800,000.

The facts as above given are from the "History of the Tai-ping Revolution." S. N. H.

SHOULD SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS ESTABLISH AND MAINTAIN DENOMINATIONAL SCHOOLS?

THIS question has already been answered in fact. Denominational schools have been established, and are being maintained. The work began in 1874 by founding Battle Creek College, and has been extended, until there are now three colleges and two academies in which instruction is being given to about twelve hundred students. But it costs money and involves much hard work. Does it pay?—That depends upon the value attached to the results accomplished. Does it pay to give a Christian education instead of a secular one? Does it pay to give the young people a thorough course of instruction, both theoretical and practical, in the word of God? Does it pay to maintain schools which lead their students to a knowledge of God in his created works, and his constant care in upholding all things he has made? Education is not a thing of a day or a year, and its results are correspondingly permanent. It is not a question of so much language, mathematics, and science, with the ability to pass certain examinations. It is a question of character, of preparation for the work of life, and its results reach over into eternity. The tendency of modern education is to shut out God and a simple faith in his word from the student's mind; and so it happens that many, who leave home for some seminary or college with an earnest zeal for the faith of their fathers, return in a few years with their minds filled with doubts and questionings, and their hearts cold and hard.

Many Seventh-day Adventists who have cherished the hope that their sons and daughters might grow up to fill places of usefulness in the cause which they love, have seen them drawn away into worldly pursuits, as the result, directly or indirectly, of their education. Is this necessary? When education and culture come in, must faith in God and love for his work go out? Fearing this outcome, some have thought best not to give their children an education, preferring to let them grow up in comparative ignorance, rather than to run the risk of their making shipwreck of their faith. But when knowledge of God as revealed in his word, in his works, and in his dealings with mankind, is made the leading idea in a scheme of education, the results should be favorable to Christian growth. Especially is this true when the value of a personal experience in the things of God is brought home to the heart of every student, and the general sentiment of the school leads in this direction.

Christian schools are needed in which to educate students for Christian service, and a Christian school is not one in which the Christian religion is merely believed in, or assented to, in a sort of passive way by the trustees or a majority of the instructors, or one that is conducted in a nominally Christian community, but one in which the religion of Jesus Christ in its purity is the living, active principle which directs and molds the work,—one in which the presence of God's Spirit is earnestly sought and the power of his grace depended upon as the only means of accomplishing the desired results—the conversion of souls and the development of Christian character. In an institution of this kind all the teaching is in a sense religious teaching, and all the instructors are engaged in religious work, both in and out of the class room.

Those who have been called in the providence of God to lead out in the special work committed to fiftieth day after the offering of the wave-sheaf of first-fruits at the Passover. The fifty days between the offering of the first-fruits and the Pentecost formally included the entire period of the grain harvest; and the pentecostal festival was akin to the feast of ingathering at the close of the year, when the whole year's fruits of all kinds had been gathered. It met its antitype in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the occasion mentioned in Acts 2:1. Pentecost, being confined to a particular day of the month, the 6th of Sivan, fell on different days of the week in different years. In this case it fell on Sunday; for Christ was crucified on the 14th day of the month, as the antitype of the Passover lamb; but this was on the sixth day of the week, or Friday. The next day was both the Passover sabbath and the weekly Sabbath, which made it "a high day." John 19:31. The next day (in this case the first day of the week) "the morrow after the [Passover] sabbath," was the day of the wave-sheaf, the antitype of which was fulfilled in the resurrection of Christ, the "first-fruits" of them that slept. From this point seven full weeks were to be reckoned (Lev. 23:11, 15, 16), and the fiftieth day was the day of Pentecost, and would always fall on the same day of the week as the wave-sheaf, being in this case, consequently, Sunday.

IDEALS.

LIFE, it has been said, should be a constant effort to lift the actual up to the level of the ideal. In other words, it should be a constant effort to make our actions and attributes conform to our highest conceivable standards of excellence.

There is probably no sane person in the world who has not a desire to become better than he is. There is in every heart a natural desire to rise, to attain some higher plane of thought and action, or what they imagine to be a higher plane, than their existence has thus far reached. Many persons are mistaken, indeed, and expend their energies in seeking for that which is not elevating, but rather the opposite; but whether deceived or not, all have this natural tendency within them. Ideals, therefore, are not the airy composition of day-dreams, but something of very practical importance. Indeed, they concern in the closest manner our actions, our character, and our final destiny.

All persons have ideals, and toward these they naturally gravitate. But of course all persons have not the same ideals. Not all ideals are good ones. The youth who feeds his mind upon depraved fiction has ideals which would far better have been left to die where they were born; so with many others which are drawn from unworthy sources. The source of our ideals is the same as that of our ideas; for the one is but the condensation and crystallization of a number of the other. These sources are the words that we hear, the actions that we see, and the books and other writings which we read.

The loftier our ideals, the nobler will be our actions. But whether ideals are lofty or not, depends altogether upon the materials from which they are made. Here the Christian has an advantage over all others, since his ideals are obtained from the very best possible source. Not from human thoughts of what is pure and beautiful and noble and right, but from God's own conceptions of these, he is enabled to form his own. Christ's is the ideal character, his life the ideal life, and not only are his ideals the highest, but, better than all, God has provided him with the sure means of their attainment.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

THE COMING OF CHRIST AND THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM WHOLLY DISTINCT.

BEFORE entering upon a connected exposition of our Saviour's prophecy, it may be well to notice the position of those who ascribe this whole discourse to the fate of Jerusalem and the Jews. Universalists ever seek to confine it to them, and utterly deny that it relates to Christ's personal advent. Many prominent Protestant commentators of the past have taught that while it foretells the destruction of that city, it also brings plainly to view Christ's return in glory to our earth, though some of them, conspicuously Dr. Adam Clarke, the great Methodist commentator, apply all of the 24th chapter of Matthew to the destruction of Jerusalem. But he is hardly consistent with himself in his exegesis. For in chapter 25:31, a continuation of the same discourse, in commenting upon this passage: "When the son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory," he says, "This must be understood of Christ's coming at the last day to judge mankind; though all the preceding part of the chapter may be applied also to the destruction of Jerusalem." Placing this scripture and his comment side by side with Matt. 24:30, 31: "And then shall appear the sign of the son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other," he applies this "coming in the clouds of heaven" wholly to the destruction of Jerusalem, the sending of "the angels with a great sound of the trumpet" to the sending forth of the twelve apostles with the gospel message, though they had been on their way proclaiming it about forty years already, when Jerusalem was destroyed.

It would seem that Dr. Clarke himself must have had many misgivings about applying one of these scriptures to the coming of the Lord in glory and the other to the work of the Roman army, when the language in both instances would make perfect nonsense to apply either to anything else than the glorious advent of our Lord.

It must be admitted that the trend of the current among Protestant expositors of late is in the direction of the Universalist position. Alas! with many professed followers of Christ there is little interest in the subject of his second advent, and a manifest desire to put it as far off as possible. But those who truly love the Lord will cherish every token of the nearness of his earthly return; for all love to see and be with those who are dear to them. It is important, therefore, that the reader should fully settle this question at the start, Does this prophecy relate wholly to the fate of Jerusalem and the Jews, or is it a special discourse for Christ's disciples through this whole dispensation—a history in advance, showing their whereabouts in the stream of time?

And first of all, the questions asked our Lord ought to settle it forever: "When shall these things be? [the stones of the temple thrown down, not one being left upon another] and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" All Bible students freely admit that the first question relates wholly to Jerusalem and the Jews. Would it be reasonable to suppose the second is substantially the same question right over again? This would lead one to think our Saviour showed a lack of ordinary good sense. Is there a single instance on record in the writings of the evangelists, where Jesus confounds these two events? Is there any similarity between them? This is an important question. There is only one point of similarity; the terrible ruin brought upon Christ's unbelieving enemies in both instances. Yet the manner of inflicting this ruin is utterly different.

In the one case it is wholly by human agencies; in the other, by supernatural judgments. The Romans under Titus besieged the city, and it fell into their hands after a terrible famine, and there were slain 1,100,000 people by starvation, sickness, and the sword. But the coming of Christ is "in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." "For the son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works." "Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." "And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" Rev. 6:14-17. (See Matt. 24:30; Mark 13:26; Luke 21:27; Matt. 16:27; Rev. 1:7.)

There is not a scrap of history in existence to show that anything of this kind occurred at the destruction of Jerusalem. Hence there is no resemblance whatever between that event and the coming of Christ, only the minor one above referred to. And if these scriptures do not all refer to that same event,—the personal revelation of Christ at his second advent,—then we could not identify anything by human language. Neither could we find in all the canon of inspiration clearer reference to it, and therefore must conclude it was nowhere spoken of. But this would be doing utter violence to the word of God.

Again: the Bible teaches that the coming of Christ takes place at the close of probation, or the Christian dispensation. A special period of favor was once allotted to the Jewish people, Abraham's literal descendants. For ages they were the favored people, and God gave them special privileges. These expired soon after they rejected Jesus as the Messiah. So ended the Jewish dispensation. Then the "Times of the Gentiles," commenced, the Christian dispensation, when God's work was to be specially with them. At the close of this period Christ comes. But Jerusalem was to be destroyed long before that. "And they [the Jews] shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Then Christ will come. Luke 21:24, 27. Therefore Christ's second advent could not possibly have occurred when Jerusalem was destroyed.

Christ was not to come until certain "signs" should be given preceding the event, to be evidences of its nearness. The darkening of the sun, the moon, the falling of the stars, etc., are specially mentioned by our Lord, and his people are commanded to "know" the event was near when these things should be seen. (See Matt. 24:29; Mark 13:24, 25; Luke 21:25; Rev. 6:13.) But in all the histories extant not a sentence can be found stating that any of these things occurred previous to Jerusalem's destruction. Hence if the destruction of that city by the Romans was the coming of Christ, our Saviour's words never came to pass.

The saints of God are all to be gathered by the angels "from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other," when Christ comes. "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him." Again, "We which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent [or go before] them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. 4:15-17. (See Matt. 24:31; 2 Thess. 2:1.)

Were the saints of God, dead and alive, all gathered to Titus by the heavenly angels, when Jerusalem was destroyed? So far from it, there was not a single Christian there at that time; for as we shall see, they, being warned by Christ in this very prophecy, had fled far away before ever Jerusalem was besieged by Titus.

Christ likens his coming to the flood in Noah's time. He speaks of the people everywhere being given up to earthly pleasure and the utter destruction of all of God's enemies by it. "And knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so also shall the coming of the son of man be." Matt. 24:39. Not only were many of the Jews not killed at that time, but were carried into captivity. The Romans also were God's enemies, and the persecutors of his people who put to death the Son of God himself. And there were multitudes of heathen all over the earth, worshipers of false gods. Were all these swept from the earth when Jerusalem was destroyed? They must have been, if that event was the coming of Christ.

Jesus teaches in this discourse that many false Christs were to arise, and multitudes would be deceived by them, before his coming. But no person can prove from history that a single one of these arose before Jerusalem was destroyed, though many have arisen since. Neither did "nation" "rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom," before that time; for the Roman empire then held universal sway. But Christ said after all these had appeared,—which they did long after the destruction of that city,—"The end is not yet." Therefore the "end of the world" and Jerusalem's destruction must be distinct events. He said also that his people should be "hated of all nations," previous to his coming. But when Jerusalem was destroyed, many nations since prominent, did not exist at all. Matt. 24:5-10.

This view dishonors the Great Teacher. It dwarfs to comparative insignificance the grand theme of this great prophecy, the most extensive and complete of any he ever gave, clothed in language the most vivid and glorious, which ever flowed from his lips, embracing events of greatest moment to our race, covering the whole dispensation, yes, reaching to the end of the whole scheme of salvation, the glorious reward of the righteous, the restitution of all things spoken of by the prophets and the utter destruction of sin and sinners. To belittle all this to the destruction of one city and one people, is doing violence to our Saviour's words, contradicting his plainest statements, and perverting one of the most momentous truths of inspiration.

GENERAL MEETINGS IN AUSTRALIA.

At the time of closing our last report to the REVIEW, our people were assembling for the annual Conference. Our expectations in regard to attendance were quite fully met, there being present a good representation of the different churches of which the Conference is composed. The meeting opened on Thursday evening, Dec. 23, when brother Starr introduced a course of Bible study which occupied the most of the evenings throughout the session. The two days following were employed in devotional meetings. On Christmas morning sister White delivered an appropriate and effective discourse, and in the evening brother White spoke in relation to our foreign mission work. On the Sabbath it was necessary to secure a larger hall to accommodate the congregation, and sister White preached with her usual power. On Sunday the program was entered upon as follows: 6 A. M., the consideration of various features of the work; 9 A. M., devotional meetings; 10:30 A. M., business meetings; 2:30 P. M., business meeting; evening, Bible study. This was followed throughout the week, during which the annual meetings of the various organizations were held.

The proceedings of the Conference are reported in another place, though but little allusion is made to the interesting discussions on the various projects embodied in the resolutions, particularly that of the establishment of educational facilities in our midst. It was concluded that such an institution should not be local in its origin or character; that it should be adapted to supplying the wants of the field as far as our influence might reach. The impression largely prevailed that Australia would naturally become the head-quarters of the work in this section of the world. Between the islands of the sea, the British possessions in India, Japan, and Australia, there exists a strong bond of national consanguinity, which would render these regions more accessible to the truth if it proceeded from the recognized centers in this part of the world, though of course upon this point no definite action was taken. The missionary spirit was encouraged, and the efforts received quite a hearty response in the minds of those who composed the meeting. The interest in this department was enhanced by the arrival of brother and sister Gates, and brother Mc Coy, who left the "Pitcairn" in Auckland, to attend the Conference, arriving here on Thursday, the last day of 1891. Several in this country have expressed their readiness to engage in this work in the islands, as the providence of God may direct.

Elder Daniells was chosen to the presidency of the Conference and tract society, and steps were taken to bring the latter into a more active condition than heretofore. Colportage is to be prosecuted as a means of following up the interest which has been created by the sale of books. An active canvass in behalf of the Bible Echo was organized, and it is determined to try to greatly increase the circulation of our periodicals in the near future. Several of our best canvassers volunteered to enter upon this work, the price of the paper having been raised sufficiently to warrant the publishers in holding out some inducements.

The secretary's books showed that the membership of the Conference is about five hundred and fifty, an increase of ninety-five during the Conference year. The report of the treasurer showed a gratifying willingness upon the part of the people to pay the tithe. We do not suppose that all come up religiously to the system, but with the majority of our people, there is a disposition to be in harmony with these requirements of the Bible. It will be seen that the average of the Melbourne church is a little over $18.25, and some of the other churches are about equal to this. The balance sheet of the Echo Publishing Company is given in another place, and will be read with interest. It will be seen that the book department is contributing largely to the support of the publication of our periodicals, perhaps not quite so fully as is indicated in the report, if rent and other items of expense which might be mentioned were charged to it. That which makes the book business profitable to the Company is the fact that we are able to add slightly to the American prices, and thus give larger returns both to the canvasser and the office.

The business meetings passed off harmoniously, and we rejoiced at many tokens of divine blessing. In the devotional meetings sister White set before the people the truth in reference to our real condition in the sight of God. Testimonies borne were plain and searching. They were not of a nature calculated to flatter our vanity, or to encourage a self-satisfied spirit. Wrong feelings were disclosed, and the spirit of independence and criticism pointed out. At first it seemed difficult for the people to realize that the force of these solemn testimonies applied to us. It was something different from what we had expected to hear, but the convictions of the truthfulness fastened upon the minds of those who heard them, and before the meeting closed, many tearful and humble acknowledgments were made which confirmed the faithfulness of the testimony of the Spirit of God. Sister White labored ardently during the meetings, which coming so soon after her long voyage, found her weak and suffering from rheumatism. With her family she removed, at the close of the Conference, to the outskirts of the city, where it is hoped that the pure air and quiet rest will be favorable to her recuperation.

A workers' institute succeeded the regular exercises of the Conference, and continued one week. During this time a class in cooking and nursing was conducted by sisters Starr, Gates, and Walling. The interest was keen and well sustained. A large class of canvassers attended the instruction of brother Michaels, and some time was devoted to other features of the work. Brother Starr continued his Bible studies throughout the entire meetings. These were seasons of special interest and instruction. Light was thrown upon the sacred word; and the plan of salvation and the love of God through Christ seemed to take new proportions in the minds of the people, who gladly acknowledged the profit they had received.

The friends have now departed to their homes, and the laborers to their fields to work. Elders Hare and Steed will unite in labor in New South Wales, brethren Curtis and Baker go to Victoria; the canvassing work will still be pushed forward with an attempt to embrace the work of our periodicals, as well as books. Plans will be laid at once for starting a temporary school, and the establishment of a permanent institution will be taken into consideration. Brethren Starr and Gates have visited Ballarat, brethren Gates and Daniells will visit Adelaide, and brethren Starr and Gates will visit the churches in Tasmania on their way to the New Zealand Conference. Brother Henry Scott, who has been associated with the work from the outset, now takes his departure for California, being called thither by the age and infirmities of his parents. He is accompanied by one of our young ladies, who goes to attend the nursing school, and by our dear brother Carter, who goes to our health institutions for much-needed treatment.

There is a vast amount of work towering up before us as we contemplate the field and the future; but in the strength and help of God we trust, realizing that if we live near to him, he will be the help and stay of his people.

Editorial Notes.

THE secret of success in life is the secret of how to get great things out of the little common-place things of which the average life is made up.

There are two kinds of greatness in this world, and the inferior kind of great men are generally the most conspicuous. They are the men who are great through wealth, power, and influence. Greatness upon the outside of a man does not always imply greatness upon the inside. The essential element of inside greatness is self-control. "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." Prov. 16:32. There is about the great men of the world an atmosphere of seclusion; they are not easy of access to the common people. So about the morally great men there is a secluding atmosphere, which is felt by those who come within it. It is the atmosphere of virtue, of unstained integrity, shutting out the individual from all that is low, evil, and debasing. He is difficult of access to unworthy thoughts and deeds. This greatness always brings happiness to its possessor; but the greatness of wealth and position often bring the reverse. The latter is attainable only to the few; the former is within the reach of all.

Who can comprehend the value of that which the infinite God,—the Creator of the earth and all its treasures, holds valuable? One such thing is "the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit," which, we are told, "is in the sight of God of great price." 1 Pet. 3:4.

We are exhorted in the Scriptures to glorify God in our body and in our spirit which are God's. It is not enough merely to glorify God in the heart or with the lips; we must do it with our whole being. To glorify God with our body requires that we should keep that part of our being in the best scape-goat; if not, they will be rolled back upon their own heads. The same truth is also taught in the parable of the unjust servant in Matt. 18:23-35.

164.—TEMPTATION TO SIN. JAMES 1:13, 14.

Does the word "tempted" in James 1:13, 14, mean simply tempted to sin? or does it mean led to commit sin? Are not the temptations of the child of God rather from without than from lust that dwells within? and are not the sins which overcome him the result of yielding the will to the power of temptation from without, and thus admitting lust or perhaps developing it, instead of being the result of lust that dwells in the heart?

M. A. W.

Ans.—"Tempted" as used in these texts means "solicited to sin." In this sense God tempts no man. While God does "tempt" men in the sense of trying or testing them, as he is said to have tempted Abraham (Gen. 22:1), he never tempts any one in the sense of soliciting to sin; neither is he responsible for the unfavorable conditions with which we are environed, nor for our natural propensities to sin. All these men have brought upon themselves. The downward tendency of the human race since the first defection of Adam, has made the heart of man most congenial soil for the growth of evil. Taking advantage of our natural propensities, the tempter incites us to sin. The word "lust" is here used in its broad sense, signifying wrong desires of any kind, covering the whole range of worldliness, appetites, and passions. The desires are stimulated through all the avenues of the senses, and as we are constituted by nature, are easily stimulated in the wrong direction, and clamor for indulgence. This is the "enticing" of which James speaks. The sin is surrendering our wills to these wrong desires and passions, and letting them lead. The result of this unlawful connection is sin. Verse 15. "Then when lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin." Then sin in its turn becomes an awful progenitor and brings forth death. So, as Dr. Deems tersely puts it, "The sinner is the father of his own sin, and the grandfather of his own death." It is the office of the grace of God so to change man's nature, so renovate the soil of his heart, that good desires and impulses will take root and grow there instead of evil.

ZEDEKIAH.

THE history of Zedekiah, king of Judah, as set forth in the book of the prophet Jeremiah, presents before us much that is of value with respect to the conduct of Christian life. It is among those things which were written "aforetime," for our learning and instruction, and one lesson at least that we may draw from it is not difficult of discovery. That is the lesson of allegiance to our inmost convictions of truth and right, whether with or without the sanction of those whose counsel and advice in other matters we have been accustomed to respect.

Zedekiah does not seem to have been at heart a very wicked man; but he possessed one trait which in the circumstances that surrounded him, was equally fatal to the prosperity of his reign and to his own personal welfare: his fear of man was greater than his fear of God. Apparently he did entertain some regard for the divine will, as revealed through the prophet Jeremiah; but when the instructions given him by the prophet came in conflict with the wishes and opinions of those in positions of authority around him, he invariably yielded to the latter. It does not appear that the king was convinced of the correctness of their views; rather the opposite may be inferred; but he did not dare to take any decided stand in opposition to their purposes. When the princes of Judah came to him and demanded the death of the prophet, he replied, "Behold, he is in your hand; for the king is not he that can do anything against you." The untruth of this abject declaration appears in a subsequent interview with Jeremiah, when, as it is recorded (Jer. 38:16), "Zedekiah the king sware secretly unto Jeremiah, saying, As the Lord liveth, that made us this soul, I will not put thee to death, neither will I give thee into the hand of these men that seek thy life."

As Zedekiah feared both God and man, the former a little and the latter a good deal, he sought some way by which to please both; and the result was, of course, that he pleased neither. And in the course of his striving over this impossible task, he seems to have brought himself into a singular state of self-deception; for while going directly contrary to the instructions God had given him, he would send to Jeremiah with the inquiry, "Is there any word from the Lord?" He was determined to continue in his own way and according to the will of the priests and princes, with the continual hope that God would change his mind. He learned ere long that "God changeth not," and that the opinions of men, however invested with worldly greatness, count for nothing against the definite instructions of the Omniscient.

No person can admire the course pursued by this unhappy king of Judah, or read the record of it without conceding his great folly; yet how many to-day are like him,—making the same mistake that he made, and yet flattering themselves that they are somehow doing about as well as they can; so much harder is it to discover our own folly than to see it in the course of another. The will of God is no less plainly revealed to man now than it was to Zedekiah; yet how many more understand that will than are honestly endeavoring to perform it! and among the causes of this delinquency, how potent is that of the fear of the opinions of others! First is a refusal to walk in the light that has been given them, then an attempt to perform the impossible task of pleasing God and their worldly friends—or more often their own worldly natures—at the same time, and then, like Zedekiah, inquiring of the prophet, they watch for some sign that God justifies their course. But all such must learn the same lesson in the end,—that God never justifies what he has condemned, and that the only guaranty of their present or future welfare is their compliance with the divine will, according to the directions of their inmost conscience, regardless of what all others may think or say. "The fear of man bringeth a snare." There will be no moral cowards in heaven.

Zedekiah lived at a time when a firm stand for the right and a bold adherence to his own conscientious convictions were matters of the utmost consequence, both to himself and the people of his kingdom; but he yielded to the influence of his backslidden priests and princes, and became a mere instrument in their hands for the accomplishment of their blind and ruinous purposes. Struggling on toward an illusive and impossible hope, without the approval of God or man or his own conscience, he only saw at last the overthrow of his own kingdom, with the glorious temple destroyed, and himself a miserable, hopeless captive in a distant land. Unhappy reign, unhappy end!—a type of the end of all those who fear man rather than God.

GOD'S JUDGMENTS UPON JERUSALEM AND THE JEWS.

PERHAPS there is nothing in all Christ's ministry on earth more affecting and pathetic—outside of the special scenes of his death and passion—than his contemplation of the judgments about to fall upon the Jewish nation and their famous city. It should be remembered that for more than fifteen centuries he, the promised seed of Abraham, had been the spiritual leader of his literal descendants, superintending, directing, protecting, blessing, and seeking to save that people from the ruin their blindness, stubbornness, and infatuation seemed sure to bring on themselves. At last "he came to his own, and his own received him not." Filled with pride, bigotry, and hatred of the Gentiles, whom they should have sought to save, and looking for a temporal ruler as the Messiah, who would exalt them among the nations, giving them great earthly glory, riches, and power, the leaders of the people would not accept the meek Lamb of God, but rejected him with scorn, and were about to put him to death.

He had sought by every means that Divinity itself could consistently use, to bring them to see the light, but they seemed determined to follow their own ways, rushing on to their ruin by putting to death their greatest Benefactor, their dearest Friend. He well knew that divine justice must overtake them for such conduct. It could not be otherwise. But his grief at this inevitable result was heart-breaking. As he rode triumphantly into Jerusalem, and contemplated the city so soon to be overwhelmed, he seemed unable to control his great sorrow. "And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." Luke 19:41-44. And soon after, while exposing the wickedness of the leaders and depicting the persecutions they would bring on his disciples, as he beholds the results sure to follow, he cries in his great anguish, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate." Matt. 23:37, 38. In rejecting him, they had madly brought down upon themselves their own ruin.

It was at this point that he gave the great prophecy we have set out to consider. It was to him a most sad and heart-breaking termination of many centuries of his personal watch care over that people he greatly desired to save. To his own loving disciples, who pointed in admiration to the beautiful architecture of the temple, he tells in sadness what is sure to come. "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck, in those days! for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Luke 21:20-24.

The record of Luke concerning the destruction impending over the Jews is as full as that of either of the other evangelists. Matthew and Mark add in reference to the haste with which they should flee when the Saviour's appointed sign should show the time had come for their flight: "Let him which is on the housetop not come down to take anything out of his house: neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. . . . But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." Matt. 24:17, 18, 20; Mark 13:15, 16, 18.

Our Saviour's prophecy was given for the special benefit of his own disciples; those who would believe his words. The unbelieving Jews would not be instructed by anything he could say; for they had rejected him. Neither will an unbelieving world or popular church in the last days pay much heed to his warnings. But his humble disciples in that age and before his second coming cherish his own instructions. For this reason, they were communicated to his own followers alone. They were of immense practical value to the church at the time when Jerusalem was destroyed, as the sequel shows.

The great cloud of wrath was gathering for years, which was to burst over the Jewish nation. They hated the oppressive Romans. The governors sent were tyrannical and unjust. The Jews were restive for a long period, growing more and more rebellious and defiant. Insurrections broke out from time to time, but were put down by the strong hand of Rome. At last about 67 A. D. things came to such a pass that the war began in earnest. Cestius Gallus, the governor of Syria, was appealed to, and marched quite a large army from Antioch to Jerusalem to put down those who had rebelled against the government. A great conflict ensued. As the Roman army came within a few miles of the city, the multitudes assembled there at the feast, seized their arms on the Sabbath day, and rushed upon the Romans with such vigor that over five hundred of them were slain. But after severe fighting, Cestius drove them back and laid siege to the city, shutting up the Jews within its walls.

Then was fulfilled the prediction of Christ: "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." No such event had occurred from the time Jesus spoke these words in A. D. 31, till now. But the disciples had been no doubt intently watching for this special signal. But how could they flee from the city, if it was closely beleaguered by a besieging army? Here we see the foreknowledge of our Saviour and his special care for his people. In order for his words to prove true, there must be an opportunity for his disciples to escape. Cestius for a few days made vigorous efforts to capture the city, making assault after assault, till the courage of the mob within began to give way, and the better class—the peaceably inclined—hoped the war would terminate.

The latter class even sought to open the gates to the Romans, and Josephus says had Cestius continued the siege a little longer, he "had certainly taken the city, but it was, I suppose, owing to the aversion God had already at the city and the sanctuary, that he was hindered from putting an end to the war that very day. It then happened that Cestius was not conscious either how the besieged despaired of success, nor how courageous the people were for him; and so he recalled his soldiers from the place, and by despairing of any expectation of taking it, without having received any disgrace, he retired from the city without any reason in the world."—"Wars of the Jews," book 2, chap. 19, sec. 6, 7.

The insurgents were greatly emboldened by this move, and harassed his retreat, till he had retired to his own province. The rebels then gained possession of the country, and made all preparation for the return of the Romans. Months elapsed before the larger army of Vespasian and his son Titus returned to the attack and finally took Jerusalem. But the intervening period was a time of commotion and preparation for war. The Jews seemed maddened with fury. Warlike operations against cities and castles were in progress, and the peaceably inclined were in great distress. The great mass of the Jews were eager to fight against the Romans.

Our Saviour's sign was well understood by his disciples, and every one of them left the city. Indeed, Josephus says, "After this calamity had befallen Cestius, many of the most eminent of the Jews swam away from the city as from a ship when it was going to sink."—"Wars of the Jews," book 2, chap. 20, sec. 1. The Christians were commanded to "flee to the mountains." They fled to the city of Pella, in the mountains of Gilead some sixty miles distant, where they were hidden away from the turbulent scenes of strife and carnage during which Jerusalem was destroyed, and the Jewish people carried away captive. Not a single Christian was in Jerusalem when it was besieged.

(See McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia, art., Pella.) Here we see the literal fulfillment of our Saviour's words. The sign which he gave them proved to be most valuable, resulting in the escape of every Christian. Pella at that time was quite a city, situated on a plateau 1,000 feet above the level of the Jordan plain. It lay in a little "nook" in the mountains, and the writer above describes it "as if it had been providentially intended by anticipation" as "the hiding-place of the Lord's people." Here supplied with excellent water from a "copious fountain," the disciples of the Lord dwelt safely for a long time, preserved by the directions of our Saviour, given nearly forty years beforehand and most literally fulfilled. So will his disciples in the last days be preserved from the greater calamities connected with the "end of the world," if they will as carefully heed the signs given in the same great prophecy.

OUR ELEMENT OF STRENGTH.

THE commission of Christ to the apostles was to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. It was not a wholesale work, but a personal work. It was to preach the gospel to each separate individual. The gospel of Christ is a system of truths. It embraces all things whatsoever the Saviour commanded. Compare Matt. 28:20 with Mark 16:15.

In Christ was the gospel in all its fullness; in his life was salvation, because in his life was every principle of the gospel. His teachings were simply what he lived, and therefore the words he spoke were no more the words of the Father than the acts he performed were works of the Father. "Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? The words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself: but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me: or else believe me for the very work's sake." John 14:10, 11. (See also chapters 10:37, 38; 5:36.)

We are to follow Christ; for he is the light of the world, and the light that shines from Christ, which is only the rays of the gospel, proceeds from his life. (See John 8:12; 1:4, 9.) The work of the minister of Jesus Christ is to present the gospel in all its fullness. When Christ is presented to the sinner, and his imputed righteousness is received by him, the work of the minister is but just begun. They are to see that the believers continue in the faith, grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel. They are to be enlightened by the minister into all the principles and every practical duty that is revealed in the gospel. The apostle says, "I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you to fulfill the word [margin, fully to preach] the word of God;" that is, to preach the word of God fully. This word is found exemplified in the life of Christ and in his teachings. He then proceeds to say, "To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery [gospel] among the Gentiles; which is Christ in you, the hope of glory." Then to have Christ in us, the hope of glory, is to receive the gospel, and to receive the gospel or to receive the word, is to receive Christ.

"My words," said Christ, "are spirit, and they are life." Again the apostle continued, "whom we preach, warning every man;" that is, it was a personal work. And again in other words, he says, "Teaching every man in all wisdom;" that is, wisdom in all things that are found in the gospel, "that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus: whereunto I also labor, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily." The perfection which the apostle here refers to, and which he thought was so important that his whole soul was stirred up to accomplish it in all who embraced Christ, was not only that they should believe in Christ as the Saviour, but that they should be established upon every point of doctrine that is drawn out from the life of Christ.

We are saved by grace. It is not of ourselves, but it is the gift of God. We are not saved by works, "lest any man should boast;" but we should never forget that when Christ is received in our hearts, "we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." What are these good works?—They are the works of the gospel that are seen exemplified in the life of Christ, and taught by him. Cannot men believe in Christ, and not be acquainted with these good works? Is it not as important that every good work be brought out by the gospel minister, and that the mind of the believer be enlightened by them, as it is to accept Christ as a Saviour? Is not this what the apostle meant when he said: "Warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus"? It is true that we as a people have turned our attention away from Christ altogether too much, and in laying stress upon works, to a certain extent we have hidden Christ, and it is no marvel that this is so, when we consider on the other hand how people hold up Christ without considering the importance of works. But one may say, "Will we not work if we have Christ in the heart?—Most assuredly we will; but will simply accepting Christ, enlighten the mind so that the individual can understand everything without its being taught him? If so, why need we present the Sabbath to individuals? It is an important and essential truth; it is the seal of the living God.

It is the business of the minister to present the gospel in all its fullness. It is the message that we have to give to the world. It is Christ in us the hope of glory. It is his gospel as a perfect system.

In speaking of the gospel, the apostle said: "I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Gal. 1:12. The apostle saw it all in Christ, and drew his light, all his instruction upon church organization and first-day offerings, from Christ's life and teachings.

One great mistake that has been made is that we preach the theory first, and then preach Christ on the end of it. It should be Christ, and the theory drawn out of him, or from him. If Christ does not touch the heart, and is not taken in the soul, the theory becomes a dry form; but when he is accepted fully, and the heart becomes changed and made tender by his Holy Spirit, the rest of the practical duties become exceedingly precious to the individual. It is then, when the conscience is tender, and when they can see beauty in Christ, that the minister should teach those practical duties and truths that will be woven into the character, and make the individual and the people strong in God. Our element of strength lies in the gospel of Christ in all its fullness.

ARE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS EVANGELICAL?

It is a common charge made against Seventh-day Adventists that they are not "evangelical." If the various creeds and confessions of faith of the so-called evangelical churches, which are constantly changing and undergoing repairs at the hands of "revision committees," are to be taken as the standard of evangelical doctrine, then we frankly confess that we are not evangelical. But if the standard of evangelical doctrine is to be drawn from the Scriptures; if God's word and his word alone, is to be the rule by which doctrines are to be tested, then we have no hesitation in saying that the doctrine of the Seventh-day Adventists is the purest evangelical doctrine that has been preached since the church emerged from the darkness of papal errors and superstition.

The word "evangelical" is defined by Webster

The Review and Herald.

IN THE QUESTION CHAIR.

[We aim to reply under this head, to questions which are of such a nature that the answers will be of general interest and profit to the readers of the Review. Those sending in long lists of disconnected texts for explanation, evidently as a mere matter of curiosity to see how certain puzzling passages will be disposed of, need not be surprised if no notice is taken of them. Many more inquiries are received than can be answered in this department; and the editor reserves the right to decide which to notice in this manner. All correspondents should therefore give their names and true post-office address, that queries not replied to here may be answered by mail.]

165.—CANNOT BELIEVE.

Since the age of eight years I have been an unbeliever in the Bible. I would believe and be saved if I could. How can I believe that which I cannot?
E. H. B.

Answer.—From the early age at which our friend, E. H. B., says that he came to be a disbeliever in the Bible, we apprehend that he imbibed at that age ideas in regard to which he was not qualified to judge, and has let those ideas control his mind without serious and more mature investigation since that time. But the age of eight years is not a safe age at which to decide so important questions. Every one who intelligently rejects the Bible, has in his own mind considerations which seem to him good and sufficient grounds on which to reject its testimony. Such an one, if he sincerely desires to know the truth, can be pointed to facts and evidences which will answer all his objections. But if he is like those to whom Christ said, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life," or those who, he said, chose to walk in darkness rather than light, then nothing can be done for him till he shall become willing to see the light. The answer to the question, then, "How can one believe what he cannot believe?" will depend on what is the cause of the unbelief. If it is because one will not believe, he must surrender that will. If it is because he is honestly laboring under a misapprehension of the facts in the case, abundant evidence can be produced to show that the Scriptures are genuine and authentic—from which it follows that Christ was what he claimed to be, the divine Son of God, the Redeemer of men, and the one through whose name alone we can be saved.

166.—THE LORD OF THE SABBATH. MARK 2:27, 28.

In a recent discourse, the following positions were taken on the Sabbath question: 1. That the word "also" in Mark 2:28 "implies that man is lord of the Sabbath." Is man in any sense lord of the Sabbath? 2. That the Sabbath was given to man as "a keepsake, like the photograph of a friend." If so, are not all the commandments keepsakes as well? 3. That the word "whosoever" in Ex. 31:14, is as broad in its application as the same word in John 3:16. Is such a construction admissible?
D. H.

Ans.—1. The word "also" is not a necessary translation of the word used in Mark 2:28, and is objectionable inasmuch as it gives occasion for a wrong inference, as stated above. The word is the very common one which usually signifies, and is translated, "and;" and the passage might be translated just as literally and accurately thus: "And therefore the Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath." This statement rests for its reason on the preceding verse, which reads: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." Now did the fact that the Sabbath was made for man, make man the lord of the Sabbath?—Not at all; for it may be said of all the other commandments of the decalogue that they were made for man and not man for them; but that does not make man lord of them, nor give him any authority over them; it shows, instead, that they were designed for his good; they are for his benefit. How, then, is it incumbent on him to use them?—He should use them in a way that will promote his best welfare; and that would be, of course, to keep them. Man's welfare would not be promoted by breaking either the Sabbath, or any other of the commandments. The passage therefore shows man's obligation to the Sabbath, but gives him no jurisdiction over it.

It does, however, show a very different relation existing between it and the Son of man; for Christ, as the Son of man, appeared in this world as the Redeemer of man. He is, therefore, the one who made man, and all that was for man's good; and he made the Sabbath; for "without him was not anything made that was made;" and the Sabbath "was made." The maker and author of an institution, on whose authority it rests, is its lord; and the claim of Christ to be the Lord of the Sabbath, so far as this passage is concerned, rests wholly upon the fact that he made it. But man, of course, can institute no such plea, and hence can be in no sense the lord of the Sabbath.

2. The Sabbath is God's great memorial. It is not a photograph, but an institution; and a memorial institution can fulfill its purpose only by being observed.

3. Ex. 31:14 was spoken to the children of Israel from the standpoint of their civil law under the theocracy. The literal penalty of death was not inflicted for the violation of the Sabbath, or of any other of the commandments, except under that arrangement; but it was inflicted for the violation of all the other commandments as well as the Sabbath, while the theocracy lasted. The same principle, however, holds in the moral government of God, and all who break his commandments will finally be cut off from the land of the living. So while Ex. 31:14 may be confined to the Israelites under their civil law, the principle has a universal application under God's moral law.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

GOD'S JUDGMENTS UPON JERUSALEM AND THE JEWS.

Soon after the escape of the disciples to Pella, the Romans gathered their forces for the final overthrow of the rebellion. The emperor Nero intrusted the command of the army to Vespasian, a commander of great ability and experience. His son Titus was next in authority. After various sieges of different cities, Nero died, and the soldiers proclaimed Vespasian emperor in his stead. Other claimants were also in the field, but within a few months Vespasian overcame them all, and had dominion over the whole Roman empire. Titus became the commander of the forces acting against the Jews, and marched to Jerusalem and besieged it. The city was wholly shut up, so that none could get in or out, Titus having built a wall around it. The greatest suffering ensued, multitudes perishing with famine, till even mothers ate their own children.

Vast numbers of the Jews were in the city, having assembled from all parts of the country to attend the feast of unleavened bread. This fact added greatly to the numbers exposed to destruction. After the siege had continued many months, the city was taken, and the temple burned to ashes, though Titus sought to save it, making strenuous efforts to do so, but in vain. Its destruction occurred on the very same day of the same month—the tenth day of the Jewish month Ab—on which it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar.

Josephus, in his treatise, "The Wars of the Jews," has given a particular account of the calamities which befell that people. He declares that 1,100,000 perished in the siege, while multitudes were led away captive to grace the triumph of Titus, the Roman general. His triumphal arch is still standing in Rome, and sculptured upon it is the golden candlestick of seven branches, with other articles of the sacred furniture of the temple, which were carried by him in his triumphal march, upon his return to Rome. That arch is a standing monument of the truthfulness of the Bible history, which skeptics can never gainsay.

Little did the Jews realize, when Pilate pleaded with them to spare the innocent Son of God, and they said, "His blood be upon us, and on our children," the fearful consequences thus invoked. Truly the king "was wroth; and he sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burned up their city." Matt. 22:7. The site of Jerusalem became a complete desolation, every building being leveled to the ground, so that Josephus declares, "No one visiting it would believe it was ever inhabited." And the Talmudists say that Terentius Rufus, the commander of the forces left by Titus to guard the ruins, "plowed up Zion as a field, and made Jerusalem become as heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of a forest," as foretold in Micah 3:12. (See "Wars of the Jews," book 7, chap. 2, note.)

How wonderfully the words of Christ have been fulfilled. "And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Luke 21:24. More than eighteen centuries have passed, and the "times of the Gentiles" are fast drawing to their close, as "the sure word of prophecy" makes evident, yet the Jews have never had permanent possession of their historic city. After lying desolate for a period, the Romans built a city there and called it Ælia Capitolina. The ancient name was lost to the world for ages. A temple to Jupiter was erected on Mt. Zion. It was to all intents a Gentile city.

In a great revolt led by the robber Bar-cocheba, a pretended messiah, in A. D. 131, the Jews gathered from various countries to Palestine in great numbers, and held it for a very brief period, but were put down by the Emperor Adrian with great slaughter, and multitudes were slain. It was held by the Romans for several centuries, till captured by Chosroes, king of Persia, in 614. Fourteen years later the Romans received possession and held it till 637, when the fanatical Mohammedan Arabs conquered it, retaining it till 1076, when the Turks seized it. They held it twenty years, when the Saracens again obtained possession. The papal Crusaders conquered it in 1098, and held it till 1187, when the great Saladin, sultan of Egypt, drove them out. The Crusaders obtained it by treaty in 1224, for only ten years, when the Turks once more captured it. With the exception of a few months' possession by the Catholic Crusaders, it has been under the dominion of the "unspeakable Turk" ever since. Thus has it been "trodden down" and "desolate" during all these long ages—a living testimony of the prescience of Jesus the great Prophet.

We can but briefly notice the calamities of the Jewish nation. The "wrath upon this people" has been heavy and terrible. It has been only during the present century that some relief has been experienced. According to the statistics gathered by Mr. Taylor in "The Great Consummation," from a large number of historians, many millions of that people, in the aggregate, have been put to death during the intervening centuries. Josephus states the number at the destruction of Jerusalem to be 1,100,000. Newton estimates that over 250,000 perished in the war previous to that time, while 97,000 captives were sold as slaves, and treated with the greatest cruelty. It seems probable that not less than 2,000,000 Jews perished in the great revolt during which Jerusalem was destroyed.

In the revolt under the false christ Bar-cocheba, in 131, about 600,000 were destroyed. Eusebius and Jerome declare that Adrian destroyed without mercy an "incredible number," "myriads of men, women, and children in crowds." "Mede declares the number who perished could not be found out. He quotes two ancient Jewish writers as declaring that neither Nebuchadnezzar nor Titus had afflicted the nation as did Adrian, who they say slaughtered in this war more than twice as many Jews as came out of Egypt."—Mede's works, book 3, page 443, as quoted by Taylor.

During all the ages following, till the present century, the most dire calamities have been the portion of the Jewish people. If the reader will take time to read the vivid description of the judgments foretold by Moses, recorded in Deuteronomy 28, which should fall upon this people, if they were unfaithful to the great light bestowed upon them, he will find the history of the centuries following Christ's great prophecy but a lucid commentary upon Moses's words. They were scattered to all the nations of the earth, and everywhere met with barbarous, cruel treatment. In so-called Christian lands they were hated by the bigoted Catholics of the Roman and Greek churches, and oppressed beyond measure. The Mohammedans regarded them with but little more favor. And they were never popular in heathen lands, as their presence was a constant rebuke to their idolatry. They were scarcely tolerated in many countries, and barely permitted to live among the nations of the earth. Occasions constantly arose when multitudes had their goods confiscated, and many were put to the sword or burned alive. Sanguinary persecutions constantly occurred. They were robbed and maltreated in every way imaginable. The word "Jew" became a by-word, a hissing, and reproach to the ends of the earth. So it has been during all these centuries.

Yet they have continued to exist among all the nations of the earth as a standing evidence of the truthfulness of Bible history, and as vivid reminders of the terrible effects of rejecting light. Their history demonstrates the correctness of our Saviour's prophecy. It could not have a clearer fulfillment.

During the last century, in many countries their disabilities have been removed, and they have produced many eminent men in the sciences, in wealth, and as statesmen. The vigor of the race is wonderful. No other nation of antiquity has remained in existence under such direful circumstances as those they have passed through. The great nations which oppressed them in ancient times are no more. But Jacob's descendants still live and thrive in every land under heaven. In Russia and some other countries they are still terribly persecuted. But the most civilized nations of the earth give them the same rights as other men enjoy. May we not hope that some of them, in this age of greater light and humanity may yet recognize the Man of Nazareth before his second coming, and be rescued from the blindness and darkness of their ancestors who rejected him?

THE NEW ROMANISM.

In remitting the usual rigors of abstinence during Lent on account of the prevailing epidemic, the pope declares that "the frequent evils by which we are afflicted are the doing of divine justice, which on account of corrupted morals and the awful prevalence of crime, is demanding religious punishments from man."

If the influenza is a divine judgment upon the earth because of the prevalence of crime, as the pope declares it to be, we can see in this fact, if fact it be, no reason why any one should cease his especial acts of devotion. On the contrary, there appears to be a greater necessity that these particular religious acts should be practiced with more faithfulness than they were before.

The expressions "divine justice" and "demanding religious punishments from man," are very suggestive of those days, which fortunately for the world have passed away, when the pope himself, or through his subordinates who were bound to do his bidding, administered "divine justice" in "religious punishments" to those who refused to accept him as the vicegerent of Christ and God upon earth.

Owing to the lack of knowledge of sanitary rules, and consequently of the prolific causes of disease, plagues during the Middle Ages were of frequent occurrence; and they were generally considered by the pope and the priests to be visitations from God, on account of the sins of the Waldenses, or some other body of humble Christians, who refused to accept the dogma of papal sovereignty over the church. Then the pestilence, famine, or whatever calamity it might be, was taken as an evidence of "divine justice" because they were allowing these people to live, and so the pope in order to accelerate "divine justice" and to clear the church from condemnation, goaded on some king or duke who held his possessions by the pope's sufferance, to bring upon these innocent people a visitation of "divine justice" (?) by dragooning them out of the country, and confiscating their property for the benefit of the Church and State. The thought never appears to have occurred to the infallible head of the infallible church that any plague might be a visitation of divine wrath on account of their sins. The assumption by a mortal man of the title of "Vicegerent of Christ and God upon earth," which to every well instructed person is indescribably shocking, was not so shocking to them as it was to deny it. Nor did they realize that a pestilence might arise from the physical habits of the people. So self-righteousness and prejudice on one hand, and ignorance on the other, laid all the responsibility for these public calamities upon the "heretics," and thus it became the bounden duty of all believers in the authority of "the church" to hurry them out of the land in the most expeditious manner possible.

These days of papal dogma and persecution are happily for the human race in the past; the spirit which inspired such actions no doubt survives, but the power has been taken away. In the above we do not accuse all Catholics of being guilty of such actions. They were greatly under the influence and control of the priests, and they lived in an ignorant and superstitious age; yet many of them were better than their creeds, and the lives of thousands of so-called heretics were saved through the Christ-like generosity of liberal-minded Catholics.

It is very remarkable, to say the least, at this time when the folly and wickedness of such mistaken conduct is quite generally recognized and deplored, that there should arise in this country, in which it was fondly hoped that liberty should be proclaimed "throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof," a religio-political party, claiming the recognition and support of the people on the ground of a reformation they hope to inaugurate, which in its spirit and methods imitates and justifies the cruelties of Rome. We allude to the National Reform Party, which appears to have imbibed to the full the Roman Catholic idea of a religious sovereignty and the infliction of "divine justice" by human hands as a punishment for acts which they hold to be irreligious! They have a faculty of accounting for all public calamities on the ground of the nation's refusal to accept their theory of government that smacks strongly of its papal origin. As strenuously as the Catholic Church held that national calamities were on account of their toleration of heretics who rejected the supremacy of the pope, do these modern Romanists maintain that our disasters are inflicted upon us for our failure to recognize God in the national Constitution, and because Sunday is not universally observed. Disasters by land and sea are traced by them to this cause, and judging by the spirit which some of them manifest toward those who keep the seventh day, and who work on Sunday, and the heartless manner in which they have referred to the arrest and imprisonment of the late R. M. King, we are justified in concluding that they are anxious to take upon themselves the work of being the dispensers of "divine justice."

We question the position of the Catholic Church as to its apostolic succession, but the succession of the National Reformers to the spirit and methods of the Catholic Church, no man can deny. Their published works are full of the spirit of "high popery," and in the few instances where their theories of government have borne their logical fruit of persecution, they have manifested an indifference to the claims of religious liberty, a callousness to the sufferings of innocence, and a relish for persecution so keen, that it is apparent that if these zealous religionists could have their own way, the establishment of an American inquisition would be an event not far in the future.

Those who are engaged in this work may really believe that the success of their project will be for the benefit of the country, but their honesty of purpose would not make the effect of their work any the less disastrous. Many of the most cruel actions recorded in history have been performed by men to whom we are compelled to grant honesty of intention; yet it is evident that men ought to learn something from the history and experience of others; and this has fully shown that any restrictions upon religious liberty are deplorable, and inevitably lead to most disastrous results. And as the principles of this party rise or fall in this country, so will the principles of religious liberty rise and fall; and so necessary is the maintenance of the principles of religious liberty for the perpetuation of a free country, that the failure of one must be the signal for the downfall of the other.

Of another thing we may also be certain: If the people of this country turn the hands upon the dial of religious liberty back one degree, the watchful and despotic powers of the Old World will turn them back ten. The success of the principles of this party, under their present, or any other name, is therefore fraught with great danger, not only to the people of this country, but also to every country where America is known, and her influence is felt. And we greatly fear that our statesmen, who should be on the alert to detect and thwart every encroachment upon our liberties, will be so engrossed in their partizan work, and our business men will be so eagerly engaged in the acquisition of wealth, that they will not discover the insidious advances of this dangerous foe to liberty, until it will have gained a vantage ground from which it will be able to strike a deadly blow to religious liberty; and "divine justice" will be pronounced and inflicted, as in the days of Roman supremacy, by men, in whom are all the failings and weaknesses that are common to mankind. M. E. K.

FIRST-DAY OFFERINGS.

QUESTIONS have arisen in the minds of some of our brethren, since the subject of applying first-day offerings to foreign missions has been agitated, regarding the correctness of the application of 1 Cor. 16:2. While this money was taken to Jerusalem for the poor saints, it is supposed that it was merely local in its use, consequently the requirement of laying it aside was local. Or if that requirement was not local, it should be used exclusively for the poor. Consequently, to enjoin this upon the church at this time for the foreign missionary work is not consistent with the intent of the apostle. The more we have examined the subject, the more thoroughly we have become convinced that this arrangement was not only to meet the existing wants at Jerusalem at that time, but in this matter the Spirit of God designed it for our instruction to be used as it is recommended at the present day.

It is shown in the book of readings on the first-day offerings, and also in articles which have appeared in the REVIEW, that indirectly these offerings at Jerusalem contributed to the gospel going to the Gentiles; that is, the Grecian widows at Jerusalem were among those who received benefit from them, and also one of the seven deacons was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch. Acts 6:1-5. It was men should pay, etc. Hence he could vary prices and favor the debtors of his Lord just as he might be disposed to do. In the parable, when the steward found he was to be deprived of his stewardship, he availed himself of his power in this respect, and made reductions in his charges to different ones, so bringing them under obligation to himself. His wrong lay not in transcending his power, as steward, but in not making full returns to his lord, but wasting the property for his own gratification. The way he devised to get out of his difficulty showed great shrewdness and foresight. For by having the debtors rewrite their bills at reduced rates, it would be made to appear that the land had not produced so much as it had, and therefore he would be able to cover up to a great degree his own extravagance. Secondly, this would be something of a basis for the future steward to act upon in renting the estate; and so the tenants would be likely to get reduced rates for years to come, and thus would be under continual obligation to the former steward. And by consenting to the plan, they placed themselves where they could not turn against him without exposing themselves. Thus he was making the matter very safe and far reaching for himself. His lord commended him for acting wisely. This does not mean that his lord approved of his course in reference to himself; for it was for just such things that he was to be turned out of his stewardship. But he commended or acknowledged his foresight and prudence from his own standpoint, just as men nowadays sometimes admire a brilliant and talented transaction, in itself considered, although it may be performed for a wrong end. The parable is to show that the children of this world are wiser in their generations than the children of light. That is, that the people of this world manifest more earnestness and foresight in providing for their own worldly interests, than the children of God manifest in providing for their heavenly interests. And the lesson is, that we should so use our stewardship in worldly things ("the mammon of unrighteousness") in helping forward the cause of Christ, as to make friends of those who will be able by and by to receive us into everlasting habitations.

171.—DOES GOD CREATE EVIL? ISA. 45:7.

Please explain Isa. 45:7, which reads: "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." Does God create evil? G. C. H.

Ans.—Mark the antithesis brought to view in the text, between the evil which God is said to create, and that which is contrasted with it. "I make peace, and create evil." The evil which God creates is contrasted with peace. And what is the antithesis of peace?—It is war and destruction. God has often created evil of this kind when it became necessary to punish sinners or to chastise his people. (See Amos 3:6.)

172.—TILL THE SON OF MAN BECOME. MATT. 10:23.

This text reads, "Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come." What is meant by the "coming" here brought to view? W. H. W.

Ans.—It doubtless means the opening revelation of himself to the people as the Messiah, whom they were to proclaim. The disciples would not have completed their visits to all the cities of Israel, proclaiming the coming of the Messiah, before he would follow after them, revealing himself to the people as the Messiah whom they had heralded. Paul, in Acts 13:24, uses the word "come" in the same sense, and in reference to the same event.

173.—THE TWO EVENINGS.

Please harmonize John 20:1, and verse 19 of the same chapter. J. L. H.

Ans.—The difficulty of our correspondent we presume to be this: how there could be an evening at the close of the first day of the week, when the day begins with an evening. It is explained by the fact that there were two evenings to each day, the first, or principal evening, that with which the day began, commencing at sunset, and embracing all the dark part of the day till the following morning; the second, or later evening commencing at about three o'clock in the afternoon, and ending at sunset. It is this latter evening, toward the close of the day, which is referred to in John 20:19.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

THE ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.

"WHEN ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand)." To what does our Saviour refer when he speaks of the "abomination of desolation," and what was his standing in the holy place? It has generally been admitted by leading commentators, that by this language Jesus refers to the Roman army with its idolatrous ensigns, coming into close proximity to the temple, upon the ground considered holy by all the Jewish nation. When this should be done, the disciples were to understand the signal he had given them was fulfilled, and as soon as possible, they were to flee away to some retired place, and so escape the dire calamities about to come upon the Jewish nation and their city.

But in "The Great Consummation," Mr. Taylor gives a lengthy argument to prove this is a misapplication of the Saviour's words. He endeavors to show that the term "the abomination of desolation," spoken of by the prophet Daniel, is the papacy, and the standing in the holy place was the spreading of its baleful influence over the Christian church for so many ages, this being the cause of the "great tribulation" upon the church, which continued nearly twelve hundred and sixty years. His arguments are certainly able and ingenious, yet hardly convincing. To get the proper meaning of Scripture, it is most important to consider the connection as well as to bring together parallel scriptures—those treating on the same point. When these are all compared, and their proper relation to the subject considered, and the whole testimony bearing upon the point weighed carefully, then an intelligent result can be obtained.

Let us notice the testimony of the three evangelists, bearing on this point: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand), then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains: let him which is on the housetop not come down to take anything out of his house; neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." Matt. 24:15-20. "But when ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not (let him that readeth understand), then let them that be in Judea flee to the mountains: and let him that is on the housetop not go down into the house, neither enter therein, to take anything out of his house: and let him that is in the field not turn back again for to take up his garment. But woe to them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days. And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter." Mark 13:14-19. "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains: and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck, in those days! For there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Luke 21:20-24.

That our Saviour had the same circumstances in his mind, and that the record in each instance refers to precisely the same period, siege, and flight, seems self-evident from the language. It would seem a wresting of our Lord's words to apply them to events utterly dissimilar and centuries apart.

What was the Lord's object in speaking these things, telling the place where they would be fulfilled, and the nature of the event to take place?—Manifestly his object was to give directions so that his disciples might escape from the terrible sufferings impending over the Jewish nation when Jerusalem should be besieged, and that people killed and enslaved. The scene is laid in Judea. Each evangelist mentions that fact. All the disciples were to escape from it to a place of safety in distant mountains. Those out of it were not to enter the country. Most certainly our Lord was not speaking of Gentile countries, many of them a thousand miles away, nor false doctrines they were to reject. Their literal, personal safety by flight from scenes of carnage is his theme.

The flight is to occur when some sudden signal is given, and it is to be very hasty. They were not even to spend time to hunt up and carry away valuables. Great distress would happen to the feeble so they could not flee at once, especially if this flight should occur in the winter season. It was such a flight as would not be suitable for the Sabbath day. Our Saviour here recognizes the seventh-day Sabbath as not only existing in the year A. D. 70,—thirty-nine years after some tell us it was abolished and another day substituted for it,—but he shows a deep regard for it, and a special desire that his Christian disciples should do nothing inconsistent with its holiness. They were commanded to pray all these thirty-nine years from the time he spoke these words till their flight should occur, that providence would so order it that they need not violate the Sabbath in order to escape. These are evidently his reasons for giving these directions; and not as some suppose, because the Jews would persecute them. For we have already seen in a previous article, how little the Jews regarded the Sabbath at that time, when they attacked the Romans on that day, without any necessity for so doing.

The signal to be given, to notify them when to flee in order to make their escape, was to be manifest but once. They were to wait for it to appear, and fly at once when it was seen. Such a signal was given when Cestius Gallus with the Roman army besieged Jerusalem, previous to the final siege of Titus. A little space of time between the two sieges intervened, sufficient for all of the disciples to get away in safety, so as Eusebius informs us, not a single Christian was destroyed in the terrible judgments which befell the Jewish nation. The fact that the disciples understood this to be the signal for fleeing, is itself strong evidence of its being the one intended by the Saviour. It was the only one then given. It was one that must be given some little time previous to the actual siege, or they could not have got away; for once inclosed in the city by the wall built by Titus, no escape was possible.

The signal is spoken of by two different expressions, "the abomination of desolation," standing "in the holy place" (Matthew), or, "where it ought not" (Mark), or, "Jerusalem compassed with armies" (Luke). Then they were to seek safety either by flying to the mountains, or not entering the country. They were to know the time had come for God's judgments to fall upon the Jews. Our Saviour's language following his statement of what the siege or signal was, as given by each evangelist, is applicable alone to the disciples just before Jerusalem was destroyed. It will not fit if applied to the papacy hundreds of years after.

If "the abomination of desolation," standing "in the holy place," be the same as "he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God" (2 Thess. 2:4) as the work under notice supposes, then it must have been a prophecy in process of fulfillment for more than a thousand years; for the papacy has held such a position in the so-called church of God for ages. Then it ceases to be any sudden signal for the flight of the disciples to a place of safety. Yea, our Saviour's language following would be wholly out of place. It would have very little application to Judea or Jerusalem; for during much of the time of the papacy's supremacy, we may well question whether there were any true disciples there to flee. It was under Mohammedan domination. In view of the necessity of sudden flight, our Saviour says, "Woe unto them with child," or nursing small children. Could that be applicable for the space of twelve hundred and sixty years, while papal supremacy continued? Such a position would evidently do violence to our Saviour's words.

We are shut up therefore to the position that "the abomination of desolation" standing "in the holy place" must have occurred just before Jerusalem was destroyed, the signal for the sudden flight of the disciples. The development of the papacy by the slow and gradual adoption of false doctrines and backsliding from the truths of the gospel, was no sudden signal for flight. No personal flight to a place of safety from it was contemplated by the Saviour, for its poisonous influences were extant through Christendom. The disciples were warned against its errors in many places, but were never told to flee to the mountains to escape it; for the mountains were exposed to such influences as much as the land country. In referring to "the abomination of desolation," spoken of by Daniel the prophet, our Saviour manifestly has in view that prophet's words as recorded in chapter 9:26, 27, when speaking concerning the last of the seventy weeks cut off upon the Jewish nation. He says: "And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate [margin, desolator]."

Messiah was "cut off" when crucified A. D. 31, "not for himself" but for a lost world. "The people of the prince that shall come [and] shall destroy the city and the sanctuary" was the Roman army under Titus, afterward emperor. "Desolations" were not only "determined," but terribly fulfilled. It was the Messiah who confirmed "the covenant" with many disciples during the last of the seventy weeks, which terminated in the autumn of A. D. 34, his crucifixion in the spring of A. D. 31, being precisely the middle of the last of the seventy weeks. Then the typical system of types and oblations did indeed "cease" when the great Antitype was offered, and blood of beasts has ever since been efficacious. We prefer the marginal rendering of the clause following ["and upon the battlements shall be the idols of the desolator," margin], i. e., the idol banners of the Roman army should float on the battlements of the city. This desolation should continue till the "desolator" himself should receive his doom in the great "consummation," or as our Saviour expresses it, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." That this desolating power which has done such an abominable work of destruction, hypocrisy, deception, corruption, and persecution, was the power of Rome which spread its idol banners upon ground once consecrated, none can deny; that our Saviour had this desolating work foretold by Daniel, in mind when giving the disciples the divinely appointed signal for flight from the ruin about to follow, is most evident; that he might properly term it "the abomination of desolation," in view of the desolating work it was about to perform, seems reasonable. It is freely admitted, as Mr. Taylor holds, that that term is used by the prophet Daniel in other places specially to refer to the last great development of the Roman power—the papacy—when contrasted with the pagan development which is specifically named the "daily," or continual desolation. Dan. 12:11, etc. But our Saviour was only speaking of Rome in general when giving this sign to his disciples.

That the Roman ensigns were worshiped, is well known. Tertullian says "that the entire religion of the Roman camp almost consisted in worshiping the ensigns, in swearing by the ensigns, and in preferring the ensigns before all the (other) gods."—Josephus, "Wars of the Jews," book 6, sec. 1, note. The very attack of Cestius Gallus was upon the temple itself, considered the most sacred of any place in the nation. He came near breaking down the gates and burning the whole edifice.—"Wars of the Jews," book 2, chap. 19, sec. 5. This attack, as we have seen, was the actual signal of flight our Lord gave the disciples. They all left the city as soon as he retired. His retiring was a great mystery to Josephus and the Jews. But Mr. Whiston, the editor of his works, clearly saw the reason of it as we do. He gives the following note: "There may another very important and very providential reason be here assigned for this strange and foolish retreat of Cestius; which, if Josephus had been a Christian, he might probably have taken notice of also: and that is the affording the Jewish Christians in the city an opportunity of calling to mind the prediction and caution given them by Christ about thirty-three years and a half before that, when they should 'see the abomination of desolation' (the idolatrous Roman armies with the images of their idols in their ensigns ready to lay Jerusalem desolate), stand where it ought not, or 'in the holy place,' or when they should 'see Jerusalem compassed with armies,' they should then 'flee to the mountains;' by complying with which those Jewish Christians fled to the mountains of Perea and escaped this destruction. Nor was there perhaps any one instance of a more impolitic but more providential conduct than this retreat of Cestius visible during the whole siege of Jerusalem."—"Wars of the Jews," book 2, chap. 9, sec. 6, note.

This exegesis of our Saviour's words of warning to his disciples is consistent with all the facts, harmonious with the circumstances, and every way reasonable and uncontradictory. It is evidently the truth, and an excellent evidence of the supernatural character of the great prophet.

CANNOT AGREE.

It was said of the witnesses against Christ, "But their witness agreed not together." We are forcibly reminded of these words, as we notice the contradictory positions taken by prominent religious teachers in regard to the law of God.

Dr. Lyman Abbott, editor of the Christian Union, and pastor of "Plymouth Church," has had much to say lately about the law of the ten commandments. He thinks it a very faulty law. According to his ideas of the ten commandments; any one might keep every one of them and still be unfit to mingle in good society in New York City.

Whether or not he makes this statement because he thinks the society there better or worse than it is in the rest of the country, we do not know; but presume it is because he thinks it is better. In that case we shall expect that he will take the position that the law of God may still serve a good purpose among the ignorant country rustics, but that it is not calculated for the latitude of New York, especially in their good society, the members of which are living far better than the law of God requires them to live. We willingly allow the doctor the privilege of enjoying his good opinion of the metropolis, only remarking that if New York society has reached that high standard in religious and society experience that it has no gods, not even of wealth, fashion, or pleasure, before the true God, then it has advanced much farther than the current newspaper reports would warrant us in believing.

Other men, however, do not take so flattering a view of the morals of New York City. Dr. Parkhurst, pastor of the Madison Square Presbyterian church, in a late sermon said:—

"We are living in a wicked world, and are fallen upon bad times. And the question that has been pressed upon my heart these days and weeks past has been, What can I do? We are not thinking just now so much of the world at large as we are the particular part of the world that it is our painful duty to live in. . . . In its municipal life our city is thoroughly rotten. Here is an immense city, reaching out arms of evangelization in every quarter of the globe; and yet every step that we take looking to the moral betterment of this city has to be taken directly in the teeth of the damnable pack of administrative blood-hounds that are fattening themselves on the ethical flesh and blood of our citizenship. There is not a form under which the Devil disguises himself that so perplexes us in our efforts, or so bewilders us in the devising of our schemes, as the polluted harpies, that under the pretense of governing this city, are feeding day and night on its quivering vitals. They are a lying, perjured, rum-soaked, libidinous lot. . . . Every effort to make men respectable, honest, temperate, and sexually clean is a direct blow between the eyes of the mayor and his whole gang of drunken and lecherous subordinates in this sense that while we fight iniquity, they shield and patronize it; while we try to convert criminals, they manufacture them. . . . I should not be surprised to know that every building in this town in which gambling or prostitution or the illicit sale of liquor is carried on, has immunity secured to it by a scale of police taxation. . . . The facts do not always get to the surface, but when they do, they let in a great lot of light into the subterranean mysteries of this rum-besotted and Tammany debauched town.

We will now listen to Dr. Talmage, who, like Dr. Abbott, is a famous Brooklyn, N. Y., preacher:—

"I expect to see a political party with only two planks in its platform, the ten commandments and the Sermon on the Mount."

As he couples the ten commandments with the Sermon on the Mount, it must be that Dr. Talmage considers the ten commandments a good foundation upon which to stand.

But how Dr. Abbott must be shocked by such a statement! We may imagine him rising in consternation at the thought, and exclaiming, "What! stand up for that old obsolete law, so loose in its requirements that those who observe it perfectly are not fit to move in New York society! 'Away with such a fellow from the earth; for it is not fit that he should live.' He will corrupt the nation."

So their witness does not agree. In reference to all of which we would humbly have a word to say: We would remind Dr. Abbott that while it may be true that a commandment-keeper may not be considered worthy of a place in New York society, no one need feel depressed thereby; for we read in the word of God: "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." Rev. 22:14. The humble commandment-keeper may therefore be consoled by the thought that even if he is not considered worthy of a place in New York society, he can enter the city of God, and associate with Jesus and holy angels.

And to Dr. Talmage we would express the wish that he would strengthen his position on the perpetuity of the ten commandments by preaching the authority of the fourth commandment with a scriptural, rather than a church, construction of its scope and meaning; and that he will devote his efforts to impressing the law of God upon the consciences ject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." Rom. 8:7. For the natural man there is therefore no final escape from death. But as regards the two great classes of the righteous and the wicked, there is a great difference in the means by which this death is accomplished. The one class die unto sin; the other class die in sin. In the one case the feelings and desires and affections of the natural heart—which constitute the carnal nature—have been crucified and put to death while the physical man is still alive, through the agency of the Holy Spirit; for "the spirit lusteth against the flesh," and when allowed free access to the heart, will destroy its fleshly instincts. But in the other case the carnal nature has continued to hold possession of the heart, and is destroyed by an agency outside the individual, that agency being the devouring fire which is rained down from God upon the wicked at the great executive judgment. "The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner. Whosoever shall fall upon that stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder." Luke 20:17, 18.

The righteous are, therefore, so far as regards the natural, carnal nature, the life which pertains distinctively to this world, now dead. In this sense they have passed under the dominion of death, in answer to the demand made by the law of God upon them as sinners,—a substitution for that death which the law actually demanded, and which they are enabled to make by virtue of that sacrifice which paid the actual penalty of their transgressions. Christ, as the great sacrifice for sin, became literally dead; his followers, though physically alive, are identified with him, figuratively, in his death. Yet, as we have seen, it is not this present natural life which the righteous gain by means of the death of Christ. So far as concerns the life which is secured by the great work of redemption, this present life is of no more significance than the natural death to which all men are now subject. Both come from Adam, as the inheritance which he has bestowed upon all his children. The righteous man, whether living or dying, belongs to Christ, and is identified in interests with him. He has in his natural life no stronger hold upon life,—that life which Christ will give,—than he has in death. The righteous dead sleep in Christ, while to the righteous living it is said, "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is your life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Col. 3:3, 4. Then, when this glorious appearing shall take place, will be given to all the righteous, whether sleeping or alive, that life which the plan of redemption has brought within their reach. A thousand years later the wicked receive their reward,—the wages of sin,—in the second, eternal death. From the death which comes through Adam's sin they will have been freed by a universal resurrection, and will then receive the penalty of their own sins, in their final, complete extinction.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

THE LEADING THEMES OF OUR LORD'S DISCOURSE, AND AN EXPOSITION OF SEVEN GENERAL STATEMENTS.

HAVING noticed several important points in our Lord's discourse, it is proper to consider the principal subjects to which it is devoted, and some of its general statements. The inquiry of the disciples seemed to call it forth, though that fact affords no proof that the same instruction would not have been given had they not asked those questions. His words and work were ever prompted by divine wisdom. He said nothing that was not needed, and did nothing without a purpose.

The questions in substance as given by Matthew, Mark, and Luke relate to Jerusalem and the Jews, and to his second coming and the safety of his church. There are really two great divisions of it, with sub-divisions concerning subjects related to each. They say, "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" i. e., the Christian age. (See Matt. 24:3, Revised Version, margin, "The completion of the age."—Interlinear translation of the literal Greek.) As the personal coming of Christ marks the close of the Christian age, these two expressions amount to the same thing. So the disciples' question did not relate to three things, but two. Jerusalem being the metropolis of the Jewish nation, its destruction would bring the close of the Jewish polity. The disciples were Jews. They had a deep interest in what concerned the welfare of their people, who had been blessed with special privileges for ages. It was fitting that our Lord should foretell the doom of that nation with whom his earth life had been spent, and all his mighty works performed, and who were about to put him to death. He briefly states the important facts concerning the fate of Jerusalem and the Jews.

But the principal portion of the discourse as we may readily discern by careful examination of the evangelists, relates to the second advent, the signs to precede it, the historical facts to occur during the gospel dispensation, pointing out and identifying the different periods elapsed in the flight of time, showing the comparative nearness of the great event foretold, with various cautions, admonitions, and instruction to the church, revealing the dangers and experiences his disciples would pass through, as the great event became imminent.

Matthew gives by far the most complete outline of this prophecy of any of the gospel writers. He evidently gives a rapid survey of the whole period, from the time when he spoke till the end should come. (See verses 4-14.) He then speaks of the fate of Jerusalem, more particularly informing his disciples how they may escape the awful fate of the Jewish people by fleeing to a place of safety (verses 15-20); then portrays the fearful persecution to overtake his people during the Dark Ages (verses 21, 22); the counterfeit spiritual deceptions of the last days (verses 22-26); and then gives a particular description of the signs showing the near approach of his visible appearing (verse 29), and finally describes his coming itself. Verses 30, 31.

Let us notice briefly his recorded words when he commences to answer the questions of his disciples: "And Jesus answered and said unto them, Take heed that no man deceive you. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many. And ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars: see that ye be not troubled: for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet." Verses 4-6. The leading thought in these verses is a caution to the disciples not to expect "the end" of the gospel age too soon. With this is coupled a special caution against being deceived. Many great events were to happen before "the end" should come. The inference is unavoidable from this language that it would be a long period from the time he spoke till "the end" of the Gentile, or gospel age. This was reasonable; for the Jewish age in which special light and privileges were granted that people, had been some fifteen centuries in duration. Should not the "times of the Gentiles" (Luke 21:24) be at least equally long, when they were so much more numerous and with a territory so much more extended? "The end" our Saviour here mentions and several times refers to in this discourse, must be the one which the disciples inquired about, "What shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the world," or age? Surely "the world" did not end at the destruction of Jerusalem, neither did Christ come then, and history gives not a scintilla of evidence that any signs of his coming preceded the destruction of that city. Neither did he refer to "the end" of the Jewish age, when he places "the end" in the future; for that age was past long before Jerusalem was destroyed.

The prophet Daniel (Dan. 7:24-27) gives the period of "seventy weeks" of prophetic "days," or years, as the allotted period of special privileges to his (the Jewish) people. It is easy to show that these commenced 457 B. C., at the going forth of the decree "to restore and to build Jerusalem," given by Artaxerxes, king of Persia. That period of seventy times seven, i. e., 490 years, must therefore end A. D. 34, three and a half years later than the point where Jesus gave this prophecy, after the Jewish nation had rejected Christ and would not accept the gospel. Then it began to be preached to the Gentiles, while the Jews persecuted and put to death the apostles and disciples of Christ. Here it was that the natural branches of the tame olive tree were broken off by unbelief, and the "wild olive," or the Gentiles, were grafted in by faith, contrary to nature, thus partaking of the root and fatness of the tame olive, the true Abrahamic stock. Rom. 11:17-24. Faith in Christ makes us true children of Abraham. "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Gal. 3:29. It would be in the highest degree absurd to suppose that those wicked, bitter, persecuting Jews who had put Christ, and several of the apostles, and many of the disciples, to death, and most earnestly sought to destroy the gospel, were still granted special religious privileges as the children of God. These had ceased more than a quarter of a century before Jerusalem was destroyed. That terrible destruction came as a divine retribution for their crimes. Hence we know beyond a doubt that our Saviour was not referring to the Jewish age when he said "the end" of the world, or age, was "not yet." There were to be many "wars and rumors of wars," and "nation" rising "against nation," and famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places, and still "the end" of the dispensation was "not yet." These were but "the beginning of sorrows." Christ's coming was then far distant.

Our Saviour's first words are most suggestive: "Take heed that no man deceive you." No caution he ever gave was more necessary. And no scripture has been more misapplied than this same prophetic discourse. But who is most likely to be deceived, those who pay little attention to his words, or those who carefully study them? those who give figurative or fanciful expositions of them, or those who take them literally, giving every statement its reasonable meaning? those who are almost indifferent to the subject of the whole discourse, or those who cherish all our Saviour said as most precious, and who love and desire his appearing? It is not difficult to answer these questions. Hence all should seek earnestly to ascertain his meaning, and so escape deception.

Again: before "the end" was to come, many false Christs were to appear, and many be deceived by them. Matt. 24:5. The Jews had rejected Jesus, the true Messiah, so they were left to be deluded by spurious pretenders. "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." John 5:43. This prediction was fully verified. In "Buck's Theological Dictionary, Art. Messiah," is given a list of twenty-four false Christs who led multitudes of the Jews into deception and ruin. "Professor Tholuck," according to Taylor ("Great Consummation," p. 16), "counts up fifty-eight false Messiahs who have arisen in various parts of the world and sought to deceive." Cuziba was the first of these mentioned who called himself Barcocheba, i. e., the star foretold by Balaam, and claimed he was to restore his nation to its ancient glory. He figured about a century after Christ, and some five or six hundred thousand Jews who followed him were destroyed. Most of the others were centuries later. Thus were our Saviour's words literally fulfilled. But let the reader note this fact, that not one of these false Christs appeared till long after the destruction of Jerusalem. Yet he declares that even after all of them should have appeared, "the end is not yet,"— most decisive proof that "the end" mentioned was not the end of the Jewish, but of the Gentile age, and that Christ did not come at the destruction of Jerusalem, neither was the appearance of these false Christs given as a special sign of the nearness of his coming.

"For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places. All these are the beginning of sorrows (or birth pangs, Greek, ōdinōn). Matt. 24:7, 8. These calamities were to be prevalent all through the dispensation. They were not a special token of Christ's near approach, but rather evidences of God's judgments in our world, because of sins, dark and heinous, ever prevalent. There were strange convulsions beneath the crust of the earth, causing fearful upheavals on sea and land; tidal waves, eruptions of molten lava, islands forming, and great tracts sinking out of sight; earthquakes shaking down cities, toppling over man's works in wreck and ruin, destroying in the aggregate millions of souls; the air poisoned, causing pestilences to sweep away millions to an untimely grave; famines desolating nations, caused by the heaven's withholding the supply of rain; and various convulsions, terrible and destructive, which were evidences of the existence of a God overruling all nations, and visiting in wrath the persecuting, wicked nations of the earth,—all these are evidences of God's hatred of sin and tokens of the wrath sure to follow, when he rises up in judgment in "the end" of the age. These "birth pangs" are but the prelude of the climax of convulsions when earth's doom shall see the destruction of sin and sinners.

History most fully attests the fulfillment of these predictions of our Lord. We present a few extracts:—

"By famine and sword, 580,000 Jews were destroyed between A. D. 96 and A. D. 180, and earthquakes during the same period destroyed thirteen cities and over 100,000 lives. In Rome A. D. 169 and 187, pestilence destroyed 10,000 daily, and from the latter period continued three years. In A. D. 446, Sept. 17, an earthquake shook down the walls of Constantinople, and fifty-seven towers fell. In A. D. 539, in one district 50,000 died. An earthquake in Antioch, A. D. 588, killed 60,000. The plague in Turkey, A. D. 590, killed 10,000 daily. In Constantinople, A. D. 717, 300,000 died of plague. In 1005, earthquakes three months, followed by pestilence, destroyed, it is said, one third of the human race. In the years 1077 and 1124, in Constantinople and in Italy, plague and famine were so terrible that the living could not bury the dead, and they lay in the streets unburied. One third of the people in England died.

"In 1345 in London, Norwich, Venice, and Florence 300,000 died of the plague, and among the Eastern nations 20,000,000. It was the famous black death. In 1352, 900,000 died of famine in China. In Milan, in 1450, 60,000 died of plague. In Constantinople, in 1611, 200,000 died of the same. In Lyons, in 1626, 600,000 died from the same cause. In 1755 an earthquake destroyed Lisbon, shook the whole Spanish coast, threw down 2,000 houses in Mitylene, and the Archipelago, and was felt over a large portion of the globe. It is said that 90,000 persons were killed by it. The plague following it destroyed 150,000 lives in Constantinople. Surely our Lord's prediction had a wonderful fulfillment."

"Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you: and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake. And then shall many be offended, and shall betray one another, and shall hate one another." Verses 9, 10. In these prophetic words our Lord foretells the treatment his true disciples should receive from the nations of the earth, during the long period previous to his return. Satan hates true religion, and has ever instigated persecution in some form or other against it. This is evident by a general statement, including the whole period from the time he spoke till he should come again. For Mark adds to it these words: "For they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten," etc.

This last quotation must have been fulfilled before Jerusalem was destroyed; for such treatment from the Jews would not likely occur after the Jews themselves were carried away into captivity. But while this is so, the major part of it was fulfilled long after that city was destroyed. The persecutions inflicted by the Jews in Palestine could never fulfill the statement that they "should be hated of all nations" for Christ's sake. Many of the nations of the earth were not known in that age, and many of them did not then exist. But they have come upon the stage in ages since, and have heard of Christ, and have persecuted his disciples, and must be included in the "all nations" of whom he spoke. But as Christ speaks still more fully on the subject of this persecution, we will consider it more fully later.

As the next four verses relate to the last days, we will defer noticing them till that period is considered.

SATAN'S DECEPTION AND POPISH PRAYERS.

THE pope, secluded in the Vatican, like Luther in the Wartburg (may the comparison end here), has grown morbid, and thinks the evil spirit is especially active at the present time. He does not hurl his inkstand at him, as did the redoubtable Reformer, but he has composed a prayer which is being printed in the Catholic papers, with a recommendation that it be used. Near the beginning of the prayer occurs the following sentence: "Hasten to the aid of man, whom thou hast created immortal."

It becomes a question of great interest where this idea of natural immortality originated, who first voiced this sentiment, which so many believe, even the so-called head of the church. As reference is made in the prayer to the time when man was made, we will survey that historic ground to learn what we can of man's nature. There we find that the Lord "formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul,"—not an immortal soul; that the continuance of his life was dependent upon his future conduct; that his course was such that he brought upon himself the displeasure of God, with the declaration, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return;" that he was driven from his Eden home, and "lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life, and eat and live forever," a guard of cherubim were placed around the tree of life,—a positive proof that he was not immortal; and yet so far as life was concerned, he was just as God made him.

Coming now to the plan of salvation, we learn that "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3:16); that this life is something which is to be sought after "by patient continuance in well-doing" (Rom. 2:7); that it is brought "to light through the gospel" (2 Tim. 1:10); and that it is to be bestowed upon the saints at the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. 1 Cor. 15:51-54. This being the case, it is quite evident that the pope does not obtain the inspiration of his prayer from the facts of creation, or the truths of the gospel.

Going back once more to the time when man was made, we learn that when Satan compassed man's overthrow, he told a very specious story,—a story which although directly contradictory of what God had said, was believed; and that deceptive lie, so fatal to our first parents, has come down to us as a matter of general belief, and in many ways completes the work of deception upon the race. "And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die." Gen. 3:4.

Here we discover the beginning of the popular belief of the natural immortality of man. Tracing back the mighty stream of popular opinion upon this subject to its source, we find the spring in that evil spirit that seduced the progenitors of our race from the path of rectitude and obedience. The originator of this popular falsehood has not forgotten how readily it takes with mankind, nor how powerful a factor it is for evil. It has entered largely into the religious life of all the heathen nations of antiquity. The sacrifices of the heathen had reference to the dead, but Paul testifies that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils. 1 Cor. 10:20. In fact, the adoration of their dead ancestors constitutes the principal part of the worship of the heathen.

From the heathen it was introduced into the church along with other errors at the time of the working of the "mystery of iniquity;" since which time it has had the general support of the Christian ministry. This must be a source of great satisfaction to Satan.

And now he has the additional cause for satanic pleasure that the so-called "head of the church," in a prayer composed in direct reference to Satan and his work, lays down as an established point of Christian theology, that very principle by which he caused the overthrow of the race, and which has been his masterpiece of deception all along.

Editorial Notes.

THERE has been no garden of Eden upon the earth since Adam fell, but there has been in its place a spiritual garden, in which human plants are being trained and prepared for that future Eden which is to fill the earth. The plants in this spiritual garden are "rooted and grounded in love" (Eph. 3:17), are watered by the Spirit of God (Isa. 44:3, 4; 27:3; Hosea 14:5), live in the atmosphere of faith, and grow in the light of the "Sun of righteousness."

The word of God informs us that "there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body" (1 Cor. 15:44); and correspondingly, there is a natural world, and there is a spiritual world. As a being of flesh and blood, man lives and moves amidst the visible, tangible surroundings of the natural world; but the Christian also lives and moves in the unseen spiritual world, the influence of which is stronger than that of the natural world to shape his thoughts and actions. The nourishment by which life is sustained in this spiritual world is Christ (1 Cor. 10:3, 4; John 6:53). As the spiritual part of man is the highest part of his being and should predominate, so the spiritual world predominates over the material world, throughout the universe of God, and is the only world in which life is worth the living.

The word of God declares that "all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." Rev. 21:8. The sin of lying is not considered a very grievous one by many apparently good people; yet the inspired word has given it an emphatic mention in the enumeration of sins contained in the above text. God is the author of truth, and it is said of him that he "cannot lie;" and it may be readily inferred that one who has no more regard for the truth than to become a liar must be radically defective in character. Again, while there is no express declaration against lying, in the decalogue, it is easily seen that the act is a violation of the "great commandment," "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The act of lying may be a violation of almost any one of the six commandments which this greater precept includes. It should also be borne in mind that there are several different ways of telling a lie and several different views of those ways, in which some people are very evidently in error. The essence of lying is in deliberately conveying an untruthful impression; consequently it matters not by what means the impression be conveyed, whether by words or otherwise. A great many people seem

187.—INVESTIGATIVE JUDGMENT.

Is there an investigation of the cases of the wicked? If so, at what time? Is it before or after the second coming of Christ, and who are the ones engaged in it? N. F. B.

Ans.—There is an investigation of the cases of the wicked, the same as in the cases of the righteous. All judgment is rendered on the investigation of character; for the general rule, as laid down in scripture, is that every one is to be "judged out of those things which" are "written in the books." Rev. 20:12.

In the investigative judgment of the righteous, which takes place before Christ comes, the object is simply to decide one question, and that is, who are to be saved when Christ appears. And hence only those cases come under examination, in this division of the judgment, whose names have been entered in the book of life; because in all other cases the question then up for decision, as to salvation or perdition, is already decided.

In this scene of judgment God sits as judge, Christ is the great high priest and advocate, and the countless hosts of the angels are the assistants in the work. Dan. 7:9, 10. And all those, who in this investigation have been found to be faithful, will have their names confessed by Christ before the Father and the holy angels. Rev. 3:5. This work being done, all judgment is then committed unto the Son (John 5:22), he comes for his people, the dead are raised, and the thousand years of Revelation 20 begin. Rev. 20:4, 5; Then also begins the investigation of the cases of the wicked, not to ascertain whether they are to be saved or not, for that question is at that time already settled, but to decide the magnitude of their guilt, and the degrees of their punishment. In this work Christ is judge, and the saints, having themselves been redeemed, are then his assistants. 1 Cor. 6:2, 3; Rev. 20:4. All wicked works having been examined during the thousand years, and sentence written against them, at the end of that period this sentence is executed, and the wicked are destroyed. Rev. 20:9; Ps. 149:9.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

THE GREAT TRIBULATION.

"For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." Matt. 24:21, 22.

The special point and force of our Lord's whole discourse depends upon properly locating and identifying this "great tribulation." The signs of his coming are to commence at its close. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," etc. Verse 29. Christ's coming takes place soon after all the signs he foretold concerning it had their fulfillment. Hence to obtain a proper understanding of the age of the world when his coming is imminent, we must know the period allotted to the great tribulation. This term is translated from the Greek word "thlipsis," and occurs, according to the Englishman's Greek Concordance, forty-five times in the New Testament. It is in most instances rendered "tribulation" or "affliction," but a few times it is rendered "trouble." Greenfield gives the meaning as "pressure, compression; by metonymy, affliction, distress, calamity." In nearly all cases where it occurs in the New Testament, it is used in reference to the sorrows, persecutions, and afflictions the pious disciples of Christ should suffer because of their faith. We find no instance where it is used concerning the temporal afflictions of the wicked in this world.

This term implies something severe, crushing, a hard pressure, a bruising and wearing out by long continuance. Upon whom was it to come? As already indicated, the inspired writers in the New Testament in nearly all cases make use of the term when speaking of the afflictions of Christians. But the Saviour's words above quoted, make the conclusion unavoidable in the passage we are considering, that it can apply at least in this instance only to the disciples of Christ. The tribulation is upon "the elect," upon those who are to "be saved." All "the elect" would be destroyed from the earth, should "the tribulation" continue till the end of "those days." It is "shortened" for the sake of "the elect," that some of these might be spared on the earth to preserve it a little longer from utter ruin. Had a few others besides righteous Lot remained, even wicked Sodom, with its sister cities of the plain, might have been saved from its burning. Gen. 18:26-33.

But who are "the elect?" The Greek word "eklektos," of which this is a translation, is used in the New Testament twenty-three times, and in every instance is translated "elect" or "chosen." Greenfield defines it "chosen, elect, select, hence beloved, dear, chosen, approved, choice, distinguished, excellent." We give a few phrases where its use is illustrated: "They shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." "There shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, . . . if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." "And shall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him?" "Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness," etc. Not an instance can be cited where this term is ever used in the New Testament or in the whole Bible, and applied to the wicked in general or to the apostate, unbelieving Jews, or of those not enjoying the favor of God.

We therefore find the conclusion inevitable that this "great tribulation" is one which affects our Lord's disciples and not the wicked, unbelieving Jews, or sinners in general. A long, wearing, dreadful, series of persecutions awaited his church, and beloved disciples, such as had never been seen in all the world before. They were to be hated of all men for his sake. They would be afflicted and put to death in multitudes. Indeed, ages and ages these terrible sufferings would continue. This was a sad disclosure our Lord made to his disciples; for this was, as we have seen, addressed to them in a private discourse warning them of what they might expect. Indeed, we should not wonder that these things should come upon the disciples of him whom wicked hands cruelly murdered.

As they were leading him away to crucify him, and a great company followed him, bewailing and lamenting him, "Jesus turning unto them said, Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children. For, behold, the days are coming, in the which they shall say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck. Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us. For if they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" Luke 23:28-31.

When the prince of evil found he could not put down the blessed gospel, nor bring it to an end by killing the Prince of life, his last resort was to harass, persecute, and destroy his disciples. He really suffered a great defeat, when he caused the death of the Son of God. His malignity was made manifest to all the universe. His own machinations opened up the way of salvation through the precious blood of the Son of God, which he caused to be shed. He became more desperate than ever when Christ arose from the dead and ascended to heaven beyond his reach, and his only hope now was to harass and destroy his disciples. "And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: . . . woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea! for the Devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." Rev. 12:10, 12. When the Son of God arose from the dead, going up to heaven, Satan realized he had suffered a great defeat, and his wrath waxed more and more cruel.

The persecutions of the meek, humble disciples of Christ were something peculiar in our world. Nothing just like them had ever been in the preceding ages of history, nothing so terribly bloody and cruel were known in the 4,000 years before. Afflictions indeed they passed through; oftentimes these were permitted to arouse them from ease and stupor, and they have been at times greatly oppressed. But the terrible, protracted, wearing-out, pitiless, and awful sufferings inflicted by Rome in pagan, but more especially in papal, ages were something unequalled and most wonderful.

Other prophets have foretold it as well as our Lord. Our Saviour most certainly had in mind, while giving this discourse, the prophecy of Daniel. He refers to it, mentioning him by name in verse 15, when speaking of this desolating power. He evidently had him in view while speaking of the shortening of certain "days" of "tribulation." Verses 21, 22. How do we know this?—By the fact that no other Bible writer excepting Daniel up to the time when Christ gave this discourse, had ever given the number of prophetic days in which God's people should be given into the hands of a persecuting power. The apostle John in Revelation 12 and 13, afterward repeats it, giving the same numbers. But Daniel, previous to our Saviour's time, in symbolic language (no doubt well understood in that age) marks off a long period as follows: "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hands until a time and times and the dividing of time." Dan. 7:25.

The power that was to do this in Daniel's vision of chapter 7, was symbolized by the fourth beast, "dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly," that "devoured and brake in pieces" all that stood in his way. Protestant commentators are practically united in applying this symbol to the Roman empire. That power is represented in the prophecy in two phases; as a beast with ten horns, and afterward with three of these plucked up and a "little horn," in which "were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things." Dan. 7:8. In the explanation of the symbol, the angel informs Daniel that "the fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth." It is well known that Babylon, Media and Persia, and Alexander's kingdom were the three great empires of the world which preceded the still mightier power of Rome. This fourth monarchy stands in history as the greatest persecuting power ever known among the nations of the earth. It put to death more of the servants of the true God for religious opinion, than all other powers that have existed since our world was created. At least 75,000,000 of Christ's disciples were martyrs to its intolerance. He shall "wear out the saints of the Most High" and think to change times and laws" (or "the time and the law," other versions), and "they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." A "time" (the ancient Jewish year of 360 days), "times" (plural, twice as many, i. e., 720 days), "the dividing of time" (one half as long, i. e., 180 days), making in all 1260 prophetic days or years, a day in symbolic prophecy meaning a year. Num. 14:33, 34; Eze. 4:6.

Therefore for a period of 1260 years, "the little horn," the papacy, was permitted to domineer over the people of God. The beginning of this period is a well-marked historical era. In A. D. 538, Justinian the Roman emperor, dwelling in Constantinople, having succeeded in driving out the Ostrogoths from Rome, decreed that the bishop of Rome should be head over all the churches, and power was delegated to him to correct heretics, as all were called who would not subscribe to the dogmas of the Catholic Church. From this point the pretensions of the bishops of Rome, which had been in dispute before, became generally accepted by the Catholic world, and his pre-eminence over all other bishops was generally admitted. The end of the period of 1260 years is also a well-marked epoch. In 1798 the French general, Berthier, marched into Rome, proclaimed a republic, took Pope Pius VI prisoner, and carried him away to France, where he died in exile. That these two events are marked epochs in the history of the papacy, no one can deny. And that they are a wonderful testimony to the truthfulness of Daniel's prophecy is equally certain. That there was during this long period a constant succession of arbitrary acts, blasphemous pretensions, arrogant claims, fearful persecutions, bloody wars, and every effort possible to be made to put down all opposition to the Roman pontiff by fire, sword, torture, and every device possible, no candid, intelligent person will deny. The world never saw anything like it. But what is still more striking, the tribulation was shortened just a little before the days expired, as our Saviour declared they would be.

That our Saviour had in view this long prophetic period of 1260 years in which the Roman power should have the saints of God "given into his hands" to "wear out," seems clearly evident, when he speaks of "those days" being "shortened" "for the elect's sake." Only five or six sentences before (verse 15), he had mentioned Daniel by name as the prophet who had foretold the desolating power of Rome coming to destroy Jerusalem. He then speaks of the work he should do in persecuting the people of God, "the elect," and states that certain "days" of tribulation should be "shortened" for the "elect's" sake. When we take into consideration the fact that this same prophet Daniel had foretold the length of time the Roman pontiff should have given into his hands "the saints" to "wear out," even 1260 years, it is clear as a sunbeam that these were the days of tribulation which were to be "shortened" for the sake of the "elect," that all true followers of Christ should not be destroyed from the earth. We are convinced of this conclusion by the fact that no other specified period for such a work of persecution is given in the Bible. Later on, John, in the revelation gives the same period, applying it to the same work, as we shall see. It would be most absurd to speak of "those days" being "shortened" for the sake of "the elect," when no specified time had been given beforehand in which they had been delivered into the persecutor's hands to be so treated. "Those" is the plural of "that," a pronoun referring to something before mentioned or understood. (See Webster.) The Greek word "ekeinos," from which "those" is translated, is rendered in our version "those," "that," "the same," or "selfsame," in most instances when it is used in the New Testament (see Englishman's Greek Concordance), and its meaning according to Greenfield is "that, that one, this," etc. It must therefore in this case refer to something previously understood. Daniel's "time and times and the dividing of time" (i. e., 1260 years) was the long period of terrible persecution which our Saviour had in view when he stated, "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world, to this time, no, nor ever shall be."

REPORT OF THE GENERAL CONFERENCE COMMITTEE MEETINGS FROM MARCH 11-21, 1892.

WE herewith submit a report of the most important matters considered by the General Conference Committee in its council held March 11-21. In regard to the distribution of laborers, as noted in a former article, the committee made as few changes as circumstances would permit. But the continuous growth of the work and the increasing demands in various ways make it necessary that some changes should be made every year. We hope that the recommendations made will result in the advancement of the work. So far the persons receiving the recommendations have cheerfully acquiesced in the same, and are making arrangements to comply with the suggestions. There were some other recommendations considered upon which we are not prepared to report at present, as they depend upon certain conditions and circumstances.

It will also be noticed that the time for the next General Conference has been appointed. By having the notice published thus early, it will give those even in our foreign fields the best of opportunity to arrange their reports and have everything ready for the General Conference. We believe this will be appreciated by all.

The members present during the meetings were O. A. Olsen, S. N. Haskell, J. N. Loughborough, D. T. Jones, R. M. Kilgore, R. A. Underwood, and W. W. Prescott.

The first meeting was called March 11, 1892, at 10:30 A. M. Prayer was offered by Elder Loughborough. Minutes of meetings held since October, 1891, were read and approved.

Various matters were talked over in a general way; such as needs of the field in the way of Presidents and other laborers, time for holding the next week of prayer, etc., the chairman enumerating different items which should be considered and acted upon.

The following committees were appointed:—

Committee on Camp-meetings: J. N. Loughborough, R. M. Kilgore, R. A. Underwood.

Committee on Distribution of Laborers: D. T. Jones, S. N. Haskell, W. W. Prescott.

Committee on Week of Prayer: S. N. Haskell, R. A. Underwood, D. T. Jones.

The matter of time for holding the next General Conference, and the holding of ministerial institutes the coming year, were considered, and it was voted that the next General Conference be held Feb. 17 to March 6, 1893, this to be preceded by a general ministerial institute to be held from Jan. 27 to Feb. 16, 1893.

The Committee on Distribution of Laborers presented a report which was adopted as follows:—

1. That H. W. Decker make Indiana his field of labor.

2. That R. S. Donnell make the Upper Columbia Conference his field of labor.

3. That N. W. Allee labor in Minnesota.

4. That W. S. Hyatt make Missouri his field of labor, and take the presidency of the Conference and tract society made vacant by the removal of R. S. Donnell and N. W. Allee.

5. That F. D. Starr labor in Illinois.

6. That R. H. Brock labor in the Indian Territory, and that the district superintendent supply an assistant from that district.

7. That the superintendent of Dist. No. 6 supply an additional laborer for Montana.

8. That M. G. Huffman labor in Maine.

9. That R. S. Webber make the Maritime Provinces his field of labor.

10. That O. O. Farnsworth go to Ireland and make that his field of labor.

11. That B. F. Purdham labor in Illinois.

12. That H. S. Shaw go to Louisiana and make that his field of labor.

13. That E. G. Olsen take the superintendency of the Scandinavian work in Iowa, South Dakota, and Nebraska.

14. That D. T. Jones locate in California, with the idea of connecting more closely with the interests on the Pacific Coast.

15. That Julia Parmele and Mina Robinson go to England to engage in the Bible work.

16. That S. S. Shrock go to Kansas and labor among the Germans.

17. That G. F. Haffner of North Pacific Conference spend some time in laboring for the Germans in the Upper Columbia Conference, as may be agreed upon by the Presidents of the two Conferences.

18. That with reference to the work of Wm. Baird of North Carolina, the same be referred to the superintendent of the district and the President of the General Conference, with power to act.

19. That the matter of directing the labors of D. A. Ball, who has recently returned from the West Indies on account of failing health, be left with the President of the General Conference.

20. That L. R. Conradi return to America at the close of the Central European Conference and camp-meeting, to labor for a time among the Germans.

21. That in view of the urgent demand for Scandinavian labor in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, J. F. Hansen of Copenhagen, Denmark, return to this country and labor in the cities indicated.

It was voted as the sense of the committee that Frank Hope, now in London, England, be ordained and receive credentials.

Upon motion, O. A. Olsen and W. W. Prescott were chosen as a committee to supply a teacher for Australia.

Voted, That the superintendency of Dist. No. 1 be placed in charge of the President of the General Conference, with the privilege of drawing on such help as he may need to look after the work.

Voted, That a forty-foot tent be provided for use in the Indian Territory.

The matter of the students' volunteer movement received some consideration, and a committee composed of the chairman, W. W. Prescott, and S. N. Haskell, was chosen to consider further the question and report at some future time.

Missionary work among the Chinese in this country was also considered, and J. N. Loughborough, D. T. Jones, and Allen Moon were appointed as a committee on this question.

The following preambles and resolutions were presented by Elder D. T. Jones, and adopted:—

Whereas, The Lord has spoken plainly regarding the importance of health reform, in testimonies recently received, as is brought to view in the following statement:—

"A responsibility to spread a knowledge of hygienic principles rests upon all who have enjoyed the benefits of health reform. This responsibility should be felt by every man and woman who claims to be a Seventh-day Adventist. . . . God's blessing will rest upon every effort made to awaken an interest in health reform, for it is needed everywhere. . . . There must be a revival in regard to this matter, for God proposes to accomplish much through this agency." Therefore,—

1. Resolved, That we recognize in this line of work one important branch of the work of God which should receive its due share of attention from all who have accepted the light which God has given us for these last days, and especially from those who stand in responsible positions as leaders and instructors of the people.

2. Resolved, That we recommend the officers of local Conferences to give the health question a reasonable share of attention, and instruct their ministers and other laborers to prepare themselves to instruct the people in the principles of healthful living, and also that they encourage competent persons to take a thorough course in theoretical and practical hygiene, that they may be prepared to teach others.

3. Resolved, That we request those who visit camp-meetings as camp-meeting laborers, to fit themselves to give instruction on health reform from the standpoint of the Bible and the "Testimonies."

Whereas, One special object in the establishment of our denominational schools is to fit young men and women for missionary work by educating them in all branches of the truth; therefore,—

4. Resolved, That instruction in health and temperance should be recognized as a part of the regular course in our schools, as soon as competent teachers can be procured, and that such instruction be in harmony with the teachings of the Bible and the "Testimonies" on this subject.

Remarks were made upon the resolutions by Dr. Kellogg (who came in while the report was being considered), Prof. Prescott, and Elders Underwood, Jones, and Olsen.

It was decided that the next week of prayer be held Dec. 17-25, 1892.

Appointments for the various camp-meetings were also made. (See list of camp-meetings on page 15 of REVIEW.) O. A. OLSEN, Chairman.

BAD USE OF PETER'S PENCE.

THE word "bad" is here used in the sense of fraudulent, since the use to which "Peter's pence" is ordinarily put, in furthering the development of the papacy, is about as bad a use as any to which money could be put. It seems that the papal authorities at Rome have been endeavoring to make a rather too literal application of the language of the parable of the talents, by putting out the money intrusted to them to the exchangers, but in so doing they have failed to gain "other ten talents." It makes a difference in such cases whether the money be invested in an earthly bank or in the bank of heaven. Our Saviour in his teachings evidently had reference to the latter and not the former, as the place where his followers should invest the means with which they are here divinely intrusted.

4. After this there is no more death (Rev. 21 : 4), hence the last part of Isa. 65 : 20 must apply at sometime previous to the formation of the new earth; and it is natural, we might say, necessary, to apply it to that great death scene in the lake of fire, the last event of the kind before the new earth is made, which is the subject of the prophecy. Verse 17.

5. But how does the child die a hundred years old? Ans.—In the multitudes that perish in the lake of fire, all classes and all generations will be represented, from the antediluvian rebel to the nineteenth-century sinner. But the antediluvians lived nearly a thousand years, and a person at that time a hundred years of age was but a "child." All who were a hundred years old at the time of the flood, and who perished therein, were, in that age, only children; and there must have been hosts of them. These all appear again in the second resurrection, to perish in the lake of fire; and in comparison with the men of their own generation who perish with them, men from six hundred to nine hundred or more years of age, they are still but children. But the sinner of to-day who lives to be a hundred years of age is considered to be a very old man. And as the hundred-year-old antediluvian child was not too young to be a sinner, the sinner of to-day who is a hundred years of age, is not too old to be shielded by his venerable age from the punishment of sin. They both alike perish in the lake of fire.

The conclusion, then, is this: That "the child" that dies "a hundred years old," is the antediluvian child; and the sinner who being a hundred years old is accursed, is the sinner of all those subsequent generations, who at a hundred years of age is considered an aged man. The point of time at which they die, is the second death; and after that there will be no helpless infant, nor decrepit, broken down old man; for there will be nothing to hurt nor destroy in all God's holy mountain. Verse 25.

RIGHT WORDS.

SPEECH is a sure index of character. No definite opinion can be formed of an individual's qualities and disposition from his personal appearance alone. The fool can, by keeping still, pass as the possessor of a considerable degree of wisdom. The countenance, the dress, the general appearance and demeanor may seem to indicate this or that, but when once the individual has given expression to his thoughts, in language of his own choosing, our opinion of his intellectual and moral traits begins to take on definite shape, and we gain at once some idea of his general trend of character. Nor is a lengthy conversation often necessary in order that his general character should be distinctly shown.

Speech is the natural and ready outlet of the mind, and therefore the best indication of what the mind contains. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." Much has been said and written upon the conversational art; but the basis of all good conversation must be good thoughts. Mere words, however elegant or rhetorical, are of no value. It is the thought which they convey that determines and invests them with their beauty and propriety.

There is probably no other way in which so much good could be realized at so little cost as by means of the right use of the power of speech. Each individual has a certain degree of influence over others with whom he is associated. This influence is the influence of his words and actions. To exert a right influence, these must be harmonious. Let a person make what pretensions he will by his words, he will not be believed if he contradicts them by his actions; nor, on the other hand, will he receive credit for his good actions if his words do not correspond with them in character. This is the great trouble with many who profess Christianity. Their names are upon the church records, they attend church services, and in various ways by action seem to identify themselves with Christian people; but their conversation is usually of a nature which would convey no suggestion of such facts; hardly, indeed, of a conviction that "life is real, life is earnest, and the grave is not its goal." The mind cannot feed upon chaff with any better result than can the body. The hurtful, unsatisfactory effect follows and is felt as surely in the one case as in the other.

Good thoughts are not so scarce in this world as to be beyond the reach of any one. Themes which will elevate, refine, or at least instruct, the mind are not so uncommon as ever to make it necessary that conversation should take the form of idle words. It is no inscrutable provision of divine justice which has ordained that for such words account shall be given in the day of judgment.

If he who has been accustomed to dispense only the chaff of foolish and idle words in his intercourse with others, would let his speech take on a higher and more serious vein, he would be surprised at the result. It will be no difficult task. The effort will cost him nothing, and the result will be invaluable. No one who has perused the word of God and obtained a knowledge of its truths, can be at any loss to know how to make his words helpful and beneficial to others. Realizing that "the end of all things is at hand," he will at least keep in mind the injunction, "Exhort one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching."

Piety cannot flourish where the tongue runs uncontrolled upon themes of a contrary nature. The character can never attain to full Christian development while this "unruly member" of the body does not act harmoniously with its fellow-members to that end. The faculty of speech has been greatly perverted from its divinely-intended purpose. This power, distinguishing man from the brutes, may well be regarded as the natural accompaniment and necessity of a moral nature, to which it must have been meant to be subservient. Certainly the Creator never designed that this gift, so peculiarly indicative of the pre-eminence of its possessor in the order of creation, should be the instrument of his degradation to a low, unspiritual plane.

"How forcible are right words!" "A man hath joy by the answer of his mouth: and a word spoken in due season, how good is it!" "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." Job 6 : 25; Prov. 15 : 23; 25 : 11. How often the opportunity here referred to comes and passes unperceived, and how slight the effort which would often suffice to improve it! Right words and a right character are inseparable; for "if any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body;" and therefore "by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." James 3 : 2; Matt. 12 : 37. The result of an attempt to improve our words will well reward the effort.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

THE GREAT TRIBULATION.

In further considering this subject of The Great Tribulation, we will notice other references to it, showing how prominent it is made in the Scriptures. In every instance we shall see that it was this same Roman power that was to cause this most prominent period of affliction to come to the people of God. It is noticed by Daniel in other portions of his prophecy, and in his vision of the 8th chapter, as a power that waxed exceeding great, and "magnified himself even to the prince of the host," and "cast down the truth to the ground," "practiced, and prospered." "He shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people," and "he shall stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand." Verses 11, 12, 24, 25. "The Prince of princes." Our Lord and Saviour was put to death by them. The "holy people" were not the wicked, unbelieving Jews who were so willing to have Christ's blood upon them and their children; but the disciples of the meek and lowly Jesus, millions of whom this same Roman power put to death. In chapter 11 Daniel refers again to this persecution: "The people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits. And they that understand among the people shall instruct many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help: . . . and some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end: because it is yet for a time appointed." Verses 32-35.

"The time of the end" is a little period just before the end, during which the signs our Saviour gave concerning his coming, shall have their fulfillment. This persecution, it is seen, reaches down to that point. The suffering, persecuted people of God are "holpen with a little help," so the terrible tribulation is shortened, as Christ says, for the elect's sake, though they had fallen by the sword, flame, captivity, and spoil "many days," even more than a thousand years. How can any one fail to see the identity of this period with our Saviour's great tribulation; the "many days" of which were shortened? We cannot doubt but that they are one and the same.

The Revelation through St. John is the supplement or complement of the prophecy of Daniel. He has much to say concerning this same period. In chapter 6 : 7-11 "death and hades" are personified as riding forth on a "pale horse," slaying God's saints over a fourth part of the earth "with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth." And immediately following, these martyred souls lying under the altar, the earth, are also personified as crying, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood?" They are represented as still resting there a "little season" longer, as the terrible process goes on, and their brethren are also slain, till the righteous Judge should come in his glory to give them life and immortality. Then immediately after, comes the same list of signs our Saviour gives in Matthew 24, which immediately precede his coming. Then comes "the great day of his wrath," when the great men, the rich men, and every bondman and every freeman hide themselves in the rocks and dens of the mountains from Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. Thus the great tribulation upon God's elect precedes immediately the signs of the day of God.

In chapter 7 we have brought to view an immense host standing before the throne of God, wearing white robes and bearing palms in their hands; they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. One of the elders informed John that "these are they which have come out of the great tribulation" (Revised Version, and literal Greek), gathered from every land and every clime. Who can doubt the conclusion that reference is here made to that same "tribulation" of which our Lord speaks in his great prophecy, the greatest that was ever permitted to come upon his people before his time, or ever should be? It was a tribulation world-wide; for those who come out of it were from "every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people."

In chapters 12 and 13 St. John presents this great Roman persecuting power before us, under two symbols, "a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns," who sought to destroy forever the "man child," "who was to rule all nations," but he was caught up to God and his throne. He then sought to destroy the church of God, represented here under the symbol of a woman, by persecution and by a fearful "flood." But she was preserved from utter destructions during the period of a "time, times, and a half," i. e., 1260 years, though the dragon sent out a great "flood" after her, and would have utterly destroyed her. But "the earth [i. e., the powers of the earth] helped the woman," and she was preserved from Roman power.

Here under this forcible series of symbols, this great tribulation is again presented, and the relief of the church by the Protestant governments, after the great persecutions of the 1260 years, or the "shortening" of the days of tribulation as Christ declares, is repeated. The symbol used in chapter 13 is a composite beast, with a body like a leopard, feet like a bear, mouth like a lion, with seven heads and ten horns. This represents the Roman power which had conquered Babylon, Media and Persia, and Grecia, absorbing them, and ruled the world, as the leopard, bear, and lion were symbols used by Daniel (chapter 7), of these kingdoms. This leopard beast of Revelation 13 specially represents the papal phase of the Roman power, as the great red dragon did the pagan form; and he received "his power, seat, and great authority" from Justinian the Roman emperor, in A. D. 538, as we have before noticed. It is the same precisely as Daniel's "little horn." Dan. 7:8, 24, 25. That emperor gave him his power, i. e., made him head over all the churches, gave him "his seat," Rome as his capital city, with authority to correct heretics. All the world wondered after the beast. "And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations." "And power was given unto him to continue forty and two months." Thirty days to each month gives us 1260 prophetic days or years again, beginning A. D. 538 and ending 1798. "He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity: he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword." How forcibly this was fulfilled when the French marched into Rome and carried away the pope into exile, and destroyed his government. He is to-day under the power of the sword, the king of Italy holding Rome itself.

Let the reader notice especially the fact that the great tribulation is here forcibly brought to view again, as the saints of God were given into the hands of this power to be killed and carried away captive during many ages. But the period of relief, or the "shortening of the days," is also forcibly presented when this persecuting power itself shall receive a deadly wound from the sword and be led captive also.

John again speaks of this persecuting power in chapter 17, fitly representing it as a lewd woman arrayed magnificently in purple and scarlet, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, with a golden cup in her hand, from which she corrupted the nations. She was seated upon a scarlet-colored beast having seven heads and ten horns. The name of this bloody harlot was "Babylon the Great." She was "drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." No wonder the loving John wondered with great astonishment.

A woman is very often used in the Scriptures as a symbol of a church. A pure woman is a fit emblem of a pure church, a corrupt woman of an apostate church. Her riding upon the beast of seven heads and ten horns identifies her with the Roman power beyond question, the civil power upholding the church and enforcing its decrees; i. e., the Church and State united. The Roman Church is the result of a great apostasy. St. Paul brings it to view in 2 Thess. 2:3, 4, when speaking of the "coming of our Lord Jesus Christ," which the Thessalonians thought to be imminent at that time. He plainly tells them it was not to come until "there come a falling away [an apostasy] first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. . . . For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way." (Revised Version, "There is one that restraineth now, until he be taken out of the way.")

For a time paganism by persecution kept the church partially pure, but when Constantine was nominally converted, and Christians were favored with position, power, wealth, and popularity, pride entered, and the process of apostasy was rapidly completed.

Then the papacy was speedily developed, till the pope of Rome became the mightiest potentate on earth, and with a strong hand sought to put down all religion not according to his creed. He became arrogant, cruel, tyrannical, and blood-thirsty, exalting himself above every object of worship, claiming to be the vicar of God on earth, sitting highest in the temple or church of God. The kings of the earth did his bidding, not daring to do otherwise. Thus the so-called church of the meek and lowly Jesus became the greatest persecuting power ever seen among mankind. Then were the words of Christ literally fulfilled, when he declared: "The time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think he doeth God service." John 16:2. This was not fulfilled by the pagans, but was literally true of the papists. Nothing on earth are they taught to hate so much as a heretic. So great Babylon became "drunken with the blood of the saints" of God, and giddy with pride and cruel with bigotry. Here again we see the great tribulation:-

"Great by reason of its wide extent Great by reason of its long continuance. Great by reason of its excessive severity. Great because the might of the strongest civil world powers would be exerted against the saints. Great because some of all nations and tongues were to be involved in it. Great because thanatos and hades only could fitly symbolize the carnival of sorrow and blood, when unheard of atrocities were committed, and indelible agonies endured. Great because it threatened to exterminate all human flesh, and set back the progress of the race. Great because it was to be without a parallel in past ages, and without an equal in the future. In all the other years of time there was to be nothing like it; a tribulation "such as never happened from the beginning of the world till now, no nor ever will be." (Diaglott ver., Matt. 24:21.)—"Taylor's Great Consummation," p. 62.

In view of all these facts, how preposterous to apply this tribulation to the destruction of Jerusalem, one city, and not the largest in the world by any means, the siege of which continued for merely a few years, and whose inhabitants were only of one nation. Not a single Christian was in it, not one of God's "elect" for whose sake the days of tribulation were to be "shortened!" How blind must be the exegesis which can pass over all these prophetic descriptions Christ's servants have given concerning those days of blood, sorrow, and agony through which the disciples of Christ must have passed, and suppose he never referred to them, while privately describing to his disciples alone the events of the gospel age intervening between his second advent in glory and the discourse he was giving, confining himself wholly to the fate of the Jews who had rejected him.

SOME MATTERS THAT DEMAND SERIOUS ATTENTION. SHALL WE KEEP PACE WITH THE WORK?

We are living in a very interesting time. Everything seems to be moving with remarkable rapidity. Movements that but a short time in the past required years to develop, are now completed in as many days. This is a fast age in every sense of the word. While no doubt all appreciate this to some extent, still very few sense it in its fullness. All the world seems to be in a state of unrest and general expectancy. Every thinking mind is looking on with anxiety and almost breathless attention, as to what will develop next. Intensity seems to be filling every agent of darkness. Sin and wickedness are everywhere prevalent. Darkness is covering the land, and gross darkness the people. Iniquity is abounding, and love is waxing cold. While many of the professed followers of Christ are satisfied with a form of godliness, they know little or nothing of its power. Surely we cannot mistake the time in which we live. The end of all things is just before us, and in a little from this the great crisis will be past.

A very large number of those who are looking on with anxiety and apprehension, are ignorant as to the real nature of the events that are to transpire; but not so with the student of prophecy, not so with those who understand the times and the seasons. "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, . . . ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: . . . therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober." 1 Thess. 5:4-6. While men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth, they are still in darkness as to the true nature of these things, and are unprepared; hence, the fear and perplexity.

But it is not the anxious and perplexing condition of men and nature that we wish to impress on your minds at this time. While these things should receive our attention, as they stand out as distinct fulfillments of prophecy, and thus indicate to us our time, and show that we are living on the verge of the eternal world, there are also other things that are of even greater importance to us, and which we must appreciate if we would meet the mind of the Spirit of God at this time.

Years ago, when our beloved Elder James White was discoursing on the signs of the times, and setting forth the remarkable fulfillment of the many prophecies relating to the closing time and the end, he would often pause and say, "But some one may ask, 'What is the surest sign that we are living in the last generation, and that the end of all things is close at hand?' and he would answer, 'It is the third angel's message.' There is great force to this answer. The third angel's message is an active reality. It represents a people raised up in the providence of God, bearing specific characteristics and doing a certain work. It represents the last work of warning a sinful world, and threatens the sinner and the ungodly with the unmixed wrath of God. When the time came for this message to be given to the world, a people appeared on the stage of action bearing the true characteristics, and doing the very work that the message was to accomplish, and moreover, claiming to be the fulfillment of the message. Certainly there can be no mistake in reference to the genuineness of the message, but it must be recognized as a fulfillment of the prediction, and in itself the most prominent sign of all, and a sign that cannot be disproved.

As a people, we are here in fulfillment of the prophecy of Rev. 14:9-12. We are not here as a mere happen so. In direct obedience to the call of God in the second angel's message, Rev. 14:8, we have come out from the confusion of Christendom, and have taken our stand on the firm foundation, "the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." And this people are now giving the warning against the worship of the beast and his image. The time is fulfilled, the message is being given, a people is being developed who will be ready to meet the Lord in peace, and in a short time the crisis will be past, and the Lord will have come, taking vengeance on the ungodly, but saving his people who have waited for him, who will rejoice in his salvation.

These things are here. This message is being proclaimed. And you and I profess to be identified with it and to be engaged in this very work. Is this so in fact, or is it in our own minds merely a profession? We entreat you to study this matter, giving it careful thought; you cannot afford to make a mistake; your eternal destiny is involved.

The third angel's message is destined to accomplish a great work in the earth. It is to be proclaimed to every nation, kindred, tongue, and them to teach that some are predestinated to be lost, do what they will. Will you please explain them? The texts are Jude 4; Rom. 9: 21, 22; 1 Pet. 2: 8; Ex. 9: 16.

E. R.

Ans.—Jude 4 does not say that God ordained the persons in question to final destruction, or that God ordained them to anything. The word ordained is prographo, which simply means to “write about beforehand; to make a subject of public notice,” and Jude merely mentions some of whom they had previously been notified and warned, who were to be condemned and avoided as unbelievers. He then refers, as illustrations, to the Jews who came out of Egypt, to the angels which kept not their first estate, and to the Sodomites, all of whom were destroyed for their own unbelief.

Rom. 9: 22 refers to the clay and the potter. The figure is borrowed from Jer. 18: 1-10, which should be read in connection. Verses 7-10 of Jeremiah 18 show that the great truth to be illustrated by the potter and the clay is this: that if we turn away from evil, God will turn from his threatened judgments against that evil; but if we turn from good to evil, then God will turn from the good he thought to do to us. God will make us a vessel of honor if we will let him, but if we will not yield to him, we mar the clay in his hands; and then he can only make us vessels of dishonor. We are in his power, and should not deceive ourselves by thinking that we can rebel against him and persist in an evil course, and yet be made vessels of honor.

On 1 Pet. 2: 8, read verse 7. To those who are disobedient, Christ will become, instead of a chief corner-stone, elect and precious, a stone of stumbling. And what people are “appointed” to in verse 8 is, not to be disobedient, but to stumble and fall into darkness and lose the benefits of Christ’s sacrifice, if they are disobedient.

Ex. 9: 16 does not assert that God had given Pharaoh existence; that he might destroy him. The expression, “Raised thee up,” refers simply to his coming to the throne of Egypt. (See margin, “Made thee stand.”) Pharaoh had proved himself an incorrigible rebel against God, and God had suffered long with him. Rom. 9: 22. He had determined to thwart God’s plans, yet God suffered him to come to the throne of Egypt, the mightiest nation then on earth, and exert all the power of the kingdom against his plans, that God might show how easily he could triumph over it all. There is not a text, nor an intimation, in all the Scriptures, that God ever gave any being existence, who, before he had a being, was foreordained, predestinated, and doomed, to inevitable destruction. A doctrine so horrible would at once nullify all the declarations of the Scriptures concerning the character of God, as a God of justice and mercy and love.

OUR SAVIOUR’S GREAT PROPHECY.

The Great Tribulation.

We dwell at length upon the great tribulation, because the location of the signs, the tokens of our Lord’s approach, depend upon our properly understanding this most important period. The signs are specially declared to be “after” the close of this tribulation. There could therefore be no wonderful occurrence during this tribulation, that could be understood as a “sign” of the nearness of his coming. The tribulation is the vital point, or key, to this whole prophetic discourse. If we cannot locate that, we shall be all at sea concerning any tokens of his appearing. Therefore the very object of our Saviour in answering the disciples’ question, “What shall be the sign of thy coming, and the end of the age?” would be frustrated, and the church left in darkness concerning this glorious event, so far as our Saviour’s discourse is concerned. When was it to commence? What power was to be the special agent of its infliction? When was it to terminate? At what period was to be its greatest intensity? Who were to be its special victims?

These are questions which are very pertinent, and should be well understood. We have partially answered some of them. But we need to consult history to answer fully all of them. “For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect’s sake those days shall be shortened.” “Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you: and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name’s sake.” Matt. 24: 21, 22, 9. “Then,” the adverb of time, introduces these terrible sorrows. It is from the Greek word “Tote,” defined by Greenfield as follows: “Adverb of time; then, at that time, then, i. e., afterwards, immediately after, upon that,” etc. Our Saviour had just been speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, warning his disciples to escape from it, by fleeing to the mountains, as soon as they saw “Jerusalem compassed with armies.” Luke 21: 20. This, as we have seen, occurred a short time before the final siege of that city.

It is remarkable that the first general persecution under Nero, A. D. 64-68, came just about that time. That emperor falsely charged the Christians with setting fire to Rome, and “an immense multitude” was apprehended and put to death. They were tortured, torn in pieces by wild beasts, crucified; large numbers burned, used as torches, being covered with inflammable material, Nero himself being a spectator of their miseries. From that time till Constantine claimed to be converted, there were more or less of these persecutions. Many authors set the number as ten, but the exact number of them is not certain. “There are very few periods during the first three centuries in which it can be said that the church enjoyed everywhere a complete immunity from persecution.” (See McClintock and Strong’s Encyclopedia, Art. Persecution.)

Under several of the Roman pagan emperors, the persecutions were terrible; vast multitudes of Christians being put to death by torture and sufferings, the most terrible their enemies could inflict. The most eminent and devoted servants of Jesus, like Polycarp, the companion of St. John, were martyred for their faith. The last general persecution of this series was under the reign of Diocletian, lasting for ten years, from A. D. 302-312. It is said that 700,000 Christians perished. Jerome, who lived at that time, is quoted as saying: “There is no day in the whole year to which the number of 5,000 martyrs cannot be ascribed, except only the first day of January.”—Fox, p. 35, Edition of 1850.

“It is supposed, say learned authors, that 3,000,000 perished in three centuries.”—“Religious Encyclopedia,” Art. Persecution.

Thus we see Christ’s words literally fulfilled, when the commencement of the great persecutions is given about the time of Jerusalem’s destruction. It began at the time, and its horrors were upon the very ones he declared would feel them, even the “elect”—his own disciples, as many of them probably perishing in sanguinary persecutions visited upon them by pagan Rome as would embrace every living Jew, at that period of their history; and the process continuing long ages. What folly, then, to apply this greatest of all tribulations to the destruction of Jerusalem, the siege of a single city, and to those hating Christ.

As we have seen in previous quotations from Scripture, Rome was to be the powerful agent in the great afflictions visited upon our Lord’s disciples. The fourth great monarchy, represented by the legs of iron (Daniel 2), the great and terrible beast (Daniel 7), the horn that waxed “exceeding great” (Daniel 8), St. John’s great red dragon (Revelation 12), the leopard beast (Revelation 13), and Babylon the great (Revelation 18),—all of these are persecuting powers, and symbolize that great colossus that bestrode the nations of earth for so many ages. This power was at its height when our Saviour was put to death, and it was the agent which murdered him. In every age since, it has hated his true disciples. It has appeared to the world in two grand phases, as a pagan heathen power and as a papal, or professed Christian power. These two phases are clearly symbolized in Daniel’s dreadful and terrible beast. (See Daniel 7.) At the first appearance the beast has ten horns; afterward three of these were plucked up, and a “little horn” appears, with a mouth speaking great things, to whom the saints were given for him “to wear out” for 1260 years. And in John’s Revelation (chapters 12, 13) this same division is manifested in the great red dragon and the leopard beast. The work of the latter is specially to make war upon the saints of God and overcome them. He continues his work the same length of time—1260 years, i. e., forty-two months.

We must conclude, therefore, that the severest sorrows of the saints of God were to be seen under the papal form of the Roman power, into whose hands the saints of God were specially given. Authors tell us that the wise men among the persecuted Christians under pagan Rome, realized this and looked for worse things to follow when antichrist should be fully revealed, standing in the temple or church of God, as St. Paul had declared he would. 2 Thess. 2: 5-7. It took a period of time to transform the Roman bishop into a full-fledged pope. When Constantine put an end to persecution, gave wealth and power into the hands of those whose religion he had nominally embraced, then corruption rapidly grew in the church. The two centuries, or thereabouts, intervening between Constantine’s conversion, A. D. 323, and 538, when Justinian made the bishop of Rome the head of all the churches of Christendom, with power to correct heretics, were filled with stirring events,—dissensions in the church, struggles to see who would be greatest, wonderful changes in religious doctrines, a constant corruption from the Bible standard of purity, and approximation more and more to the heathen customs prevalent in the Roman empire.

At first, toleration existed while the church was comparatively weak, and it had to look to the State for tolerance and protection. But the time came when the church, really comprehended in the hierarchy, with the pope at its head, vaulted into the saddle and rode the scarlet, bloody beast,—the Roman State,—domineering over all earthly governments, as St. John had predicted (Revelation 17), and thus became the lewd partner or mistress of wicked earthly powers, instead of the pure spouse of our Lord and Saviour. It was not long then till she became indeed “drunken with the blood of the saints and of the martyrs of Jesus.”

Then most truly the “great tribulation” was fully inaugurated; the black, ominous thunder cloud settled down over the meek disciples of Christ with a horror of great darkness, which scarcely a ray of light could penetrate. Ages of gloom, bigotry, terror, and despair dragged their weary length along, death and hades on the pale horse smiting their victims over a large portion of the habitable earth. No wonder they went up to heaven, “How long, O Lord, how long?”

We can spare space for but a very brief recital of the woes of these ages. But the words of our Lord, “In the world ye shall have tribulation,” met a wonderful fulfillment. Many were indeed “purified, made white and tried.”

Justinian, who exerted himself to his utmost to exalt the papacy, persecuted all dissenters. He supported the pope by the sword. He required all to accept one faith, and that heretics and schismatics should be killed. Multitudes suffered, and vast numbers fled from Roman territory to Persia. (See Taylor’s “Great Consummation,” pp. 82, 83.)

The papacy became more and more arrogant, its power continually increasing. In 755, Pepin, king of France, bestowed upon the pope the Exarchate of Ravenna, and thus he became a temporal as well as spiritual monarch. “The worship of images and relics was imposed in 788, the baptism of bells in 965, the compelled celibacy of the priests in 1000, the infallibility of the church in the year 1076, the sale of indulgences, 1190, transubstantiation was officially decreed 1215, and auricular confession officially imposed in the same year.”—Ib., p. 86.

The popes claimed by this time supreme authority over all kings and rulers of the earth. Crusade after crusade was preached against all “heretics.” In wars originated against the Mohammedans for the recovery of the “Holy Sepulcher,” it is said more than two million perished. Crusades were preached against the Albigenses and the Waldenses. These defended themselves bravely, and the papal legate, Bertrand, declared that in fifteen years 300,000 papal soldiers had fallen in the strife. But the papists boasted that, including the women and children, they had massacred more than two millions of the human family. “Persecute them with a strong hand,” said Pope Innocent III. “From thence to the Reformation,” writes Mede, “no man hath set down the account of them that have been cut off by the sword and torment.”—Ib., p. 91.

About 1198, this pope established what Catholics call the “Holy Inquisition,” the most terrible agency of bigotry and persecution ever invented by man or devil. For centuries it existed in large portions of Europe,—France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and was extended to America and India later. The number of its victims cannot be told. It was made the solemn duty of all Catholics to inform those appointed by the church, of any who were not supposed to be sound in the Catholic faith. The mere suspicion of being such was sufficient to subject one to arrest and confinement. The accused was never informed nor confronted with his accusers. Confession was extorted by the most terrible tortures,—the rack, the thumb-screw, and the most inhuman appliances ever invented were in common use, to extort confessions or recantation. Victims were arrested in the dead of night, and hurried away secretly to these terrible tribunals, incarcerated in dungeons and starved or half frozen, in darkness and solitary silence, where not a friend could be seen for months and years, till burned at the stake or finally starved to death. Their property was all confiscated to the church.

It is no wonder that when victims were thus arrested, they were mourned for as dead, by all their friends. None dared to appear in their defense. Multitudes of God's devoted servants were destroyed by this agency. In all the history of heathen persecution, there is nothing to equal the horror of this "Holy Inquisition." Nothing so terrible, so contrary to all principles of justice, love, and mercy, ever appeared among mankind as this. Yet all this was done in the name of the religion of the meek and lowly Jesus. The progress of the principles of the great Reformation finally caused its extinction. (See articles on the Inquisition in Buck's Theological Dictionary, McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia, and also in the Schaff Herzog.)

It is impossible correctly to estimate the number of victims tortured, persecuted, burnt, and slain by the Inquisition. The most authentic record of its work in any country, to be obtained, is in Spain. The historian Llorente unveils its cruelties. Here under various inquisitor generals, during a space of 129 years, according to this historian, as quoted by Dr. Croly, Spain lost 3,000,000 of its inhabitants by the Inquisition.

Protestantism was extirpated by these fearful cruelties. And so true religion would have been obliterated, according to our Saviour's words, in all countries, had not divine Providence specially interfered to "shorten" the great tribulation.

This was done at last by the great Protestant Reformation, through the advance of great light, the dissemination of the Scriptures, the raising up of valiant and devoted men who hazarded their lives, freely to spread abroad the truths of the blessed gospel. Princes defended them; the invention of printing spread abroad the truth; the discovery of America, after so many ages of human history had passed away, was a mighty incentive in enlightening the human mind and dispelling the gloom of the Dark Ages. As at the first advent, God's providence arranged that Christ's coming to our earth should be in a period of the greatest light of ancient times—the glory of the "Augustan age," so, before his coming the second time, the midnight blackness of the Dark Ages shall be dispelled, and light and truth shine everywhere, so that all may be permitted to know, if they will, the signs of his second advent.

But during the mighty struggle between the Reformers and the papal harlot, for several generations the people of God had to taste the bitter cup to its dregs. Greater persecutions were inaugurated than ever before. Indeed, the older the papacy grew, the more bloodthirsty it became, until its power was taken from it by the triumph of gospel light, as the result of the Reformation. We have no good reason to believe that Rome would not persecute as much now as ever, had she the power to do so. "Rome never changes." This is her boast. Says Mede: "From the beginning of the Jesuits (1540) to the year 1580 [only forty years], 900,000 orthodox Christians were put to death by the hand of the executioner alone." Bowen writes of Julius II: "Two hundred thousand persons are said to have perished in the wars carried on chiefly at the instigation of this furious and bloodthirsty pope."—History of the Popes, Vol. III, p. 290. According to Virginius, Pope Paul IV, in four years, from 1555–1559, put to death by the Inquisition, torture, starvation, or the fire, 150,000

Protestants. In France it is said that more than one hundred thousand Huguenots were slain in three months. Some two hundred thousand persons perished in the religious wars and persecutions of the Netherlands, and immense multitudes perished in other countries. But what satisfaction is there in following the horrible items one by one, attending the pathway of the "mother of harlots," "drunken with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus"? Nothing of the kind in all history compares with it. Those desiring to do so, should read "Fox's Book of Martyrs" and other books of that character. Taylor's "Great Consummation" gives a wonderful summing up of such items, from which the reader can gain much valuable data.

Suffice it to say, authors of note variously estimate the numbers whose death was caused in one way or another by that great apostate power, the "man of sin," the papacy, as varying from fifty to one hundred million. All these were classed as "heretics." They were of those who would not accept the pope of Rome as head of the church, or subscribe to his dogmas. The church authorities themselves did not put most of these to death, but they instigated the secular powers, whose subservient tools they were, to do it. The papal authorities incited those terrible wars, and expressed great gratification when multitudes of dissenters were put to death. Volumes might be filled with the horrors of these persecutions. But nothing but the judgment day can reveal them in all their terrible atrocity. Then these monsters in human form will meet their just reward.

THE WORK IN AUSTRALIA.

OTHER pressing duties prevented my writing to the REVIEW by the last mail, an omission for which I presume ample reparation will be made by others. We are exceedingly grateful for the attention which is being bestowed upon our work by the General Conference, and for the help which has been sent us; and the readers of the REVIEW will be more interested in what they may have to say of their impressions in reference to our work than what we might say who are more closely identified with it. I trust, however, that we shall not surfeit the readers of the REVIEW on the subject of Australia.

Upon her arrival in this country, sister White seemed to be blessed with unwonted strength and energy, and was enabled to bear an important part through the general meetings which were held soon after they reached here. But since that time, she has been greatly afflicted with rheumatism and general weakness, of which she still continues to be a victim. Her sufferings have been marked by a decrease in flesh of nearly twenty-five pounds. For some time she was not able to leave her home, but now she ministers the word upon the Sabbath and a few other occasions, though it is with evident pain and suffering that she does so. We are hoping and praying for her recovery, that she may be enabled to perform the work for which she was doubtless sent here by divine Providence. Though her coming has already proved of great good, there is much more that needs to be done. This we believe she will yet be able to do. The family is further afflicted by the sufferings of sister Fannie Bolton, who injured her foot while in Sydney, immediately after her arrival. Not sufficient attention was given to the injury at the outset; and for the most of the time, her foot has been entirely useless, and she has suffered great pain from it. At present there is but little improvement in her case, and some fears are entertained of a permanent disability. In these afflictions sister White and her family deserve and have the deep sympathy of all the friends of the cause. Brother W. C. White, in company with brother Daniells, attended the New Zealand Conference, and it is no small disappointment to all, that sister White was unable to be at that meeting.

The work which we have in hand encounters the same difficulties in this country that it has in other parts of the world. Prejudice and unpopularity are doing all that they can to impede the progress of the truth for these last days. We are still trying to press it home upon the hearts of the people, and we have continually to be thankful that at least some success attends our efforts; but it is very evident that the Lord is doing far more than we are. His Spirit is at work upon the hearts of many honest people, and they are coming to the light and knowledge of the truth, in many instances with but little assistance from human agencies. A family of Scandinavians embraced the truth in Queensland about a year ago. They love it, and are growing in the truth, although they have never seen but one Sabbath-keeper. A Baptist missionary, a German by birth, stopped with them one night, and endeavored to show them the error into which they had fallen; but he received such evidence of the soundness of their position, that "his sleep brake from him," and in the morning he had to confess that he was greatly troubled over what he had heard, and after a few exhortations, they allowed him to depart. Recently he returned and spent another night with them; and he told them that since his first visit, he had been keeping the Sabbath of the Lord, and not only that, but he was trying to teach it to others. By report, he is an earnest, devoted Christian, and we hope will become useful in the work which he has espoused. In one of the interior towns, a family of influence and respectability was entertaining two of our canvassers, when the subject of the Sabbath happened to come up in a casual way, so that the brethren felt called upon to make their position known. The result was, that the family embraced the Sabbath then and there, and are now rejoicing in the truth that they have found. Quite a number have begun to keep the Sabbath in the city of Launceston, Tasmania, where as yet no public labor has been bestowed. I received very lately a letter from a man in another interior town, who has never seen a Sabbath-keeper, but he has read a few of our publications, and has been keeping the Sabbath for six months all alone. He seems to be an earnest and devoted Christian.

We have concentrated our laborers somewhat. Brother Hare has withdrawn from Tasmania, and joined brother Steed in a tent effort at Paramatta, near Sydney. Brother Curtis has come over from South Australia, and is laboring with brother W. L. H. Baker, at Echuca, on the Murray River, the border between Victoria and New South Wales. When we last heard from these meetings, they were progressing with an encouraging degree of interest. The extensive sale of our books has prepared the way for colportage and other labor. Our canvassers going over the ground, repeatedly say that they find many people who are hungering and thirsting for the light of truth; and they are oftentimes questioned in regard to the Sabbath, by those who do not know who they are, and seem to be troubled in reference to what they have read. I believe that in the future much will be accomplished by this line of work.

Our canvassing work still maintains a good degree of success, notwithstanding the severe financial crisis which is upon the colonies. There were over one thousand seven hundred orders taken during the month of March, which will probably total between six and seven thousand dollars in value. The office does the most of the delivering for the canvassers, so that they can pursue their work without interruption, and the plan works to mutual advantage in many ways, and gives quite general satisfaction.

In the world around us there is a state of unrest and turmoil which reminds us of our Saviour's words, when he foretold the condition of things in the last days. Wholesale murders, robberies for lust and money and hatred, crimes of every grade and shade, are becoming almost too common for especial mention or notice.

This colony is agitated at present over the general elections which are to take place on the 20th inst (April). At that time a new Parliament will be elected. Political matters are managed so differently here from what they are in the United States, that it takes a long time for one to get the run of them. Members of Parliament are not elected for any length or term of years, but during the pleasure of the "crown;" and when the exigencies of the time seem to demand it, Parliament "goes to the people." That is, the existing Parliament is dissolved by the proclamation of the governor representing the queen, and new writs are issued, calling for an election to take place on a specified date. There are not in these colonies two distinct political parties, as in the United States, but we have what is called the "government," and

THOUGHTS ON ROMANS 9:11-22

In view of the numerous queries which are raised on this Scripture, a few more thoughts on the subject may not be out of place. The mistake generally made on such portions of Scripture, is in supposing that the writer is discussing the question of eternal salvation, or everlasting destruction, as a result of the judgment in reference to moral character. But, if, instead of such a supposition, we confine the statements of the apostle to the question he had in hand, all difficulties will disappear.

In the fore part of the chapter Paul alludes to a subject which he often dwells upon; namely, the coming of the Gentiles into the covenants of promise, as a spiritual seed, thus coming to be called his people, who before were not his people; spoken of also as provoking the Jews to jealousy by a people who were not a people, and angering them by a foolish nation, and being found of them that sought not after him, and manifesting himself to them that asked not for him. (See Rom. 9:25; 10:19, 20, etc.)

Then he illustrates the election of certain ones to certain blessings by the cases of Isaac, Jacob and Esau, and Pharaoh. In the case of Jacob and Esau, what was the election? Was one elected, or chosen, and predestinated, to everlasting life, and the other to eternal destruction?—Not by any means; but it was, that "the elder should serve the younger."

But does it not say that God loved Jacob and hated Esau? And are not all those whom God hates doomed to everlasting destruction?—Everything that God hates or abhors, on account of moral obliquity, will, of course, be destroyed. But that is not the kind of hate here spoken of. The word "hate" is here used in the same sense in which it occurs in such passages as Luke 14:26: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." This is explained by Matt. 10:37: "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me."

So the word means, when applied to one object as compared with another, that one is to be loved less than the other. We may then read Luke 14:26, as follows: "If any man come to me, and love not his father and mother, etc., less than he loves me, he cannot be my disciple." This is plain and consistent. In the lexicons we accordingly find this as one of the definitions of this word: "In N. T. to regard with less affection, love less, esteem less."

What is said, therefore, in Rom. 9:13, is this: "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I loved less than Jacob." This difference of regard was doubtless based on God's foreknowledge of the character of the children respectively. And seeing that Jacob would be the better character, and more fitted to rule, had not God a perfect right to regard him with more favor, to appoint, or elect, him to a leading position, though he was the younger of the two?

And in this God was not unrighteous. He did Esau no wrong, but he did Jacob a great favor. And so in extending the blessings of the gospel to all the world, he did the Jews no wrong, but he did the Gentiles a great favor.

In this regard, the Lord further declares, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion." He does not say, I will save whom I will, and damn whom I please, without respect to any action on their part. The mercy and compassion have reference to such distinctions in the bestowment of favor as God sees fit to make in this world.

But the rule has also a reverse side: "Whom he will he hardeneth." This he does, not by any direct action, but by placing them in positions where they can show out their natural dispositions by refusing to obey, and rejecting the mercies which are offered. According to verse 22, God does not cast off the workers of iniquity until he has borne long with them. He does not send any people strong delusion (2 Thess. 2:10, 11) till he has first set before them the truth, and given them an opportunity and an exhortation to obey it, and they have refused to receive it, or to love it.

It was so with Pharaoh. For years, while he was coming up to manhood, and to the throne of Egypt, God knew the kind of man he was, and what he would attempt to do, but he did not interfere by his providence to prevent his taking the throne, but rather promoted his accession, that he might show his power to counteract all that Pharaoh could do to hinder the accomplishment of his plans. Therefore he says, "For this same purpose have I raised thee up," not for this same purpose have I given thee existence, that I might damn thee, but "I have raised thee up," or caused thee to take the throne of Egypt, "that I might show my power in thee," in triumphing over all thine opposition. Thus he caused him, or allowed him, to come to the throne, and enter into the struggle against God.

And even then, God gave him opportunity after opportunity to yield and repent, by requesting him to let Israel go, and sending judgments when he refused. But every time he refused, his heart became harder because of his own action. In this way, only, did God harden Pharaoh's heart, and the guilt of resisting God was all his own.

Then the principle underlying all this work, is set forth by the illustration of the potter, who out of the clay will make a vessel unto honor, if the clay does not mar itself in his hands. In the world of providence, God has good reasons for all his preferments, though we may not be able to see them. He never acts arbitrarily. And when we come to the sphere of moral obligation, the results of which affect the issues of eternity, this one rule holds; viz., Believe and be saved, or disbelieve and perish.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

The Shortening and Close of the Great Tribulation.

In the great prophecy of our Lord, the cutting short of the great persecution before the expiration of the allotted period of 1260 years, is one of its remarkable features. No pretended exposition of this discourse would be complete without this point being made prominent. And no events claimed to be a fulfillment of this tribulation can meet the specifications of this prophecy, unless a conspicuous position is found for the cutting short of such tribulation. The great tribulation, when it had reached the zenith of its power, and all flesh opposed to it seemed about to be utterly crushed, was then to be diminished, cut short, and at last cease entirely, even before the period foretold in prophecy for its supremacy had terminated. This was to be done so that true religion should not be destroyed from the earth. We notice now several scriptures where this cessation of persecution is clearly revealed or inferred:—

"For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." Matt. 24:21, 22. "And except the Lord cut short the days, no person could survive; but on account of the chosen, whom he has selected, he has cut short the days." Mark 13:20, Diaglott Version.

"And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end." Dan. 7:25, 26.

"And they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. . . . But the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits. And they that understand among the people shall instruct many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help." Chapter 11:31-34.

"Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea! for the Devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man child. And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent. And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood. And the earth helped the woman; and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the flood which the dragon cast out of his mouth." Rev. 12:12-16.

In these and other scriptures, this fearful period of sorrow and tribulation upon the true people of God is plainly brought to view, and in every instance the curtailment of it through the interference of providential agencies is foretold. And the connection in each case will show that this cutting short of the tribulation preceded but a little season the great day when Christ shall come again. The period of time is referred to in each of these texts, when the people of God should be given into the hands of the Roman power, "a time [i. e., a year of 360 days], and times [plural, 720 prophetic days], and half a time [180 days]," making 1260 prophetic days or years, beginning when Justinian made the Roman bishop head over all churches, A. D. 538, and ending, consequently, A. D. 1798, when the French took the pope a prisoner, and carried him into captivity, where he died in exile. Daniel says, "The saints of the Most High" were "given into" the hands of this power for this period, to "wear out," "until" its expiration. "Until" is an adverb of time, signifying how long this wearing out was to continue. Therefore when it closed, they were no longer given into his hand for this purpose, and their persecution would cease. Daniel's language would lead us to expect their persecution would continue to 1798, but our Saviour says that for a special reason this tribulation was to be cut short, that all of God's people might not be destroyed from the earth. After the "many days" of chapter 11, they were to be "holpen with a little help." "The earth," i. e., the earthly powers, were to interfere, that the great dragon might not with his "flood" of persecution, agony, and woe swallow up forever all of the saints of God, so says the revealer. The days were shortened for the "elect's sake," says Jesus. How wonderfully were these predictions fulfilled! For more than one hundred years true believers have had rest from persecution.

God's providence raised up those mighty Reformers, Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, Knox, and a host of others. The lately invented printing-presses scattered Bibles like leaves of autumn. Light shone in the places of darkness. Hoary errors were discovered, men's consciences were aroused, and liberty broke the bands of tyranny. Freedom to think, freedom to believe the truth of God, took the place of servile bigotry, and again the truth of God prevailed.

Rome was at the height of its power, when the Reformers began to preach. But then she rapidly began to wane. In England, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, Norway, Sweden, and many other countries, after desperate struggles, the shackles of the man of sin were broken. Protestant princes rose up, and as the prophets had predicted, protected the rights of believers. One after another the kingdoms of Europe proclaimed liberty of conscience and freedom to worship God. The Inquisition went down. The pope's anathemas were disregarded; his threats and admonitions despised. The Jesuits were even put under the ban of the pope himself, because of their unpopularity.

For some fifty years of the last preceding century, freedom of conscience prevailed. So for some fifty years before the expiration of the 1260 years, in 1798, the tribulation was cut short, as our Saviour predicted it would be. How marvelous is this great fact! And how wonderfully his prediction was verified! No man can deny these facts. They stand out in bold relief upon the pages of Scripture and history—the prediction and its verification.

Was the great tribulation at the destruction of Jerusalem, and did Christ come then?

1. This great tribulation could not have occurred when Jerusalem was destroyed; for it was to be experienced by Christ's disciples, "the elect," and none of them were in Jerusalem at that time, but had all escaped far away to Pella. It was the wicked apostate Jews who suffered in that siege, for rejecting Christ and persecuting his followers. Matt. 24:21, 22.

2. It cannot be shown that the siege of Jerusalem was the greatest tribulation that ever had occurred, or ever would; for all the calamities spoken of in history as then being inflicted, were said to have also been experienced when Jerusalem was taken by the king of Babylon. (See Lamentations of Jeremiah, especially chapter 4:10; Deut. 28:53, 54, and connection.)

3. Should we admit that the great tribulation spoken of by Christ was upon the wicked instead of upon his own disciples, we should have a plain contradiction in the Bible. For Daniel says at the time the dead are to be raised and the great prince Michael (i. e., Christ) stands up, that "there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation." Dan. 12:1-3. It would be impossible to have two different times of trouble, either of which would be greater than any other that ever occurred. But the connection of each of these mentioned makes it clear that the tribulation our Saviour speaks of is upon his own disciples, while the time of trouble Daniel foretells is upon the wicked after probation closes. So all is clear. Never did the saints of God suffer such awful persecutions as those inflicted by the Church of Rome during 1260 years. And never will the wicked see such sorrow as when Christ stands up to reign in his glory. In view of either of these, the destruction of Jerusalem becomes a minor event, and could not have been the tribulation our Saviour referred to.

4. The great tribulation is evidently the same event as is brought to view in an earlier part of Christ's discourse, where he declares his disciples shall be persecuted, killed, and "hated of all nations" for his "name's sake." Matt. 24:9; Luke 21:17. But this could not have been fulfilled at the destruction of that one city, where only Jews and Romans were involved. Neither could it have a complete fulfillment till long after, when his disciples should be known all over the habitable world.

The "great tribulation" was to come as foretold by the prophet Daniel, whom our Saviour specially names in close connection. He allotted a period of time for its continuance, even 1260 prophetic days, or years, during which the fourth beast should "wear out" the saints of God. Other prophets made this same period prominent. These terrible persecutions before the church in the apostles' day, were well understood by the inspired writers, Daniel and John both mentioning them prominently, and both specifying the time of their continuance. There can be no reasonable doubt but that our Lord had this period in view when he speaks of "those days"—the very ones foretold hundreds of years before by the prophet he named. This fact excludes the destruction of Jerusalem wholly from being the "tribulation" Jesus speaks of; for the disciples were all outside of it when it was besieged.

6. In view of the fact that God had foretold a specified period for this tribulation, there is great force in the Saviour's prediction that "those days" of "tribulation" were to be "shortened," for the sake of his chosen, or "elect." How could any period be "shortened" when none had ever been specified? History wonderfully confirms Christ's prediction; for those great persecutions were wholly brought to an end some fifty years before the 1260 years closed, in 1798, and that, too, when they had been most severe just a little time before. But no period of time had been predicted during which Jerusalem should be destroyed, and none of her days of suffering were shortened. She was wholly destroyed, and all her people carried into captivity. Hence it is impossible to make our Saviour's prophecy concerning the great tribulation, and its being shortened for the elect's sake, fit the destruction of Jerusalem!

7. The position of Universalists and of popular theology that the "great tribulation" and the coming of Christ all occurred at the destruction of Jerusalem, are still further shown to be untenable by the fact that even the signs to precede his advent do not take place until the tribulation is past, much less the advent itself. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heaven shall be shaken: and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Matt. 24:29, 30.

So even if it were granted that the tribulation was at the destruction of Jerusalem, the language would positively forbid placing the coming of Christ there also; for not even the signs of his coming are to take place till the tribulation spoken of is wholly in the past. Yet Universalists and popular theology blindly confound them, and seek to make the tribulation and Christ's coming take place at the same time, and really compose but one and the same event. They spiritualize away the personal advent, and make it mean the infliction of judgments upon the Jewish nation. But the language utterly forbids such an application. History makes not a single record of such events transpiring at the siege of that city, as the sun being darkened, or the moon or the stars falling, to say nothing of the visible appearance of the Son of God. Yet Josephus, the historian who wrote fully all the particulars of the siege, was on the ground. None of these things did occur there, for the very good reason that our Saviour's words forbid such an application.

The signs do not take place till long after Jerusalem is destroyed. "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth, distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring." "And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory." Luke 21:24, 25, 27. Long ages must elapse from the treading down of Jerusalem, even till the probation of the Gentile nations is about consummated, ere the signs should be given, and, at their close, the Son of God should be seen coming in glory to gather his people. In view of these facts, how blind must be the exegesis that can relegate all these wonderful events back to the siege of a single city, and spiritualize away the most glorious event recorded in Scripture, making Christ's coming in kingly splendor with his holy retinue of angels, to be really the march of Titus, a heathen Roman general with his cohorts of brutal soldiery!

This view we are combating, in effect, makes our Saviour, in an address given wholly to his own disciples, utterly ignore the great afflictions of his own followers during the long and terrible persecutions of ages they were to endure, and confine himself wholly to the Jews, who had rejected him, though not one of them heard his discourse. It belittles Christ's language, and really falsifies it; for the destruction of Jerusalem was not the greatest tribulation that ever had occurred, or ever would; and his disciples were wholly saved from its terrors. This view makes nonsense of some of the sublimest utterances our Lord ever gave, in which he portrays the glorious deliverances of his people at his second appearing, from all the sorrows of this world of woe, and their eternal salvation, as they are gathered by the angels from the four quarters of the earth to dwell forever with him in his glory, ascribing these statements to the coming of a Roman general to besiege a single city. How could men be more blindly led astray by their prejudice and hatred of the glorious doctrine of the second advent? G. I. B.

A GREAT VICTORY.

THE victory which has already been won by the Sabbath of the Lord, is one that should call for devout thankfulness from every person who loves the truth of God, and who desires to see it prosper in the earth. We do not here refer to the fact that there are now about forty thousand observers of the Sabbath in this country, when forty years ago there were but a few hundreds, although this of itself is a victory worthy of note; but we allude to what we consider a far greater victory,—the fact that the Sabbath has fairly gained the attention of the people of this country.

It has been a common thing among Seventh-day Adventists to speak and write about the "Sabbath question;" and this question has been a reality, and those who have received the light upon this important point of Bible truth have, with the help of God, pressed this question home to the consciences of men with such success that many thousands have been rescued from adherence to the traditional Sunday, and have accepted in its place the scriptural Sabbath of the Lord. Yet all these years, during which time the leaven of truth has been steadily working its silent way, until very lately, the Sabbath question has never approached any such general prominence as it has recently assumed. The interest in the Sabbath has generally been of a local nature, and has been confined to places where our laborers have presented its claims, or where our publications have excited an interest. The case at the present time is far different; and the Sabbath question has suddenly sprung into prominence everywhere. There is no doubt that our laborers and our literature have contributed to bring about this result; but there is much interest in this subject that can only be attributed to the direct work of the Spirit of God reining up the people, that they may be prepared to act intelligently in the choice which will be forced upon them,—to worship God in the observance of his Sabbath, or the beast, in the keeping of the festival day of its appointing.

The change that has come over the public mind in this respect is indeed remarkable. A few years ago, outside of the periodicals issued by seventh-day observers, which at that time were few and far between, one might look in vain in the public prints for any allusion to the Sabbath. Now, how different! Scarcely a paper appears which does not contain allusions to this subject. Editors are writing about it; ministers are taking it for the subject of their discourses; law-makers are considering it; and in all this discussion, gleams of the true Sabbath light which emanate from Christ, the Lord of the Sabbath, and which is reflected upon one day—the seventh—are seen and felt by those upon whose hearts the Spirit of God is at work. Thus to gain the attention of the present busy world, is of itself a great victory. It has been the policy of the ministers of the popular churches to smother discussion upon this subject; they have deprecated every attempt to examine the foundation upon which the Sunday structure rests. They have acted very much like an architect, who, having erected a building upon a weak foundation, does his best to divert public attention away from it, lest its true condition become manifest, and his reputation as a careful builder be lost. Every one who has ever endeavored to examine publicly the foundation upon which the Sunday structure rests, can testify that the above comparison is true to life, and the popular ministry have well known that their strength was to "sit still."

But the day of silence upon this subject is apparently passed. Free and full investigation can be stifled no longer. The Sabbath has indeed become a "question," and the clergy can no longer stifle the investigation. They have themselves unwittingly helped to bring about this result in their blind endeavors to return to a stricter observance of Sunday. To return to such an observance of Sunday, from which the people of this country have surely drifted away, cannot be done without an examination of the whole ground of Sunday theology. Thus the very thing which they have feared—the investigation of the foundation upon which the Sunday rests—has been precipitated by their own action.

Another thing which will intensify this discussion is the fact that people at the present time are not inclined to take anything for granted. The modern custom of a thorough examination of a controverted subject, extends to religious subjects as well as to those of a secular character. Modern thinkers have an impression that there never was a time since the human family existed, when men were as capable of reasoning and forming correct conclusions as they are now. This being the case, the fact that their fathers believed a certain thing, does not make it necessary that they shall do so. They want to know what reason their fathers had; and if it is not sufficient to satisfy them, they promptly reject injustice of their disfranchisement at the hands of others.

Nor does the fact that the evil cannot be averted furnish a good reason why every good citizen should not raise his voice and his hand against it. Evil is to be combated in this world wherever it is found, simply because it is evil, without reference to what the result will be. If bad votes cannot be put in the minority, they still ought, for the sake of the duty which every American citizen owes to the government which protects his rights, to be diluted with good votes as much as possible. If it is a duty to pray for rulers, it may well be considered a duty to answer our prayers as far as is possible by our votes.

L. A. S.

THE WORSHIP OF "THE BEAST AND HIS IMAGE."

As events point more and more strongly to the proximity of the time when Rev. 13:12 and kindred prophecies will have their fulfillment, it becomes every one who would escape falling into the snare of such worship and being overtaken by the judgments denounced against it, to be sure of the ground upon which he stands, as regards the duty devolving upon him in the coming crisis. It is not enough always to know that a certain prophecy is going to be fulfilled; it is often essential to know how it will be fulfilled,—to know with some degree of definiteness what will be the particular manifestations by which the prophecy will have its fulfillment; for if we are mistaken in these, we cannot occupy the right position with reference to it. When an evil is coming on the earth, it is of little avail to know that it is coming, unless we are able to recognize the nature of the events by which that evil makes its appearance.

No unfulfilled prophecies will bear more careful study than will those relating to the worship of "the beast and his image."

Among those who are looking for the fulfillment of this prophecy, there is probably no question as to what constitutes—in a general sense at least—this worship. It is agreed that it will be some act which will acknowledge the blasphemous claims of the "beast" or the authority of the "image" formed to it. It will be obedience to the demands made and sought to be enforced by these two powers.

But just what the beast and his "image" are going to demand by way of an acknowledgment of their power and authority, may not be so well understood. It may and should, however, be known where the dividing line is between what constitutes the worship of God and the worship of that which is not God.

The question is very likely to arise—has indeed already arisen—as to whether the first day of the week may be observed as a day of rest in obedience to the commandments of these antichristian powers, without making the observer guilty of the false worship to which the prophecy calls attention, and against which it utters its warning. This is an important point; for it is likely to become a practical question with many in the near future.

It may be noticed in the first place, that no person is under any obligation to yield obedience to such a command from any earthly power. Every person has a right to work six days in every week, for the language of the commandment is, "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work." These words God spake with his own voice, and the right which they confer upon mankind is a God-given right, confirmed by an authority beside which all opposing human authority becomes an absolute nullity.

But the language of the commandment imparts something more than a mere permission to labor upon six days of the week. It says, "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work." It imparts something in the nature of an obligation.

The propriety of its doing so can be readily seen. Six days of the week are left to be devoted to man and his temporal interests, but the seventh day is the Lord's,—the day upon which he rested, and which he blessed and sanctified. This day must therefore be kept distinct and separate from all other days, and of course the means for doing this must not be likewise employed in behalf of other days, or the distinction would be lost. If mankind should regularly refrain from work upon two days of the week—the seventh day and some other day—in the manner prescribed by the commandment for the seventh day, there would be nothing in it to show which day it was that God rested upon, and which he sanctified and blessed,—nothing to signify that God created the heavens and the earth in six days, and rested upon the seventh,—and thus the purpose of the institution would entirely fail. The observance of the commandment by rest upon the seventh day would be nullified by the like rest upon the other day. It is absolutely essential, therefore, that the six working days should be kept distinct in character from that day which God has set apart for himself.

But the impropriety of resting upon both the seventh and first days of the week does not stop here; for the first day is a rival Sabbath. Peculiarly offensive to God, therefore, must any act be which is an acknowledgment of the claims of this false Sabbath to the sanctity and reverence due his own day. In what other way could such observance of the first day, by one who knew its claims to be false, be taken, but as an insult to the Creator? In what other way could the Creator himself regard it?

The person who refrains from labor upon the first day of the week, thereby acknowledges either the claims of the day, or the authority of the power which seeks to enforce such rest. He may not "keep" the day as the Sabbath day should be kept, according to the spirit of the Sabbath commandment—his observance of it may be one of form only; but this in the eyes of others at least, is an observance of the day, for only each individual can examine the thoughts and intents of his own heart. The eyes of the world around us cannot, or at least do not, penetrate beyond the letter of our Sabbath observance,—the outward refraining from labor; this is all, therefore, that can be asked of any one in enforcing the worship of the "beast and his image," so far as that worship relates to Sunday observance. This also is all that the authors of the first-day Sabbath ever asked as that which should constitute its observance. Sunday was never blessed, sanctified, and made holy; as a rival to the true Sabbath, it is sufficient that the religious world should be induced to rest and attend religious worship upon that day instead of on the seventh day. The edicts which gave rise to Sunday observance never commanded anything more; nor is anything more exacted by the apostate church which has ever been the especial guardian of the day. Every intelligent person knows that the Roman Catholic Church does not demand of its members the observance of Sunday in the spirit of Isa. 58:13. That is the observance demanded by God with reference to his day,—an observance which reaches to the words and the thoughts of the heart. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth;" but the "beast," the papacy, is not a spirit, and demands no spiritual worship. In those countries where the reign of the papacy is most supreme, the presence of the devout worshiper at mass on Sunday morning, is deemed by the priest nothing incompatible with his presence at a bull fight in the afternoon; and in our own land it is well enough known that the Catholic communicant, having attended religious services in the morning, is at liberty to spend the remainder of the day just about as he pleases. The Catholic Church does not demand Sunday observance as an act of worship to God, but as an act of homage to itself, and there could be no reason in its demanding anything more than an observance consisting of outward forms.

To rest upon the first day of the week, therefore, in obedience to the demands of the power which seeks to enforce the worship of the "image to the beast," is to do that which constitutes the worship of that "image," for it is an acknowledgment of its authority as much as it can be acknowledged through that institution which the "beast" has held up as the distinctive sign of its power; and as such it is an act in the highest degree offensive to God. It lowers his Sabbath before the world to a level with the spurious rival Sabbath which is of satanic origin. It nullifies entirely the act of resting upon the preceding seventh day. To worship God, and an anti-Christian power also, is to worship the latter power alone. God demands that we should worship and serve him always, and him only; the Devil is satisfied to let us serve God part of the time and himself the rest of the time, well knowing that we are thereby serving him all the time, and God not at all.

With this view, the language of the prophecy itself seems to harmonize; for the text says (Rev. 13:12) that this power causeth the earth and them which dwell therein "to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed." If the previously given and accepted interpretation of this text be correct, the meaning is that the ground as well as the people who live upon it worship "the beast;" and certainly the ground can do nothing more than merely to rest upon the day which this anti-Christian power will command to be observed. That resting, if this interpretation be right, is by the text called "worship."

We do not think also that any person can afford to surrender, under such circumstances, his right, before mentioned, to six days of secular employment in every week. He who surrenders a God-given right in obedience to an arbitrary demand by any earthly power, merely as an act of homage to itself, makes himself a slave.

We think therefore that it should be a matter of conscience with all observers of the true Sabbath, not to comply with the demand to rest on the first day of the week. However, "let each be fully persuaded in his own mind." It is certain that they, and all others, have a right not to do so, and we think it equally evident that to do so would be to make a compromise that would be very displeasing to God.

God will surely vindicate his word; and those who stand upon that word need have no fear but that they will be vindicated with it. Of course, it must not be forgotten that in such a matter every person should act with discretion, taking care not to disturb others, or to make himself needlessly obnoxious to any. Nothing is more unnecessary, nothing would be more unwise, than that any one should make a needless and obnoxious display of his antagonism to Sunday rest. It is enough that a person should quietly and unostentatiously pursue his secular duties upon the first day of the week, and it would certainly be great folly for any one to bring needless trouble in this respect either upon himself or upon the cause of the truth which he professes.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Will there be Special Signs Preceding Christ's Second Coming, to Show that it is Near?

THE above is an important question. The nature of the answer will distinguish between Advent believers and those who are not. The great mass of professed Christians seem to have the opinion that no knowledge can be obtained concerning the nearness of our Saviour's return; that if he comes personally at all, it will be as suddenly and unexpectedly as a clap of thunder from a clear sky. The whole world—disciples and unbelievers alike—will be utterly astonished at his appearing, having not the slightest expectation of his being near. And there are multitudes of professed Christians who believe that he will never come at all, personally, to this earth. Strange ideas, indeed, for those to cherish who read their Bibles! Still, of course, can have no thought of special signs being given to herald his approach, no faith that our Lord himself gave special tokens by which his believing disciples might know when his return was close at hand.

And yet, no fact can be made clearer from the sacred page. The whole Bible contains numerous references to it. His coming to the earth in judgment is the grandest event revealed in the great scheme of human salvation. The destiny of all men, dead and living, depends upon it. Human probation then closes forever. Eternal life to the righteous, eternal condemnation to the wicked, are then bestowed. All should have a special interest in such an event. It is the special theme of the New Testament.

The certainty of Christ's visible, personal coming must be accepted by every one who truly believes the Bible. The two shining angels who stood by as Christ personally ascended to heaven, as the disciples' eager eyes gazed at his departing form, said:

"This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts 1:11. It was he whom their hands had touched, who had eaten in their presence the fish and the honeycomb, after his resurrection. Even doubting Thomas could not deny his personality. They now saw him borne away to heaven. This "same Jesus" will come "in like manner." This can be no figure of speech; it must be a literal, personal appearing, or they told an untruth.

Said the great apostle: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. 4:16-18. It is the "Lord himself" who will thus descend—a personal presence, to whom all his people will gather and remain with him forever.

"Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." Rev. 1:7. If such language as found in these quotations is not literal, then none in the Bible can be relied upon as such. There are multitudes of similar statements scattered through Holy Writ.

May we know anything about the nearness of this sublime event? What saith the Scripture?—"Ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness." 1 Thess. 5:4, 5.

St. Paul here states an important fact. The disciples will not be overtaken as a thief. They will be "looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God." 2 Pet. 3:12. Why will they be thus "looking," while upon all the rest of the world that great event comes as a thief? We can now intelligently answer the question used as the heading of this chapter. We will do it in the words of our Saviour: "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." Luke 21:25-28. "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [margin, he] is near, even at the door." Matt. 24:33.

There are then to be "signs" indicating Christ's coming, before it will take place? So says the Lord himself. When these are fulfilled, then we may be so certain of his nearness, that we may "know" he is very near? So he positively declares. Why not then believe it?

At the beginning of his great discourse, the disciples asked him, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" "Jesus answered." He gives a catalogue of the signs to be seen (which it is our purpose fully to notice). Then, says he, when these are fulfilled, we may "know" he is near. And these things are left on record for his church in all ages. They are as much a part of his instruction to his followers, as what he says of repentance, conversion, faith, and obedience. Indeed, how can we have faith in his "word," when we ignore or disbelieve what he says about his second coming?

What is a "sign," and what its object? The Greek word, semeion, from which "sign" is translated, according to Greenfield, means "a mark, token, by which anything is known or distinguished; a token, pledge, assurance; a proof, evidence, convincing token; a sign, wonder, i. e., a remarkable event, wonderful appearance, extraordinary phenomenon; a potent prodigy," etc. A sign is, in short, some remarkable event or something wonderful, indicating the approach of some other and far more important event. The signs of Christ's coming were to be striking, wonderful occurrences, preceding for a short time his appearing, as evidences of its nearness. Hence he says of these, when they should occur, his people might "know" he himself would soon appear. He would not conceal from his true followers the approach of an event of such thrilling interest to them. His love for them is too great to keep them in ignorance of that which they would be so anxious to know, and which so intimately concerned their welfare. Hence he tells them of the "signs" that would indicate his approach.

THEOSOPIY.

PROBABLY no form of religious or semi-religious belief has been coming to the front faster of late than that which goes under the name "Theosophy." It seems to be something into which many men naturally drift after having let go their hold upon the Bible, something which furnishes a sort of vague interpretation of spiritual things, and yet is too vague to present its fallacies clearly to view, so as to admit of exposure. It is akin to Spiritualism, and thousands will no doubt find it easy, when the latter has become more prominent, to step from the one into the other.

A correspondent of the New York World, who signs himself "A Theosophist," took occasion recently to volunteer to that journal some information on the subject of the solution of the problem of American discontent, by aid of the light which he derived from this occult source. "We must," he said, "gain every experience in the world to evolve the perfect man. This is only one of the thousands of lives we live. The spirit of man is eternal, it is only his physical body that decays."

To which the World replied:—

"A comfortable doctrine, perhaps, but radically unsatisfying. Experience, to be profitable, must be remembered; and if this is indeed 'only one of the thousands of lives we live,' for the purpose of 'gaining every experience' and 'evolving the perfect man,' there would seem to be an extraordinary waste of the raw material of experience in the process. We certainly do not remember in this life the lessons of experience gained in former existences."

It is sad indeed that when the "immortal soul" of popular theology enters into the "clay tenement" which it finds in each member of the human race, it should be compelled to part with all its knowledge, and begin over again at the very foot of the ladder. And how very hard also it must have seemed to some of the ancient worthies, as Lazarus, for example, to be called back from the glorious realm of happiness and knowledge to which their "immortal spirits" had soared at death, to take up again their abode in the wretched clay tenement of which they had thought themselves forever free. Yet strangely enough, they seem to have submitted to the change without a word!

THE GERMAN MISSION FIELD.

SINCE last year, our work is also gradually extending into eastern Germany, along the shores of the Baltic. Lacking the necessary laborers to enter this field, we can for the present only strengthen the interest by occasional visits. On my way there, I passed Lubeck, the smallest of the free cities. Our canvassers have gone over it with one book, also over a small portion of the joining grand duchy of Mecklenburg, noted for its many lakes and forests. In this country, and also in the province of Pomerania, one sees large estates, where the farm hands are very dependent upon their landlords. The population, over two million, of which one fourth falls to Mecklenburg, is strongly Lutheran, and thus far it has been very difficult for any other denomination to gain a foothold.

Being obliged to stop several hours at Stralsund, I viewed the old fortifications, which the noted Wallenstein, during the thirty years' war, tried in vain to assail. In modern days city walls are of little use, and the fortifications consist in general of a circle of forts, from three to six miles from the cities. By evening I reached Wolgast. Here one of our canvassers is living, who, through his sister in Hamburg, embraced the truth and attended one institute. During my stay of two days, I baptized his wife and her mother in the Baltic, and held several readings with interested persons. Here, as elsewhere, we hear many complaints about hard times, and many factories are standing idle. On my way to Königsberg, I passed Stettin, which has also been canvassed once. It was richly flagged, as the emperor was to visit it the next day.

The provinces of eastern and western Prussia, with a population of nearly four million, have never been entered by our canvassers. The people in general seem poorer, yet on the other hand, there is more religion left. Late at night I arrived at Cranz, a sea bath on the Baltic, where our friends received me heartily. There are some ten Sabbath-keepers in and around Cranz, who once belonged to a certain Stangnowski, but on account of his high pretensions, left him. He called his followers the Apostolic Church, but in order to smooth the way, he admitted all to membership who acknowledged the Sabbath as right, whether they kept it or not. While some of these Sabbath-keepers are rather shy as yet, still we had good meetings Friday and Sabbath, and quite a number of outsiders attended Sunday night. One sister fully in harmony with us, wished to hire a hall for our Sunday night meeting; but the others objected, thinking but few would come. Still the private house was filled, and at the close of the service, the Baptists offered to hire a hall, if I should visit the place again. The Sabbath-keepers bought some six dollars' worth of books, and donated nearly four dollars toward the journey, though just now before the bathing season, money is very scarce. We are sure that when the work is once begun in this section, all these will join us.

Monday I visited Mr. Droste, at Pillau, a strong fortress on the Baltic. Some three years ago, he and another Lutheran pastor by the name of Brodersen, were led to a Christian experience, and began to preach it. They also soon saw the fallacy of infant baptism and other similar church ordinances, and consequently resigned their charges. Mr. Droste hired a hall, and held meetings in different places, baptizing some six hundred persons in about two years. He began to publish a paper; everything seemed to prosper, and considerable attention was paid to the move in the religious journals. While holding meetings in Königsberg, he came in contact with the Sabbath-keepers, and after the death of Stangnowski, last winter, he prevailed upon them to give up the Sabbath, stating that in Christ the law was abolished. But suddenly things came to a standstill. A tailor had gained a wonderful influence over the other pastor, and finally through him over Droste. He came and persuaded Droste that there was no true regeneration before the day of Pentecost; that then the power to regenerate was poured out, and that the apostles conveyed this power by the laying on of hands. He claimed to have this power, and in course of time, Droste professed to have the same; and now some forty of his followers are said to have received this power through his instrumentality.

I stopped with Mr. Droste over five hours, and found him an intelligent man of about thirty-two years. He seemed very pleasant, and stated his views freely. He showed me their meeting hall upstairs, which seats about five hundred persons; in the garden is their baptismal font. As immersion is classed by the law with bathing, the authorities required him to surround the garden with a high fence, so that even from the surrounding dwellings none can look on. Mr. Droste told me that different leading members of the Evangelical Alliance, Baptists, and others had visited him, seeking his fellowship, but since he is under the influence of this tailor, he looks upon them all as unregenerated, and withdraws. He stated that he wanted to preach the gospel in its simplicity, and when I told him about the Sabbath, he declared that Christ abolished the law, and while we had no express command for Sunday, there were strong inferences. He also felt averse to any publications, and has dropped his own paper. Before leaving, I asked him whether we should pray together, but he declined, on the ground that we were not of the same mind. Still I left a few of our publications, and while it has the appearance that this movement which commenced with so much promise and from all appearance in true honesty, may end in confusion, we cannot tell why in God's providence he has thus been brought in contact with the present truth.

On my return, I stopped at Königsberg, a city of 170,000, also strongly fortified. I made several very interesting visits. One lady promised to keep the Sabbath again, and supplied herself with our Christian endeavor. They halt after taking a few steps, and assume a vacillating position, taking at one time a step forward, and at another a step backward, but making no decided advance, and sooner or later in most cases fall back to the place from whence they started. It is always painful to see a person give up and return from a journey toward a better condition, but doubly so when the journey is from spiritual bondage and darkness to eternal freedom and light.

Innumerable causes act their part in producing this painful result; but there are a few simple conditions which cannot be omitted if the journey is to be successful. Yet how many neglect even these, and still expect in some way to be wafted steadily along toward the end of the Christian race!

One of these, and perhaps the most important, is prayer. Prayer is man's only means of communicating with God. It is the means by which the most needed blessings of heaven are brought down to us. No argument need be given to show the indispensable nature of this exercise; yet with how many is this a theoretical belief rather than a knowledge gained from experience. Let those to whom prayer is an infrequent and formal exercise, stop and ask themselves how they can hope under such conditions to make any spiritual progress. We are living in the time when the solemn injunction applies, "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." Luke 21:36.

Another condition is, a knowledge of God's word. The psalmist says, "Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee." It is well for the Christian professor to ask, How much of that word does my heart contain? By prayer we speak to God; and through the reading and study of his word, he speaks to us. His word is spiritual food, without which there can be no spiritual growth. 1 Pet. 2:2. With a hasty and spasmodic perusal of this word, Christian growth is incompatible. Where the word of God is not read, or if read, is not made a subject of study and meditation, how can it be expected that spiritual progress will continue?

But do not many fancy that they are making spiritual progress, while they know that they are not students of the sacred word? To slight God's word is to slight God; for he has provided us with his word,—a vast and invaluable mine of spiritual truth,—and means that we should accept and use it as such. And never was a knowledge of this word more necessary as a safeguard from evil than at the present hour. The psalmist has put in the mouth of every Christian the words, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." Should it be any cause for wonder that he who neglects this light should find himself not walking in the path which it reveals? There is none too little of this word to demand its daily study. It is not only a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path, but it is the "sword of the spirit," without which the battles of the Christian warfare could not be successfully fought. It will also be the Christian's "shield and buckler" in the time of greater peril which is soon to come. Ps. 91:4.

Who, knowing such things, can feel that too much of this divine word is hidden in his heart,—that he has too deep a knowledge of its truths? Who indeed can feel that his present knowledge of the word of God is sufficient for all his needs? Who has his memory stored with all the wonderful and helpful promises of that word? Who can bring to mind its cautions and admonitions, and all those "examples," which were "written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come?" Who is ready to be called before councils and the world's great men, to stand in the position of expounder and defender of the faith? Are there not many who could not even under less trying circumstances give the scriptural reasons for their hope? It will not do to wait for the truth to be found and brought to our notice by others. Eminent interpreters of the word may disagree among themselves as to its meaning, but the honest mind which diligently and prayerfully searches for the truth will gain the knowledge it seeks. This is not a work which one can do for another.

God's word must be studied, and the only proper way to study it is to study it daily. That which is not done regularly is sure to be more and more neglected. It is the same as with every other Christian duty. Irregular study of the word goes with irregular prayer, irregular attendance upon services for the worship of God, irregular giving of Christian testimony, and irregular giving of means for the furtherance of God's work. The habit of doing things spasmodically is a very bad one, and nowhere are its effects more fatal than in the Christian life.

God also has enlarged his word, and given us more particular light in view of the dangerous times in which we live. The "Testimonies" form a more voluminous collection than all the books of the Bible. God has not been thus mindful of us for nothing. He has not given us his word to be neglected. He has said that his word should not return unto him void. Either it will accomplish for us the benefit which God designs, or it will be a witness in the day of God for our condemnation.

Another very frequent cause of failure in Christian growth is the presence of some cherished sin in the heart. This prevents the blessing of God, and destroys the efficiency of prayer; for no one can pray with confidence when his own heart condemns him.

All these are tests which it is not at all difficult for any individual to apply in seeking for the cause of his failure to progress in Christian experience. Each one knows his own degree of faithfulness or carelessness in these particulars, and whatever other reasons may exist, he may not wonder at his failure to enjoy the experience of others, if he finds himself deficient in these.

Neither can the individual who does nothing to advance the work which is being done for God expect to develop strength as a Christian. God has never promised to bless the lookers-on who might be active workers in his cause. Each one knows his own degree of activity in this respect.

The individual is greatly deceived who expects that in some way, in spite of such deficiencies as are here mentioned, he will pass along with God's faithful ones and share in their reward. The road of some-how-or-other does not lead in the direction of the celestial city. No one can journey to heaven on a free pass, or by any method which does not strictly comply with the prescribed conditions. Every one who reaches that place will know just how and why he reached it, and God and all the angels in heaven will know just why he is there. And when the great company of the saved shall assemble before the eternal throne, and acquaintanceships of earth are sought to be renewed in heaven, the unprogressive Christians will be very sure to be among the missing. L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Will there be Special Signs Preceding Christ's Second Coming, to Show that it is Near?

In all the important events and deliverances of the past, God's people have been warned. Noah was warned of the coming deluge; Lot of the destruction of Sodom; the children of Israel of the plagues of Egypt; Jonah was sent to warn the Ninevites; Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and other prophets faithfully admonished the Jews of their captivity among the heathen, and Jerusalem was not destroyed the second time till thoroughly forewarned of its approaching doom. It is not consistent with the character of our merciful God to destroy multitudes without revealing to them their danger.

Before Christ's first advent, prophet after prophet gave, long ages in advance, the facts connected with his incarnation, so that none needed to be in ignorance of who he was, when he should come, or the time when he should appear. The place was given where he should be born, who his ancestors were, his lowly appearance, the exact time when he should begin his work, the time of his crucifixion, the length of his ministry, his riding into Jerusalem, the kind of beast he should ride upon, his cruel death, glorious resurrection, and a multitude of other important facts, connected with his life on earth.

Could we then suppose for an instant that the stupendous facts of his second coming in glory to save his ransomed people would be all kept hidden from his loving disciples? that the grand, final, triumphant return of the Lord of glory would bestudiously be concealed from their view? Preposterous! One of the most striking proofs of the unfaithfulness, worldliness, and terribly backslidden condition of multitudes of professed Christians of this age is the prevailing indifference to an event so important.

As the coming of Christ is to be an event of world-wide interest, in which the destiny of every living soul will be involved, we should expect the signs heralding it would be of a nature to attract the attention of large masses of people. Such is the case. Jesus declares there shall be "signs" in the sun, moon, stars, in the earth and sea, and in the religious world. He declares Satan shall work with mighty power, deceiving multitudes, and would deceive, if possible, "the very elect." He depicts the condition of society, and the special prevalence of wickedness, crime, and unbelief, even among those professing to be religious. The signs he gives are of such a character that all may know of their fulfillment if they care to investigate them and watch the events transpiring all around them.

But we should ever remember that the Lord does not propose to force men to believe. He ever places a great premium upon faith, watchfulness, energy in the investigation of the scriptures of truth, and closely observing God's dealings with men, and the fulfillment of his word. He places a great discount upon unbelief, carelessness, indifference to what he has said, and to him who has done so much for us and promises to come and give eternal life to all who "love his appearing." These signs are not as wonderful as the events of which they are heralds and tokens. They will not arouse everybody; only those who "watch" will be benefited by them. But they will be sufficient to condemn those who ignore them. All will not see them. Even the shining of the sun only half the world can see at once, and total eclipses are beheld only by a portion of the people all over the globe. The most remarkable events occurring in our world are actually seen but by a few of the world's population; but they are made known to all who care to be informed—all who seek to learn concerning them.

So of the signs. They will be striking, remarkable events, not of the common order, portents, ominous and wonderful, presaging the wrath of God, even "fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven." Luke 21:11. These will be made known to all who care to learn of them—all who watch for our Lord's return.

We cannot doubt but that God has been in the great inventions of our age, which specially distinguish it as an age of light and knowledge, in order that an understanding of the signs of his coming might be communicated to those living when that event occurs. "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased" in "the time of the end." Dan. 12:4. The "time of the end" is a little period just before the end itself, reaching, no doubt, from the close of the 1260 days, in 1798, to the coming of Christ. How wonderfully has this statement of the prophet been fulfilled in our time! By means of this knowledge of the Scriptures, as well as of other things, the people all over our earth can be made to know of the signs of Christ's approach.

It is not at all necessary, therefore, that each sign should be seen by everybody. All can know of it with a reasonable certainty just as well without. Every part of the world in our time is in communication with every other part. Every daily paper has news from China, Australia, Africa, or the islands of the sea, as well as from all parts of our own country. So nothing of importance transpires anywhere in the world that is not known in every other part. In no other age was this so, as we now see it. Is not the hand of the Lord in all this? So the signs of his coming are exhibited in an age when "knowledge" is "increased," and all may know of them. Yet but a comparatively small number of the world's inhabitants will consider or care for them. They are not given to stun and frighten people into believing that for which they have no interest. The same law holds true in God's dealings with our age that has ever been seen in past ages.

Moses was to give the children of Israel "signs" that he was sent of God, and all the mighty wonders wrought by him were given to show forth his divine mission. Yet how few really believed! Ex. 4:1-9.

The destruction of the two hundred and fifty princes was a "sign" to rebellious Israel. Num.

26:10. Yet multitudes remained wicked and unbelieving. Jonah's being three days and three nights in the stomach of the fish is called "the sign of the prophet Jonah." Matt. 12:38-40. But the Jews paid no attention to it, though it was a representation typifying our Lord's burial in the heart of the earth. So no doubt it will be in the last days, in spite of the fact that our Lord gave special signs to show when his coming is near, of which he says we may "know" he is near, even at the doors, when they have occurred. Yet some will give heed to them, and be blessed in so doing. These articles are written hoping to reach more or less of this class. We shall now set before the reader these "signs," as our Lord has given them, and present indubitable evidences of their wonderful fulfillment.

CAMP-MEETINGS AT WALLA WALLA AND EAST PORTLAND.

THE camp-meetings at Walla Walla, in the Upper Columbia Conference, and East Portland, in the North Pacific Conference, were in many respects interesting meetings. From the beginning, the Spirit of God seemed to rest in large measure upon the efforts of our brethren and sisters to draw near to God. The preaching was largely of a practical nature, and found a hearty reception in the hearts of those present. The encampment at Walla Walla was on the College grounds, and in the midst of shrubbery forming a partial but much-appreciated protection from the strong, dust-laden winds that swept over the country. The Conference was well represented. There were about ninety tents on the ground, and about three hundred and fifty persons present. The most encouraging feature of the meeting was the spiritual interest manifested throughout. There were many present who came, realizing that they had no real living connection with God. In one of the meetings, after the call was made for the unconverted to come forward, two men, the husbands of two of our sisters, openly confessed that they were infidels, skeptical in reference to the Scriptures. They said that it was impossible for them to believe; they would gladly do so if they could. There were others similar to these, but they were the most marked in their open statement of their unbelief. No argument was used to convince them, and yet the Spirit of God wrought upon their hearts. Before the meeting closed, they found peace in believing, and rejoiced in a Saviour's love.

The business matters passed off very harmoniously. There was scarcely a jarring vote in the election of officers for the various positions in the Conference, tract society, and Sabbath-school Association. Fifty-eight were baptized, and quite a number of the brethren and sisters felt disposed to give themselves to the missionary work in the islands of the sea, to support themselves by entering into some business. They realized that the coming of the Lord was indeed drawing near, and they were willing to take the means they had, and establish themselves in some other part of the world, and engage in the work of selling our publications, holding Bible readings, or in doing any work of that kind which would leave a favorable impression upon the minds of those with whom they came in contact. Many such men are wanted at the present time to go into those fields where the truth has been presented, and an interest has been awakened, in order to preserve the interest, and continue to exert an influence among the people.

The testimonies of Elders Olsen and Farnsworth, and all those from abroad, were appreciated by the brethren and sisters.

On Sunday morning a liberal donation was made for foreign missions and first-day offerings. The school question received considerable attention, although in the past there has been some feeling in regard to its location, in view of the Milton Academy. It appeared very evident at this meeting that their hearts were united, and generally speaking, all felt to take hold and draw together in the establishment of the College at Walla Walla. Nearly three thousand dollars' worth of pledges was taken upon the ground, and about four thousand dollars' worth of College real estate was sold; so that including the previous pledges, $5,000 were pledged for the school.

The meeting at the North Pacific Conference was also one of interest. We have scarcely visited any camp-meeting where the brethren and sisters, as a whole, appreciated the testimony borne, as they did at this meeting. They appeared to be hungering for the truth. Something over eighty dollars were paid on the first-day offerings and for foreign missions; quite a number also paid in sums from five to twenty dollars, for the establishment of the work in India, whenever the General Conference deems it advisable to open up the work in that field. The Conference at its last meeting voted $6,000 for the same purpose.

A good degree of interest was manifested in the canvassing work, and some very marked experiences were related. One brother who was eighty-nine years of age, had canvassed more or less during the past year. Though he was unable to spend more than two hours a day in the work, his own testimony was that he had never canvassed a half hour without selling a book. His report showed that he had sold more books in the same number of hours than any other canvasser. About twenty-five are expected to take up the canvassing work in this Conference the coming summer. There was no phase of the work presented in which a general interest was not manifested. This showed the spiritual condition of the Conference. All hearts beat in unison with every branch of the cause of present truth. Much interest was taken in the proposed establishment of a cooking-school and nurses' course at the Health Retreat. It is expected that from this Conference, as well as from the Upper Columbia Conference, a delegation will be sent that will carry back to their respective Conferences information which will be the means of imparting the light to the friends of the cause in this part of the harvest field. The time has come when we should arise and shine, when the rays of the gospel of Jesus Christ which were manifested in his life in healing the sick, blessing the children, forgiving sins, and delivering the captives, in every sense of the word, from the power of Satan, should be manifest in a larger degree than we have seen it before.

There were not a few young people who gave themselves to the Lord for the first time. And quite a number were present who had embraced the Sabbath during the past few months.

Elder Olsen and Dr. Kellogg visited the friends here during the workers' meeting, but were not here during the camp-meeting proper.

There was quite a contrast in the appearance of the camp grounds, in consequence of the weather. On the Walla Walla ground it was very dry and dusty, everything being covered with dust; while at East Portland it was just the reverse. Nearly every day we had cloudy weather and a sprinkling of rain, but the grounds were neatly laid out, and everything was in good order. The preaching at East Portland, as well as at Walla Walla, was practical in its nature. But few meetings were held without deep feeling manifested by those in attendance, and the Spirit of God moved upon the hearts of the people. There were not less than one hundred and fifty young people on the grounds who ought to attend school and connect in some way with the work of God.

The meetings on the Sabbath were deeply interesting. From sixty to seventy-five came forward for prayers at the close of the Sabbath afternoon discourse. The congregation was then divided. About one hundred and fifty young people met in one tent, and nearly every one spoke. Ten, however, arose and stated that they had never made a start to serve God. Eight of these especially expressed a desire to begin then in the service of the Lord. This was an interesting meeting; for the Lord came very near. On the Sabbath the meetings continued with short intermissions from half-past five in the morning until past ten o'clock at night. We cannot but hope that the impressions made upon the hearts of the people are those that will be lasting.

All business matters passed off as harmoniously as in the Upper Columbia Conference. They appreciated the help that came from abroad, and were anxious to hold another camp-meeting on Puget Sound in the latter part of the summer. The Conference voted to carry out their desire in this matter.

If the brethren in these Conferences continue in the spirit that was manifested at these camp-meetings, a prosperous year awaits them. Harmony and love prevailed among the brethren and sisters, and a solemn realizing sense of the times in which we live appears to rest upon them. It is evident that we have reached an important crisis in the cause of present truth. The people are seeking God for a personal experience such as we have not witnessed for years in the past, and those who are thus seeking God, do so with all their hearts, finding him to be very precious to their souls.

God was present to manifest power in healing the sick, as well as in delivering those who were bound by Satan in other respects. We could not but feel to praise God for the influence of his Holy Spirit, and the manifestation of his love in filling souls with praise. Twenty-six were baptized. The friends in the city filled the tent each evening and upon Sunday. The brethren returned to their homes to enter upon their work, happy in God. S. N. H.

A LESSON FROM THE BOOK OF ACTS

"For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets which are read every Sabbath day, they have fulfilled them in condemning him." Acts 13:27. Thus spake the apostle Paul in the synagogue at Antioch. That men should read prophecies every Sabbath, telling how Christ should come in humility, and be despised and rejected of men, and still be so blind that they despised and rejected him themselves, is one of the things which evince the strong perversity of human nature. They read the Scriptures which gave in minute detail all the events of the life of Christ, from his miraculous birth to the tragic scenes of Gethsemane and Calvary; and with the evidence in full view of the fulfillment of the prophecies of his birth and early life, they then fulfilled the unfulfilled part of the prediction themselves by condemning and crucifying him.

It is evident from the above-described experience of the rulers, that people may read the Scriptures containing prophetic descriptions of heaven-daring, God-defying sins; that they may live at the time these unrighteous acts are being performed, and yet they may be so in the dark that they themselves will help fulfill these prophecies, and thus perform the very work that their Bibles, which they so studiously read, have warned them against. The fact, then, that we have the Bible, or that we study it very closely, reading it "every Sabbath day," is not sufficient to prevent us from rejecting the truth and opposing the work of the Lord; for the rulers of the Jews did thus, and yet they "were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ." It will be well for us to notice carefully the reasons adduced by Paul for this action of the rulers of the Jewish people: "Because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets." Although they understood in a general way that they were the people of God; that God had chosen them, and had miraculously given them the land in which they dwelt; that he had appointed the religious observances which distinguished them as a people from the other nations; and that through them were to be fulfilled God's promises to the world, in spite of all this knowledge, they lacked in their individual experience that knowledge which would bring into their darkened souls the illumination of the Holy Spirit, and cause them to see that Jesus of Nazareth was the Son of God to whom all the prophets gave witness. Not knowing Him, then, was a great hindrance, and without that knowledge, they could not understand the prophets, even though they read them every Sabbath day. The reason of their failure to understand, is well known. In their study of the prophecies, they had deduced certain conclusions in regard to the manner of their fulfillment. These conclusions had become to them as sacred and sure as the prophecies themselves; and so completely were they wedded to their theory of the coming of the Messiah and the work he was to do, that when the very things described by the prophecies were fulfilled before their eyes, they would not believe, because they did not come in the exact way that they believed they would come.

"They knew him not." They were joined to his visible church on the earth, but they did not have the invisible connection binding them to him from becomes a duty to proselyte and save those souls that are out of the truth; but if these differences are mere non-essentials which will not affect the salvation of the soul, these churches have no reason for remaining separate. The idea that no proselyting should be done among Christian denominations is irreconcilable with the idea of separate denominations. The non-essentials can be put in the background, as not concerning the great purpose of the church, which is to save souls. Only a very grave reason will justify the disunion of Christendom, and if such a reason does not exist, the disunion ought to cease. If what many ministers and members of these churches affirm be true, it ought to cease at once. The inconsistency is one which it devolves upon them to explain. L. A. S.

THE THIRD COMMANDMENT.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain: for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain."

It is not merely by the repetition of certain set phrases in which the name of God is sacrilegiously mentioned, that this command is violated. Such is the popular conception of its meaning; but the popular view is much too narrow. Many, no doubt, accepting that conception as correct, have been unconscious violators of this one of the ten great precepts.

The true God is a great God, and entitled to the utmost reverence on the part of his creatures. How great he is, how glorious, how holy, it is altogether beyond the highest power of man's imagination to conceive. His conception of God should be as lofty as possible, for even at its best, it falls infinitely short of the truth. Probably no people ever had a higher and more correct view of God's greatness than did the ancient Israelites when, trembling and afraid, they had listened to the awful voice that spake to them the ten commandments from Mount Sinai. So deep was the impression there produced, that Hebrew writers would not afterward write the name of God, so that in time its true pronunciation became a matter of dispute, and has remained so up to this day.

But the natural tendency with men is to lose respect and reverence for a power which they cannot see, and the embodiment of which is infinitely remote. They need to be often impressed with some visible demonstration of it. Thus has it been with that Supreme Power which rules over all things. With conceptions clouded by sin and limited by the prevailing ignorance with respect to the nature and attributes of the Creator, men have very largely lost their reverence for him, until to many God would doubtless say, "Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself." Ps. 50:21.

Reverence for God is at the very foundation of that worship and service which he demands. The individual whose mind can revert to the omnipotent and omniscient Creator without a feeling of awe, cannot worship and serve him in a complete and acceptable manner. His religion cannot be otherwise than formal.

Very properly, therefore, did God forbid the use of his name in the manner prescribed in this commandment. Reverence for God and a careless, "vain" use of his name cannot go together. That is what the commandment means,—that the name of God should not be used when the language and attending circumstances are not sufficiently solemn to make its use appropriate. It is really a command against irreverence for God, of which the careless use of his name is the natural outward symbol.

It need hardly be said that the irreverent use of God's name is something exceedingly common; though many individuals who thus use it would doubtless recoil in horror from the sin of "swearing," which they imagine to be what is specifically forbidden by the third commandment. But that commandment does not say, Thou shalt not swear; but, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." They are doing exactly that which the commandment forbids, though not as guilty as are those who indulge in actual "profanity," which couples other sins with that of the irreverent use of God's name. Many persons who would not use an "oath," still find in almost every slight circumstance which violently excites their emotions, an excuse for making some allusion to the Deity. Doggerel songs purporting to be religious, and perhaps used by Christian people, are made lightly to repeat the sacred name of Jesus,—that name at which "every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth." Phil. 2:10. Many books—especially works of fiction—abound in shockingly vain and irreverent repetitions of the name of God. The Salvation Army, and kindred organizations, have reduced irreverence for God almost to a science. All such instances are instances of the violation of the third commandment, if that commandment is to be understood according to its literal wording.

A careful reading and application of the scripture will show that swearing, indulging in "profanity," and taking the name of God "in vain" are not identical sins; and one may be guilty of the latter without being guilty of the others. And is it not possible that many may be thus guilty who consider themselves good Christians? L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Three Leading Signs of Christ's Return, and Their Real Import.

THE darkening of the sun and of the moon and the falling of the stars constitute three most important signs of our Lord's speedy return. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken: and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Matt. 24:29, 30. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened" (Mark 13:24, etc.), the rest of the passage being almost word for word as in Matthew. "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity." "And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." Luke 21:25, 27.

These are Christ's words as recorded by the evangelists in his great prophecy. These signs in the heavenly bodies mentioned are thus made greatly prominent by him, as special tokens of his speedy approach. They are mentioned also by other inspired writers. And "when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places." And they "said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" Rev. 6:12, 13, 14, 16, 17.

Old Testament writers, without doubt, speak of the same events, though in some cases, perhaps, not with the same clearness. "Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe: come, get you down; for the press is full, the fats overflow; for their wickedness is great. Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision: for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake: but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Joel 3:13-16.

Our Lord declares "the harvest is the end of the world." Matt. 13:39. It is a time of great iniquity. When the voice of God from Mount Zion in the New Jerusalem above is heard, the powers of heaven and the earth shake. The identity of these events with those our Saviour foretells is unmistakable. Joel also refers to the same events in his prophecy. "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come." Chapter 2: 10, 31. "It shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord God, that I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in a clear day." Amos 8:9.

"The sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine. And I will punish the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity; and I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease, and will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible. I will make a man more precious than fine gold; even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir. Therefore I will shake the heavens, and the earth shall remove out of her place, in the wrath of the Lord of hosts, and in the day of his fierce anger." Isa. 13:10-13.

There can be but one application for these texts of Scripture. They all refer to the same great event—the signs and the actual coming, of the great day of doom. They all demonstrate the prominence of these three-fold signs in the sun, moon, and stars, as heralds of Christ's approach. They cannot with any show of reason be assigned to any other event. Should any pervert, as they do, Christ's prophecy of the signs and his coming, to Jerusalem and its destruction, all these other mentions of the same signs and the same coming, remain to confront that foolish exegesis. And let it be remembered that St. John wrote the Revelation, according to a host of the best authorities, in A. D. 96, over a quarter of a century after Jerusalem was destroyed; and he gives a very clear description of the darkening of sun and moon and of the great star shower, as still future—away down in the sixth seal—and a special sign of that terrible day when all the great men of the earth will wail and cry for rocks and mountains to fall upon them, as they see Christ in dazzling glory upon his throne.

This one consideration is enough to settle forever the question of the time when these signs will all occur. Our Lord's words concerning them, and John's description, must apply to the same signs, as the words and order of events are so exactly alike that they must be identical. Let our readers then ever remember that signs in the sun, moon, and stars are made specially prominent as tokens of the nearness of the second advent of the Lord of glory.

What will be the nature of these signs? Will they be literal, visible, actual occurrences, which human eyes will behold?—facts that will be well known, such as history will record? or will they be figurative, shadowy, or fabulous? Was our Saviour speaking in parables, metaphors, or figures of speech, when saying the sun and moon would be darkened, and the stars fall, when answering the disciples' question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the world?" Most manifestly, this could not be so. He was giving his disciples, as representatives of his church, his last instructions just before his death, to be handed down to after ages. "He answered" their question. He gave those "signs." He never spoke in parables on such occasions. He spoke to the unbelieving, gross-hearted Jews, blind and dull of hearing, in parables (Matt. 13:10-15), but ever explained these to his disciples, to whom it was "given" to "know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven." Parables were designed to convey instruction in a manner not wholly potent, so that men should be compelled to seek and dig for the meaning, and thus give evidence of their desire to obtain it. But no such object existed when our Saviour wished to make his disciples know the signs of his coming. He did not conceal, but did reveal. Hence our Saviour's discourse is to be understood as actual history, given in advance, for the sake of his true disciples.

The sun is the great luminary which gives light to all mankind, the most conspicuous object we behold. As this sign ought to be of universal interest to all mankind, it is connected with the great, light-giving luminary, so as naturally to attract general attention. At least twice before, its supernatural darkening has been connected with events of deepest interest to mankind. In the great deliverance of God's people from Egyptian bondage (typical perhaps of their final deliverance at the second advent), while the struggle was at its height between the powers of light and darkness,—Satan and the Lord of hosts,—for three days a black cloud of darkness which might even be felt, shrouded the Egyptians in the gloom of midnight. Ex. 10:21-23.

And when the Lord of light and glory hung upon the cross in agony, bearing the sins of the world upon him, and he was about expiring, all nature which he had created seemed to respond in sympathy—the “sun was darkened,” veiling its face, while its author cried, “Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.” Luke 23:46.

As well might we claim these two transactions were figurative, and spiritualize them away till we conclude no such actual occurrences took place, as to do the same with our Saviour’s prediction concerning the signs of his second coming. The words used by the evangelists are almost identical. “The sun was darkened,” says Luke, and the whole land was enveloped in gloom for several hours. “The sun shall be darkened,” say Matthew and Mark, as a sign of his coming in glory. Who shall say one was literal and the other a figure of speech, when Inspiration uses the same terms?

The Greek word “helios” is used twelve times by the evangelists, and in every instance means the literal sun, which gives light to our globe. Indeed, it is never used in a figurative sense in the New Testament, excepting in that book of symbols, the Revelation, and in but a few instances in that. The words translated “moon” and “stars” are to be understood literally, as well.

And what kind of “darkening” should we reasonably expect would constitute a “sign,” token, or evidence that our Lord was soon to return? Would it be one in which the sun would disappear forever? It says there shall be “signs [plural] in the sun.” The darkening of the sun once would be truly a sign, but would not constitute “signs.” We should therefore reasonably expect a number of occurrences, strange, mysterious, alarming, in the great luminary of heaven, which would be calculated to rouse attention, and cause strange forebodings of approaching trouble. Therefore the “darkening” of the sun is not to be an event which should destroy it; for it still remains to be seen after it is “darkened,” and other signs will be manifested in it. If its “darkening” destroyed it, it would not be a “sign” of the end, but the end itself, as people could not live on our earth, if the sun was destroyed.

We are therefore to conclude that the darkening of the sun will be some strange, mysterious, wonderful darkness that for a comparatively brief season will astonish the world, and be unexplainable by science, so as to constitute a strange portent—something beyond human agency or explanation, such in nature as the darkness over the land of Egypt and at Christ’s crucifixion. In the latter instance, as we have seen, the same term is used as was used in our Saviour’s discourse. And as “signs” in the sun are predicted, more than one event of this kind will occur.

The Bible speaks in a number of places of sun darkenings, and these instances are worthy of consideration, because they show the inspired use of this kind of language. Some dark cloud over-spread Egypt, Palestine, and the East, in the cases we have referred to, which shut out the light of the sun entirely, and the vapor affected other senses besides the sight—it could be felt. The light emanating from the sun was not put out, annihilated; it was intercepted and darkened, as portions of a room are darkened by an intervening object placed between the light and the room. John tells of the sun being “darkened” by smoke from the pit. Rev. 9:2. The sun or moon are not to be destroyed by their being darkened, so they will never give light afterward; for the Scriptures teach that they will endure endless ages to give light, as designed by their original creation. Though there will be no need of the sun or moon in the New Jerusalem, because of the surpassing glory of the Creator of them, that does not prove they will not exist. They will endure to all eternity. Ps. 72:5, 7, 17; 89:36, 37.

Neither are the many signs spoken of by our Lord all to be fulfilled at the same moment, jumbled into one indiscriminate mass, as some would teach. They are rather to be interspersed through the age of light and knowledge—“the time of the end.” The first one we shall notice, “the darkening of the sun,” is fixed as coming “immediately after the tribulation of those days.” There it is placed by our Lord to usher in the period when the special signs of his coming shall be exhibited. Any amount of strange occurrences, could they be shown to have taken place during the long period of persecution, could not possibly constitute the signs Jesus gave. These signs were not to commence until “after” that tribulation. Hence, to seek for them before that time, would be to disbelieve his word.

As the warning of the whole world by the preaching of believers in the advent must take quite a period of time, we are not to suppose they will all be fulfilled at once. They will continue to be seen from time to time, becoming more and more impressive, as a whole, till they culminate in the great event of which they are portentous tokens. This is most evident from our Saviour’s words, “When these things [signs in the sun, moon, and stars] begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh.” “When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors.” Luke 21:28; Matt. 24:33. The church is encouraged by the very first sign to hope, courage, and expectation. But when all the signs given have been seen, it becomes a matter of knowledge. So says our Lord himself. Our Saviour presents the fig-tree as an illustration. “Now from the fig-tree learn her parable: when her branch is now become tender, and putteth forth its leaves, ye know that the summer is nigh; even so ye also, when ye see all these things, know ye that he is nigh, even at the doors.” Matt. 24:32, 33, Revised Version. Trees putting forth leaves are a certain sign of summer’s near approach. So our Saviour declares will be the fulfilled signs. But the trees never put forth their leaves in an instant; it is often weeks after the tender buds swell, and small leaves begin to appear, before they are in full leafage, or summer actually comes. It is a process involving more or less time. From the fact that our Lord uses this illustration to show the relation between his coming and the signs which are a token of it, we must conclude quite a period will elapse from the first great sign till all of them are fulfilled, and the glory of his presence is seen. Jesus also refers in the same connection to the deluge as a parallel. “But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be.” Matt. 24:37. The Scriptures seem to intimate that 120 years elapsed after Noah was warned of the coming flood, till the deluge burst forth. And as he was a “preacher of righteousness,” he evidently warned the antediluvians during that period. It must have taken a long time to prepare the ark and its provisions and get in readiness for that eventful voyage. Gen. 6:3; 2 Pet. 2:5.

So it will be in the last days, at the close of the long day of sorrow and woe to the suffering church, whose blood had been poured out like water. The first startling sign, the dark day, appears. Then the church is to look up and rejoice; for its “redemption draweth nigh.” It is not to be expected at once. Other signs will appear in due time. Thrilling tokens will thicken, and continue to strengthen their faith. The warning will go forth to all the world; the signs are fast fulfilling; the end is approaching. The warning messages go forth based on these evidences, to a careless, wicked world. But those who truly love the Lord will rejoice at the evidences of his soon return.

We may reasonably suppose it will take quite a space of time for the world’s harvest to be ripened for the sickles of the reapers. Joel 3:13. Men must have time to hear, accept, or reject, to decide their own destiny. It is a great thing to warn the world. This will be done by the faithful servants who believe the words of their Lord, and proclaim his truth to those in darkness. As the antediluvians were warned, Lot and the men of Sodom, the Ninevites, the Jews of Christ’s time, so the preaching of the signs of the advent will need to be proclaimed to earth’s remotest bounds. Constantly fulfilling signs will make their message impressive. Scoffers walking after their own lusts will seek to hinder. But the work will go forward. 2 Pet. 3:4, etc.

So we are to look for a succession of signs, according to reason and the words of our Lord, covering a period of years—a century or more—from the close of the great persecution till Christ shall come in his glory. This period will be of the most thrilling interest, filled up with a succession of the most wonderful events ever seen in our world.

We next notice the special signs of Christ’s coming as given by our Lord, commencing with the darkening of the sun.

THE RUSSIAN MISSION FIELD.

THERE is no country at the present moment where our people experience greater difficulties than in this vast field. We might write many particulars, and state names and places, but we forbear; for these statements might fall into the wrong hands, and work only harm to those who are already afflicted. But we are grateful to God that amid all these trials, our people seem to be of such good courage in the Lord, and do not falter, but press forward to victory. At times it seems as though this or that company would be swallowed up by the enemy, and we hardly know how to counsel and what to devise; but as time wears on, we see how our heavenly Father, in his wonderful love for his children, opens ways we did not dream of, and raises up instrumentalities we did not perceive at the time.

We would first speak of our native companies. Since eight of our brethren have been exiled, those who remain experience more or less difficulties in holding their meetings. People refuse to rent them their houses, as they also might get in trouble; but the way opened; for one sister used her savings, of about five hundred dollars, in buying a home. She herself worked for one of the nobility, and really had no need of it. Through her we also managed to keep in contact with those in exile, but we learned of late that her letters have been searched by the authorities, and she herself has become implicated. The following letter will show her present condition:—

“The sheriff came disguised in our meetings, and sat down, as though a common listener. When he did not perceive me in the meeting, he stepped out. I met him at the door, and he addressed me, following me into the house again. I had hardly time to utter a warning to our company, when five policemen surrounded me, the doors were locked, and a protocol was taken. Notice was given to my employer to keep me under strict guard. At his counsel I wrote a petition to the governor, asking him to allow me to follow my brother-in-law in banishment; but on the fourth day I was informed by the police that as I was under their supervision already since May, I could no more choose, but had to wait until the judges rendered their decision. But I submit to the will of my heavenly Father; he knows what is for our good, and to him be praise and thanks for all his goodness! May all our brethren and sisters remember us here in their petitions.”

In spite of all this, several have been baptized of late, but they cannot be too careful. Persons are even paid by the Russian priests to join them, simply to turn spies and betray the names of the faithful. Two sisters with their families have of late joined their banished husbands in exile, and we have news of their safe arrival. But the greatest difficulty we find is how to correspond with them; still God has of late opened a way which we have reason to believe will work. The communications have to be translated twice. We have also received the following news from the German brother who was banished near to the Siberian border:—

“I was two months less two days on my journey, and had to stop in many a prison here and there. During these cold winter days, I had to sit for days on the same spot, my hands often chained together, the vermin being plentiful. But the Lord has helped me through all, and to him alone be praise and honor! I have to remain here for five years under the supervision of the police, and in this whole neighborhood we hear and see no believers. Still the Lord is mighty and can raise up new believers here. I am willing to do all I can to spread the truth in this neighborhood. I feel grateful that my wife and children are now again united with me. Remember us in your prayers.”

While these faithful souls suffer for the truth’s sake, we do not cease in sending forth the truth to different parts of the empire; and from letters we receive, we learn not only of their safe arrival, but also that by them souls are convinced and obey. As far as the German work is concerned, we learn that brother K. is still without his passport. At present he has gone to see the governor. He writes that several new believers are to be baptized in the famine district. Thus far we have sent over three hundred dollars to our suffering brethren, and every month they are supplied. The distress is indeed great, and they feel grateful for the assistance

NO SENSIBLE MAN.

It seems utterly impossible for the National Reformers to comprehend the difference so clearly made in the Bible between those things which belong to God and those which belong to Caesar. In those duties which lie between an individual and his God alone, man has no right to interfere. With reference to civil rights between man and man, the government may legislate. Yet the Christian Nation of June 22, contending for the right of the government to step in and close the World's Fair on the Lord's (?) day, says:—

"Government does propose to enforce the sixth and seventh and eighth commandments, and so far as it succeeds, it only does its duty. No sensible man will say that enforcing these commandments unites Church and State. No more are they united when the government enforces the law of the Sabbath."

The government cannot of right take cognizance of any actions which merely distinguish a man as religious or non-religious. It can only take cognizance of those which mark him as civil or uncivil, as interfering or not interfering with the rights of his neighbors. Government can deal with people only as citizens of the State; and as such, it has no right to inquire whether a man is a Christian or not a Christian, whether he worships the true God or a false god, or no God at all; whether he keeps a Sabbath or does not keep any Sabbath. In short, whether he pays any attention, or not, to the first four commandments of the decalogue. The last six pertain to our relations to one another, and these, though the law of God of course covers them also, the State may regulate, so far as they come under the head of outward civil duties, and are such that if not observed, society could not exist.

But Sabbath-keeping does not come under the head of these latter duties. One's neighbors have no right to dictate whether one shall keep the Sabbath or not. The State has no right to dictate whether he shall keep it or not. It is a matter of conscience, solely between him and his Maker, and when the State undertakes to force a man's conscience in matters of worship, or religious observances of any kind, at the dictation of the church, then Church and State are united.

There is a difference, then, so far as the State is concerned, between stealing and killing and Sabbath-keeping. Our practice in the latter respect does not, and never can, interfere with the civil rights of our neighbors. But with these rights alone, the State has to do. Keep this distinction before the people. Religious zealots may try to ignore it; but candid people will see it.

THE NUMBER OF THE BEAST.

THE following item which has been sent us, clipped from the Catholic News, will be of interest to our readers, as showing how the prophecy that points out a characteristic title of the papacy is viewed from a Catholic standpoint:—

"A correspondent in Massachusetts sends us the solution of the number of the beast, which is circulating among the unlearned and the unwise in that State of vaunted knowledge. It makes the name of the man whose number is that of the beast to be 'Vicarius Filii Dei.' Unfortunately for the silly jackanapes who gets off this amusing absurdity, St. John wrote in Greek, and could not have referred to a Latin, French, English, or German name. He must have referred to a Greek name. In the next place Vicar of the Son of God is not a name but a title, and a modification of a Latin title of the pope, not that generally used. If President is the name of the gentleman at present occupying the White House, it is news to us. We were under the impression that a person whose name is Benjamin Harrison was elected, and that to say that his name is President, or in Latin, Praeses, is to show a mind diseased."

If to make such an application of the prophecy, as herein noted, is to become a "silly jackanapes," it is unfortunate for the writer of the foregoing paragraph that he has to go down one degree sillier in trying to answer it. John, to be sure, wrote in Greek, but John's prophecy covers the whole gospel dispensation; and we wonder if it would not be just possible for him to give a prophecy of something outside of Greek territory, or the Greek tongue.

The power to which this prophecy has reference, arose, not in Greece, but in Italy, where the language spoken was not Greek but Latin; and the title to be assumed by that power would be in Latin, and not in Greek. John does not give the title, and has no occasion to, but only says that the power in question would have a name containing that number, and we find the number in this title, which is here admitted to be a modification of a Latin title of the papacy.

Our critic is also unfortunate in supposing that the name is the personal or family name of some individual man. Let him look at the prophecy, and he will find that it does not so read. The name is "the name of the beast," and the beast is more than one man; and the number is "the number of his name," that is, the name of the beast; and it is also the number of a man, not the number of the name of a man. The beast, like any other dynasty, is composed of a succession of men, to each one of which the name is of course applicable while upon the stage of action in that succession.

So the view of the prophecy presented is not half so absurd as our friend thought, and he has not come half so near answering it as he imagines.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SECTARIANISM.

SEVENTH-DAY Adventists are often accused of doing much harm in Christian communities by "proselyting" from other churches, and thus weakening the membership of those churches and promoting sectarian divisions. The charge is usually made as if it applied to them alone,—as if it were one of the things peculiar to them as a denomination, and not found among the other and more popular religious bodies; and certainly if Adventists are no more guilty in this respect than are others of the religious world around them, this accusation ought not to be made against them by members of churches which are equally guilty in the same respect. It will be seen, however, that the sectarian spirit is just as prevalent among other religious bodies as among the denomination first mentioned. Consider, for example, the following from the Christian Union of June 25, written to that journal by one of its correspondents in the West. He says:—

"The city of —, in which I live, has a population of 2,500, among whom are to be found every shade of religious belief, from the rankest atheist to the most enthusiastic Methodist. This is one of the oldest towns in the State, and ought to have churches of influence. Some twelve years ago the Presbyterians established a church here in response to a popular demand. Willingly they contributed to the enterprise. It was doing a great good for the whole community; its members were scattered over quite a district, and in each little district meetings were held, so that the influence of a Christian church was widely felt. Soon a roving Methodist minister came along, and, believing that the place would go to the Devil if there was not a Methodist church, organized one forthwith, by taking some members from an already weak church, and adding some others who had been floating about, and who considered that unless they had a Methodist church, they could not get along. This was, of course, a great set-back to the little Presbyterian church. Very soon the Methodists had a split among themselves, and a swarm from them constituted a Free Methodist church. Next some of the members of the Presbyterian church, with a few Congregational people who had come in, thought they ought to have a Congregational church. The Sunday-school Missionary was corresponded with. It was too good a chance to lose of adding one more new church to the list. My observation out here leads me to assert that the worship of statistics is one of the most popular forms of nineteenth-century idolatry. Here in the little city of —, with three weak, unimportant churches, there was actually imposed a fourth—a Congregational church. This of course, was a sad set-back to the three, which had been established prior to its organization. But just about that time a devout churchman came along. 'We must have a church here,' quoth he. To work he goes, and actually secures an Episcopal minister to come here and organize a little church. In the meantime the Baptists are keeping an eye on things; it would not do at all if they were not 'getting a work in,' as they call it out here. A little time ago, Mr. Rockefeller gave a Pullman car to the Baptist denomination, fully equipped to hold religious meetings. From the religious press it was gathered that the car was to be used in little towns where they had no religious opportunities; of such towns there are scores. But that is not what is being done with the car; for, in the face of our five weak churches, a couple of Baptist preachers bring their car to the city of —, and actually hold their meetings and organize another church. When asked how the enterprise was going to be supported, they reply, 'Why, the home missionary societies, of course, will have to support it.' In the meantime the German Lutherans and the Scandinavian Methodists each organize. Here, then, are eight little, unimportant churches, each supported in part by the home missionary societies of their respective denominations."

"This," says the Christian Union, "is what sectarianism does," and from the standpoint of the parties mentioned as engaged in this work, the complaint made by the correspondent is justified; for not one of them would claim that the formation of a new church made the salvation of those who joined it any more sure than it was when they were members of the original Presbyterian church. It was an exhibition of real "sectarianism,"—working for denominational interests independently of the interests of the soul.

With Seventh-day Adventists it is otherwise. Their only reason for propagating their faith throughout Christendom is their conviction that a correct religious faith is at the present time essential to the eternal welfare of men, the greater part of whom are to live through the perils of the last days down to the end of the world. They have, therefore, in their belief, the same reason for winning converts from other religious bodies that these denominations have for winning converts from heathenism to the Christian faith by missionary effort—that of its necessity to the salvation of the soul. Consequently their practice in this respect affords no ground for a discreditable charge against them.

The real sectarian spirit is to be found outside the ranks of the Adventists, among those who, denying that the denominational differences among them are in relation to matters of essential importance as concerns the welfare of the soul, still maintain and seek to perpetuate those differences as illustrated in the quotation given above, to the great injury of Christian interests in all lands.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

"The Sun Shall be Darkened." Matt. 24:29.

HAVING already noticed the prominence of this sign, we now proceed to fix the time of its occurrence. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened." Matt. 24:29. The second evangelist is still more definite. "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened." Mark 13:24.

The attention of the reader is recalled to the argument upon the "great tribulation," where it was shown that the period of "a time and times and the dividing of time" (Dan. 7:25), i. e., 1260 prophetic days, or years, was specified as the one in which the saints of God were "given into" the hands of the Roman papacy to "wear out," or persecute to the death. Our Saviour said this "tribulation" was "shortened" for the "elect's sake." It was shown from history that about fifty years previous to the expiration of "those days," in 1798, the persecutions ceased. Here is a little period in which the Saviour declares there shall be a wonderful darkening of the sun. "Immediately after the tribulation," says Matthew. "In those days, after the tribulation," says Mark. Both limit the period or periods of the sun's obscuration within the space of a little less than fifty years. If the Saviour's words are true, such a sign must occur in that marked-off space; for the language is very definite. Luke does not speak directly upon this point, but says there shall be "signs in the sun," etc. Luke 21:25. But John, in the Revelation, gives the order of events in a way clearly to locate the point of time when the sun will be in the sackcloth state.

In the seven seals, which are a history of the true church during the gospel age, subdivided into seven periods, the great tribulation is brought to view under the fourth division as symbolized by a rider, "Death," mounted on a pale horse, and "Hades" (the grave) following after, slaying his victims over a fourth part of the earth by the sword, hunger, and the beasts of the earth. The vast multitude thus slain under the fifth seal, are symbolized as crying, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" They rest "a little season" under the symbolic altar—the earth—till others also are killed, as they were. Then the sixth seal opens, as follows: "And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth," etc. Then comes the "great day of his wrath," and the Son of God is seen. Rev. 6:8-17.

Just preceding the sun's darkening is a "great earthquake." It is located after the great persecutions under the fourth and fifth seals are past, since it is placed to mark the beginning of the sixth seal, in which nothing is said of persecutions, though they were the principal features of the fourth and fifth. It is remarkable that the greatest earthquake in extent, of which history gives any record, occurred Nov. 1, 1755, almost exactly at the point where persecution ceased. Its center was in the Atlantic, west of the coasts of Spain and Portugal. It came with great suddenness, and without warning, no earthquake having occurred in the Spanish peninsula for 150 years previous. Lisbon, the capital of Portugal, suffered most. It came on All Saints' Day, when the churches were crowded with worshippers. The city had a population of 250,000. It is said by historians that 60,000 persons perished in six minutes. In fearful terror the people sought places of safety. Many rushed to the magnificent new quay, recently erected. It sank, with 6,000 people upon it, and the water where it stood is now 100 fathoms deep. The ships fastened to it were also engulfed. It is said that Lisbon has never recovered from this calamity.

But Lisbon, though the most prominent sufferer, was by no means the only one. Columbo, Oporto, and Braga were shattered. St. Ubes, having a population of 20,000, was swallowed in the sea. Terrible destruction was experienced in Malaga, Spain. Half of the island of Madeira was laid waste; 2,000 houses in Mitylene were demolished, thousands of miles away to the east. The city of Fez, in Morocco, 1,000 miles south, was more than half destroyed, and 10,000 Moors perished. Vast mountains were shaken to their foundations, and in some instances split in two. Avalanches of rocks were thrown into the valleys, and flames issued from some of them. The Alps felt the shock. The British Islands, Sweden and Norway, the Baltic coast and Germany, were shaken. A great tidal wave, in places sixty-five feet in height, deluged hundreds of miles of the coast of Portugal, and reached as far north as Ireland, rushing into harbors, whirling the ships about, and doing great damage. Ships forty leagues away from the coast experienced violent concussions, throwing men perpendicularly up from the deck. In the West Indies, 3,000 miles west, the tide rose three times as high as usual, the water being of inky blackness. Syell says all the great lakes of North America were sensibly agitated. In England, the hot well of Bristol became red as blood, and the water so thick it could not be drunk. In Scotland, water in some wells became as black as ink, and "in Bohemia, the warm springs of Tepitz all at once disappeared, and then furiously burst forth; and overflowed the region with water the color of ochre."

Authors declare that portions of the earth four times as great as Europe were simultaneously shaken, and that it was the greatest earthquake recorded in history.

The earth continued to shake more or less for three years, and before it became quiet again, 200,000 persons perished. It is estimated that some twenty million square miles of our globe experienced the effects of this terrible convulsion. Its name has passed into history as "the great earthquake," and all well-informed men understand that expression to mean the one that occurred Nov. 1, 1755.

(These facts are taken from Taylor's "Great Consummation," pp. 203-208, where various authors are quoted.)

That this was the great earthquake foretold by the revelator, there can be no question. It came at the specified time. It was of the dimensions and extent foretold. As the prophet declared centuries beforehand, it was followed by the most remarkable darkening of the sun since Christ's crucifixion. It fulfills every specification and condition of the prophecy, and no other earthquake fulfills them. Hence this must be the one foretold, if the Bible is accepted. Thus the great earthquake of Lisbon helps to fix unmistakably the point of time when the sun should be darkened.

Joining together these facts, we sum up the following points, fixing the time of the sun's darkening: (1) It must occur "immediately after" the great persecution. (2) It must occur just "after a great earthquake." (3) It must occur before the close of the 1260 years' period in 1798. (4) It must be soon followed by a remarkable darkening of the moon. (5) It must be soon succeeded by a remarkable fall of stars.

Every one of these points must be met in point of time, to meet the Bible's specifications. If one of them should fail, there would be reasonable grounds to question the application. When was there such a darkening of the sun?—"THE DARK DAY," May 19, 1780;—so called on account of a remarkable darkness on that day, extending over all New England. In some places, persons could not see to read common print in the open air, for several hours together. Birds sang their evening song, disappeared, and became silent; fowls went to roost; cattle sought the barn-yard; and candles were lighted in the houses. The obscurity began about ten o'clock in the morning, and continued till the middle of the next night, but with differences of degree and duration in different places. . . . The true cause of this remarkable phenomenon is not known."—Webster's Dictionary. Noted Names.

Noah Webster, in giving a list of phrases and names which have come by common usage to be well understood, gives this concerning the Dark Day. There is one day singled out, then, of all the days of the past, because of its remarkable darkness. When one sees this phrase in use, if fairly intelligent, he at once understands it to have been May 19, 1780. No other day in the Christian dispensation is called the dark day. It has thus become famous. On its centenary anniversary, a few years since, most all of the leading papers of our country noticed it, and many had long historical articles of marked interest, concerning it. It has by no means passed out of the mind, as its characteristics were so remarkable.

It is this famous day—so much more prominent than any other of its kind that it is specially designated in history—that we claim as a leading fulfillment of our Saviour's prediction. It fulfills every one of the five points recently mentioned. It was after the close of the great persecution. It was but a brief space after "The Great Earthquake," another phrase designating the greatest earthquake known to history. It was a little before the close of "those days" of persecution our Saviour mentions. It preceded the darkening of the moon and the falling of the stars. So far as time is concerned, it meets every requirement of the Bible predictions. This darkness was most mysterious. It has never yet been reasonably accounted for. Even could secondary causes be discovered for it, that fact would not destroy its significance as a sign. Our Saviour says nothing concerning the cause of the sun's darkening. He only states the fact that at a certain period—clearly defined and marked in prophecy—such an event would occur. And such an event did occur at exactly the point foretold. In the very nature of things, no darkening of the sun occurring after "those days" had all expired—or since 1798—could possibly be the sign our Lord foretold. It would clearly violate the conditions he gave.

But the language used would not forbid other darkenings coming in the specified period, "In those days after the tribulation," i.e., within the last fifty years of the 1260 to which our Saviour referred. For he did not specify that there would be only one darkening; but on the contrary, says there should be "signs [plural] in the sun." Luke 21:25.

THE RELIABILITY OF CHURCH HISTORIANS

WHEN all the efforts to establish Sunday-observance from the Bible fail, men often produce certain church histories, such as Mosheim's and others, and point with an air of triumph to certain statements of these men, in which they assert that Sunday was observed during the time of the apostles and the early church. But we ask, On what do these men rest their statements? Can they produce some surer testimony concerning the time of the apostles and the early church, than the word of God?—Surely not. Have they lived at that time, or seen it themselves?—No; for they lived either in the last or the present century, and therefore, as far as actual experience goes, are as far from it as other men. Have they any reliable documents outside of the holy Scriptures, concerning the doctrines held in the first two centuries?—No. Then how do they come to such statements?—Why, simply by taking the same Bible that we all have, and drawing inferences. This being the case, as further investigation will show, the act of making such a statement after failing to find any clue for any Sunday observance from the Bible, means simply to rest on somebody else's assertion against our own actual experience. But are the church historians agreed among themselves, in their statements concerning early Sunday-observance?—By no means. It is the same with them as with the defenders of Sunday at the present day, there being as many theories as heads, simply because the proof is wanting, and each one draws his own inferences. To illustrate the above, we will take the statements of two eminent German church historians, and compare them, and see how each one arrives at his conclusions. I have before me the original editions of Neander and Mosheim. Neander says concerning Sunday:—

"The festival of Sunday, like all other festivals, was always only a human ordinance, and it was far from the intentions of the apostles to establish a divine command in this respect,—far from them, and from the early apostolic church, to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday. Perhaps at the end of the second century, a false application of this kind had begun to take place; for men appear by that time to have considered laboring on Sunday as a sin."—Neander's Kirchengeschichte, first edition, Vol. I, p. 339.

Mosheim makes the following statement:—

"The Christians of this century assembled for the worship of God, and for their advancement in piety, on the first day of the week, the day on which Christ re-assumed his life; for that this day was set apart for religious worship by the apostles themselves, and that after the example of the church at Jerusalem, it was generally observed, we have unexceptionable testimony."—Mosheim's Kirchengeschichte, first edition, Vol. I, p. 152.

Now how is it that these two eminent men arrive at such different conclusions? We will first consider Neander, taking the original German edition as basis. The paragraph in which the above statement occurs, begins the Sunday argument as follows:—

"The opposition to Judaism introduced at an early period the special observance of Sunday, instead of Sabbath: the first trace we find in Acts 20:7, where we find the church assembled on the first day of the week; a later one in Rev. 1:10; for the Lord's day mentioned here can barely be understood to mean the day of judgment."

Neander finds in his days and from the church history, that Sunday has taken the place of Sabbath, and looks about for reasons. As a good Protestant, he takes his Bible and searches it, but he finds no command of Christ, nor any intention of the apostles to establish a divine command. But in some way the observance of Sunday must be accounted for, so he begins to look for traces or inferences, and hits upon Acts 20:7. But even while mentioning this, he feels under obligation to add the following in a foot-note:—

"An absolute proof is this passage by no means; for as the apostle Paul was about to depart, this might have caused the gathering of the small church for a brotherly farewell meal, during which occasion the apostle held his last speech, even if no special Sunday observance took place as yet. Still less in this respect can be proved from 1 Cor. 16:2. All this would be sufficiently explained, if one should consider this as the usual beginning of a week in civil life."

Now we know how Neander arrives at his conclusions. He searches in the Bible, and finds no traces SELF-EXAMINATION.

THE duty of examining ourselves is one of the plain injunctions of the gospel. "Examine yourselves;" "prove yourselves," says the apostle. 2 Cor. 13:5. And the object of this exercise is not gained by merely looking at ourselves and stopping there. There is a point to be ascertained, a question to be decided; and that is expressed in these words: "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith. . . . Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be repro-bates?"

The end to be gained is advancement in our spiritual condition, and growth in divine grace; for we never can be too thoroughly established in the truth, nor have too large a measure of the Spirit of Christ in us. Hence we are not to examine ourselves to see how much more progress we have made than we needed to make, and so how much we can rest and relax our efforts; but it is to see wherein, and how, greater attainments are to be made, and what hinders, or threatens, our Christian development and progress.

To do this work effectually, one must have the right standard to which to bring himself to be tested. Three standards at once suggest themselves as not the proper ones by which to be governed. First, a man should not examine himself by himself. He may be better than he has formerly been; but this is not the question to be decided; and this is not enough. The question is, Is he what he should be? Secondly, he should not examine himself by others (2 Cor. 10:12); for they may fall far below the true standard, so that he might be even better than they, and yet come short of standing the test. Thirdly, he should not take as a standard by which to judge of himself, what others may say of him; for others cannot read his heart, they cannot fathom his motives, nor know the whole truth in regard to his character or even his actions.

If we are to examine ourselves to see whether we be in the faith or not, the faith is that by which we are to test ourselves; if it is to see whether we are like Christ or not, then Christ's life and teachings are to be our standard. In other words, true self-examination can be performed with nothing short of the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus.

But how can we examine ourselves by these?—We must know them. Self-examination, then, implies a thorough study of God's word, in all its teachings and admonitions for faith and practice, so that we may know them, and be able to test ourselves by them.

And finally, self-examination implies repentance for all the short-comings we discover in the past, and earnest and faithful amendment of life in days to come. So "let a man examine himself."

ROME AND THE CHURCH.

IN the REVIEW of June 21, under the heading "Peter and Rome," we noticed the claims of the Catholic Church that Peter is the rock on which Christ founded his Church, and that the popes are the successors of Peter. In the same leaflet there referred to, is another claim which some desire to see noticed also. It is that the Church has been ordained as the infallible teacher of the truth; that the Catholic Church is the true Church, alone qualified to teach the truth, and hence that all interpretation of the Bible should be according to the teachings of that Church. In the leaflet aforesaid the claim is stated in these words:—

"It is denied that the Church of God is unerring in teaching the doctrine of Christ. Now in regard to the Church of God, WHAT DOES THE BIBLE SAY? 'Go ye teach all nations . . . teaching them to observe whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always even to the end of the world.' St. Matt. 28:19, 20. 'And he shall give you another Paraclete, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name; he will teach all things, and bring all things to your mind, whatever I shall have said unto you.' V. 26. 'Upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against her.' St. Matt. 16:18. 'He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me.' St. Luke 10:16. 'The Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth.' 1 Tim. 3:15."

In all this there will be noticed the quiet assumption that the Roman Catholic Church is the Church of God. When Christ promised to be with his people to the end of the world, he did not promise to be with a church which should adopt pagan errors and superstitions and corruptions, and become an apostate church. All his promises were to those who should remain true to him, and be his people indeed. The Church of Rome, having become unscriptural and antichristian Church, now arrogates to itself the promises which are made alone to the true Church, that Church which is alone entitled to the name, the Church of God. Christ's charge was, "Teach all nations whatsoever I have commanded you." But we do not know what he commanded them, except from the record they have given us; and the promise in John 14:26 was evidently the special gift of the Spirit, which brought all things to their remembrance, and enabled them to put on record what Christ had commanded them for the instruction of his people in coming ages.

What is recorded in Luke 10:16, was spoken personally to the seventy disciples whom Jesus sent out. It is true of subsequent teachers only as they teach in accordance with the instruction which Christ has caused to be put on record for our guidance.

As to 1 Tim. 3:15, it is "the Church of the living God" which is the pillar and ground of the truth, not a church which has unfortunately gone into darkness and error. And God has always had a church in the earth, and always will have, to maintain, defend, and propagate his truth—a church deriving the truth which it defends and upholds, not from tradition or human councils, but from the word of God alone.

IN THE QUESTION CHAIR.

[DESIGNED for the consideration of such questions as will be of interest and profit to the general reader. All correspondents should give their names and correct post-office address, that queries not replied to here, may be answered by mail.]

209.—UNDER THE LAW. ROM. 3:19; 6:14.

Rom. 3:19 says that whatsoever things the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; and yet in chapter 6:14, the same apostle says of Christians, "Ye are not under the law, but under grace." How can the law say anything to us, if we are not under it?

D. J. S.

Answer.—The expression, "under the law," in these texts evidently means, under the condemnation of the law. To those who have not violated the law, it does not have anything to say by way of condemnation. Its only language, then, is that of instruction how to avoid coming under its condemning power. But the moment we violate the law, then it speaks to us to condemn us. Therefore the declaration that we are "not under the law," in this sense of not being under its condemnation, in no wise releases us from obligation to obey the law. Paul to Timothy (1-1:9) expresses the relation of a righteous man to the law in these words: "The law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient," etc. The word here translated "made," means to "lie against." The law does not lie against (that is, condemn) a righteous man, but it does lie against the lawless, and disobedient, etc.

210.—THE LAW OF MOSES. JOHN 7:23.

Does John 7:23, middle clause, refer to the law of ten commandments, or the law of circumcision?

J. A. Y.

Ans.—To the law of circumcision. The ten commandments are never called "the law of Moses." Christ's argument with the Pharisees on this occasion, was, that it was more important to heal a man, than it was to keep the law of Moses. And yet in order to keep that law, they would circumcise a man on the Sabbath day, if the eighth day on which that law demanded that the child be circumcised, happened to fall on the Sabbath, although this rite involved more outward labor, and hence, to all appearance, a greater violation of the Sabbath, than the work he did in healing a man. And while they would scrupulously follow their law, and not put off circumcision on account of the Sabbath, they would at the same time condemn him for healing a man on the Sabbath, which was a more important work, and did not involve so much of an apparent violation of the Sabbath, as the other. Thus he put them to silence by exposing their inconsistency.

211.—THE FOUR BEASTS. REV. 4:6.

A lady who last fall purchased "Bible Readings," and commenced to keep the Sabbath, desires an explanation of Rev. 4:7-9. Please give it through the Question Chair, and oblige, B. B. N.

Ans.—The use of the term, "beast," in the text referred to, is a very unfortunate translation. It should be, "living beings." And they are beings, too, of great power and glory, resembling the cherubim of Ezekiel, chapters 1 and 10. The qualities and capabilities inhering in these exalted beings, as indicated by the appearance of their different faces, would seem to be strength, perseverance, reason, and swiftness, in comprehending and carrying out the divine will. (See the subject more fully treated in "Thoughts on the Revelation.")

212.—THE MARCH AROUND JERICHO.

Mrs. B. C. writes of a friend who is troubled over the march of the Israelites around Jericho for seven days, as described in Joshua 6, and asks how it can be harmonized with the Sabbath law.

Ans.—There is no difficulty. The Sabbath commandment forbids our own work, not any work which God may lay upon us to do. And the march around Jericho was not a work which the Israelites took up of themselves, and which pertained to the personal, temporal, and secular pursuits of the people; but it was a service which God especially enjoined upon them; and doing what he tells us to do, which is his work, no matter on what day, is no violation of a command which simply forbids our own work. The march around Jericho, was God's work, not their work, and hence was no violation of the Sabbath law.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

"The Sun Shall be Darkened." Matt. 24:29.

As our Saviour makes a darkening of the sun one prominent sign of his second coming, it seems certain it would occur in a land where many were believers—a land largely Christian. Signs taking place in heathen or Mohammedan countries would have no significance to such people. They would not know the signs were ever predicted by our Lord, though they might be greatly frightened by them. Neither would they be well understood in Catholic countries, where the people are not familiar with the Bible. It must be evident that they would have the greatest force and consideration in Protestant lands, where our Lord's predictions were generally known. In such countries we should therefore reasonably expect their wonderful mysteries and solemn testimony would be given.

Of the mystery enshrouding the "Dark Day" of May 19, 1780, we give extracts from witnesses who beheld it.

Noah Webster, LL.D., in the New Haven Herald, 1843, said:—

"I stood and viewed the phenomenon. No satisfactory cause has been assigned."

Rev. Edward Bass, D.D., First Episcopal Bishop of Vermont, in his "diary" (at Newburyport, Mass.), under date of May 19, 1780, wrote:—

"This day is most remarkable in the memory of man for darkness. To pretend fully and clearly to account for it, argues perhaps too great confidence."

Judge Samuel Tenney, LL.D., wrote to the Historical Society in 1785:—

"Several gentlemen of literary ability have endeavored to solve the phenomenon, yet I believe you will agree with me that no satisfactory solution has yet appeared."

Judge R. M. Devins, in Our First Century, says, "It was a wonderful dark day," and one of "perpetual interest." It stands "almost, if not altogether, alone as the most mysterious and as yet unexplained phenomenon of its kind in nature's diversified events during the last century."

The astronomer Herschel is quoted in St. Nicholas as writing:—

"The Dark Day in northern America was one of those wonderful phenomena in nature which will always be read with interest, but which philosophy is at a loss to explain."

Thus these learned witnesses testify of this mysterious, solemn, and unaccountable phenomenon which spread a pall of "sackcloth," as the revelator declared, over the face of the sun, shutting out its light from 700,000 souls, and over an area of 320,000 square miles of the earth's territory.

In the year 1783, just about three years later than the Dark Day of America, Europe was visited by similar phenomena, which though not as intense, were of longer continuance. A peculiar haze spread over the whole of Europe, far into Asia. We are indebted to Taylor's "Great Consummation," pp. 227-233, for the facts we quote.

This haze and strange darkness appeared in Denmark, May 29, reaching France June 14; Italy, June 16; Norway, June 22; Austria and Switzerland, June 23; Sweden, June 24; and Russia, June 25. Before the close of the month, it had overspread all Syria, and it reached to the Altai Mountains in the heart of Asia, about the middle of July.

"The obscurity prevailed a greater portion of the summer, imparting to the sun an unnatural color of a dull rusty red, and causing both the days and nights to wear a weird and gloomy aspect. The atmosphere was highly electric, and nature was greatly convulsed."

Rev. W. R. Andrews, in the London Times, June 8, 1883, quotes as follows:—

"Gilbert White writes in the year 1783, in a letter published in his Natural History of Selborne, Eng., 'The summer of 1783 was an alarming and portentous one, and full of horrible phenomena; for besides the alarming meteors and tremendous thunderstorms that affrighted and distressed England, the peculiar haze or smoky fog that prevailed for many weeks in this island and every part of Europe, and even beyond its limits, was a most extraordinary appearance, unlike anything known within the memory of man. The sun at noon looked black as a clouded moon, and shed a ferruginous [i. e., resembling iron rust, brownish or yellowish red] light on the ground and floors of rooms, but was particularly lurid and blood-colored at rising and setting. The country people began to look with a superstitious awe at the red lowering aspect of the sun, and indeed there was reason for the most enlightened persons to be apprehensive.'"

John Ruskin, who quotes the foregoing letter in his "Plague Storms," p. 97, says, "The fog of 1783 made the sun dark with iron-colored rays."

Milner, in his "Physical Phenomena," p. 68, says, "The gloom extended out from Europe southward into Africa and westward into North America." "The sun," he says, "rose and set without its rays, even in a cloudless sky, and the moon high in heaven had the color of heated brick."

Says the Penny Magazine, Dec. 17, 1836, "It was a remarkable and portentous kind of year."

"All authorities," says Taylor, "declare the strange obscuration caused universal consternation."

In his volume, "Ten Thousand Wonderful Things," p. 414, Mr. E. King testifies, "It produced much fear that the end of all things was at hand."

Dr. N. Webster, in his valuable "History of Pestilences," Vol. II, p. 274, testifies to the general fear.

Says Taylor, "As it was in America on the occurrence of the Dark Day, so the churches in Europe were crowded with alarmed multitudes, supplicating mercy of heaven."

Prof. Leland, the astronomer of France, attempted to quiet the popular fear by ascribing the darkened heavens to exhalations arising out of the earth; but both Webster and Humboldt ("Cosmos IV," p. 75) reject this solution of the mysterious obscurity. Protestant England shared in the alarm it occasioned; and the poet Cowper sang that all the elements "preached the general doom." It was to this unaccountable obscuration of light that he refers to in his Task:—

"Nature seems with dim and sickly eye To wait the close of all."

Various efforts were made by learned men to account for these strange phenomena, but there has been no agreement among them. They are as Taylor declares, "but a jumble of adverse opinions." They never have been explained, nor any reasonable cause given.

Yet it is not necessary to claim them as direct miracles, as we ordinarily understand that word, i. e., that there was a special exercise of miraculous or supernatural agency to cause them. God the Creator works as he chooses. At times his omnipotent power manifests itself by direct agency wholly outside of its ordinary exercise, as we are acquainted with it. We call that a miracle. Yet for all we know, it may be as consistent with the methods or laws through which he acts as other methods with which we are familiar. At other times his power exerts itself through natural law, as we have observed. Yet God is equally responsible for both methods, and his plans and providence are advanced by both.

In all the wonderful darknesses of the past; that at the exode, or in Palestine at the crucifixion, or in the "Dark Day," or the strange darkness of Europe we have just considered, secondary causes may have been the agencies used by Providence to bring on the mysterious obscuration. But that fact does not militate against their being "signs," and a fulfillment of predictions of prophecy, or being produced by Deity for a special purpose. How does it happen that such a wonderful darkness, of three days' duration, "happened" to come over Egypt just at that particular juncture when Moses, the servant of God, was the agent for displaying signs and wonders before Pharaoh, at a great crisis in the affairs of his special people? What good reason can be given that after fifteen centuries had elapsed, with no such remarkable darkness appearing, on the middle of a particular day, when Jesus hung on the cross, all at once the blackness of night should cover the land, and all hearts be filled with terror, the people beating their breasts, and even the Roman centurion becoming convinced of the Saviour's innocence?

And why did the same kind of strange phenomena again appear after the lapse of many centuries, all over Europe and in Christian America, in a period distinctly marked off—a little period of time bounded by plain prophetic declarations? Such events did happen precisely as, and in the time, our Lord predicted. Scientists have not been able to agree upon any explanation of them. They stand out as waymarks of history. They affect the people as something startling, strange, mysterious, unaccountable, and are regarded at the time they transpire as signs of the day of God. And truly they were such. In our next we present much more testimony concerning the "Dark Day."

"WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"—NO. 1.

The Present Indications.

FOR more than two score of years Seventh-day Adventists have looked forward to three events that would stand in immediate connection with the coming of Christ. These events were:—

First, the spreading of the truth in all the nations of the earth as a witness. The Saviour gives this as a sign, and connects it with the end in response to the disciples' question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" He said: "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come."

Secondly, the loud cry of the third angel's message. This is clothing the word of God with special power, signified by a mighty angel coming down from heaven, uniting with, and becoming a part of, the third angel's message when his people would go forth to proclaim this truth unto the world. Thus would be fulfilled the prophecy recorded in Rev. 18:1: "I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lightened with his glory." This would be proclaimed at the time when Babylon would have become the hold of every foul spirit, and the cage of every unclean and hateful bird, which is rapidly being accomplished at the present day.

Thirdly, a time would come when persecution would begin in this country by the imprisonment of those who conscientiously kept the commandments of God because they would not worship the beast or his image. This would result in the confiscation of their property, and the decree to put to death those who would not worship the image of the beast, at which time Christ would come and deliver his people. But the decree to put to death the people of God would not come until at the time of Christ's coming, which is at least one year after the ending of probation.

In Daniel 2 we have the four kingdoms, which bring us down to the dividing up of the Roman empire into its ten parts; and these divisions were to continue till the fifth kingdom would be set up. There is nothing in this prophecy that marks the immediate nearness of the setting up of that kingdom, as already we have been in that state for about fourteen hundred years. The same might be said of the prophecy in the 7th and 8th chapters of Daniel, with this exception; that the Roman power is referred to as continuing for 1260 years, and as having a reviving in connection with the second coming of Christ. We find this to be the same with the 11th chapter.

The application of the prophecy in the latter part of the 11th chapter is understood to be the driving of the Turks from Europe, which would also be a sure indication of the second coming of Christ. But it will be noticed that when the king of the North shall plant the tabernacle of his palace between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain, "he comes to his end and none shall help him." It is at that time that the time of trouble begins, such as never was since the beginning of the world. That is in the midst of the last movement of the nations of the earth, so we cannot tell with any degree of certainty how near we are, only every indication is that the next great move brings us to the second coming of Christ.

The international unrest, agitation, and suspicion of the Old World has been the same for many years, increasing at times, and at times lulled again into partial quietude by the professions of peace and safety. These are the war-waging elements that are held in check by the four angels standing on the four corners of the earth to hold the four winds for the sealing of God's servants. How long the angels will restrain the elements is limited simply by the sealing of the servants of God, which brings us to the fulfillment of the prophecy of Matt. 24:14. Therefore there is nothing in these prophecies that marks the immediate coming of Christ; but in the spread of the gospel, in the loud cry of the third angel's message, and in the persecution that comes upon those who keep the commandments of God, especially in this country, are evidences that are unmistakable and positively definite in their nature, and which connect the people of God with the ending of probation and the second coming of Christ.

Have we any indication that these events are now transpiring? Is it true that the third angel's message is so rapidly spreading in this world that it will be impossible for us to tell how soon it will have accomplished its work as a witness? The growth and progress of the cause which shows the fulfillment of prophecy has been truly marvelous, from whatever standpoint we choose to look upon it. From a small beginning it has grown and developed until it has attracted national attention. Up to 1862 we had but one publishing house, and published one paper; yet the entire receipts were insufficient to pay the expenses of this one periodical. At the present time we have the Battle Creek Publishing House, the Pacific Press Publishing House, one in Australia, one in Basel, Switzerland, and one in Christiania, Norway. Our school interests also have grown as remarkably, with a college at Battle Creek, one at Healdsburg, one at Lincoln, Nebr., and an academy at South Lancaster, Mass.

The health question has also grown, so that its influence is now felt all over the civilized world, to a greater or less extent. The health and temperance question has not been behind in its onward march. The Sanitarium at Battle Creek has become the largest and most thoroughly equipped institution of the kind known in the world. The one at St. Helena, Cal., is also assuming proportions that will enable it to send forth rays of light the coming year much in advance of any time in the history of the past.

How much property has been invested in these institutions, located in different portions of the world? Without speaking of other institutions that by your Sunday-closing amendment,' 'Stand fast by your amendment,' 'Please stand firm,' 'Do not make any compromise,' and so on, until the monotony was varied by one, 'We trust you will stand firm.'

"Senators who seldom smile and very seldom indulge in outbursts of laughter, were gradually drawn from seriousness to levity, and from restraint to loud laughter, as one after another of these sententious appeals was read.

"Finally there came a climax, in which the spectators and the senators joined in a chorus of loud and prolonged laughter. Their cause was the reading of a dispatch which fully explained why so many telegrams from so many different sources were substantially alike. It read: 'In accordance with your request, we hope you will stand firm by your Sunday amendment.'"

"In accordance with your request!" In other words, Mr. Quay had himself dictated the tenor of these dispatches, and requested that they be sent to him, to be read in the Senate, and published in the Congressional Record, in order that he might pose before the country as a moral hero. And that he might so pose, the Sunday institution, as now manipulated by the religio-political organizations of the country, was a very convenient instrument. Who cannot see the use that will be made of religious institutions by unscrupulous and hypocritical men, to lift themselves into favor with the people, or to retain what favor they already have, when religious qualifications, real or pretended, become with the constituents of our political leaders a test of fitness for holding office?

And thus will politicians and churchmen trade their influence with each other, the one supporting religious measures in return for political support from the other, exactly as was done in the days of Constantine, in the formation of the papacy.

It is worthy of note that the amendment of Senator Quay, as originally worded, provided that the Exposition should be closed "on the Sabbath day,"—a wording which led Senator Manderson to say, "I submit that if the senator from Pennsylvania desires that the Exposition shall be closed upon Sunday, this language will not necessarily meet that idea. The Sabbath day is not Sunday. Decisions are abundant upon the proposition that that language does not mean the first day of the week, even in this Christian nation." He then proposed to amend Senator Quay's amendment by substituting for "the Exposition on the Sabbath day" the words, "mechanical portion of the Exposition on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday,"—a proposition which Mr. Quay accepted, as he said, so far as concerned the phraseology designating the first day of the week. Thus while it is known and admitted in the United States Senate that Sunday is not the Sabbath, the vote is still overwhelmingly in favor of enforcing that day as a day of rest.

A few quotations from some of the leading speakers upon the question will no doubt be of interest to the reader. The first is from Senator Palmer:—

"I grant there is a large number of good people who ask for the closing of the Exposition on Sunday, but I will state to the senator from Pennsylvania that I have a very large number of petitions from those who believe that Sunday is not the Sabbath, who believe the seventh day is the Sabbath, and not the first, and a proper regard for their opinion, it seems to me, would at least prevent this arbitrary interference on the part of the United States, in electing a particular day which would be offensive to the consciences not of a majority, but of a very large number of good people. They insist that if the United States government is to elect, is to fix, is to appropriate a day; if it is to adopt a day and compel its observance, it is a hardship upon them. They are a minority, and the question as to which is the Sabbath is one about which honest men are divided. I think it will be far better that the matter should be left to the discretion of those to whom the United States has intrusted everything else which pertains to the management of this great enterprise."

Mr. Pettigrew said:—

"I am thoroughly convinced that it is for the financial interest of the Fair, that it is for the interest of the laboring men of this country, and responsive to the entire religious sentiment of the United States, that the Fair shall be closed on Sunday; and therefore with great pleasure I shall vote for the amendment offered by the senator from Pennsylvania."

Senator Hawley, evidently with the recent decision of the Supreme Court that this is a Christian nation, fresh in his mind, made a speech in favor of Sunday-closing, which, as nearly as we can judge, could not have been improved upon by a National Reformer himself. "I would not," he said, "for the wealth of ten Expositions have upon my shoulders the responsibility of having decided the question wrongly upon what may be a turning point in the history of the United States. Open the Exposition on Sunday, and the flood-gates are opened. Hereafter it will be forever pointed to as a precedent of high authority for opening [on Sunday] all exhibitions and places of amusement or alleged instruction." He referred to the fact that legislative bodies open their sessions with prayer, to the prayers offered daily in the Senate and House of Representatives, the Thanksgiving proclamations of the Presidents, and even the observance of Christmas, as precedents upon which to base the action of closing the Fair on Sunday. He alluded to the Sunday laws of the States and Territories, which he said were based upon a religious regard for the day as well as upon physical grounds, and asserted that if the ten commandments "had not been discovered in the Old Testament, wise men would have devised something very similar to them!" Finally he showed the regard which leading churchmen had for Sunday, by quoting liberally from the utterances of Roman Catholic and Protestant bishops upon that subject.

Senator Peffer referred to the fact that the senators, however piously they might express themselves in the matter of Sunday observance, were in the habit of receiving their mails twice on that day, and said: "A great deal of this talk of ours about the observance of Sunday is sheer hypocrisy."

And what "sheer hypocrisy" it was may be seen from the action of the same body with reference to the subject of the prohibition of liquor-selling at the Fair. On Wednesday the Senate passed, together with the Sunday-closing provision, an amendment providing that the sale of liquor on the grounds of the Fair should be prohibited; but the next day this action was re-considered, the prohibitory liquor clause was stricken out, and the appropriation passed with the Sunday amendment alone. Thus those who are in favor of a closed Sunday record themselves at the same time as in favor of open whisky.

The provision as thus amended will go to the House of Representatives in a day or two, and the probability is that it will pass that body by a small vote, after which only the signature of the President will be necessary to its validity.

This is the first time in our history that national governmental action has been taken with reference to the observance of Sunday, and it need not be said that the proceeding is significant of what is soon to follow.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Important Testimony on the Dark Day.

'Twas on a May-day of the far old year
Seventeen hundred eighty, that there fell
Over the bloom and sweet life of the spring,
Over the fresh earth and the heaven of noon,
A horror of great darkness, like the night
In day of which the Norland sagas tell,—
The twilight of the gods. The low-hung sky
Was black with ominous clouds, save where its rim
Was fringed with a dull glow, like that which climbs
The crater's sides from the red hell below.
Birds ceased to sing, and all the barn-yard fowls
Roosted; the cattle at the pasture bars
Low'd, and look'd homeward; bats on leathern wings
Flitted abroad; the sounds of labor died;
Men prayed, and women wept; all ears grew sharp
To hear the doom-blast of the trumpet shatter
The black sky, that the dreadful face of Christ
Might look from the rent clouds, not as he look'd
A loving guest at Bethany, but stern
As justice and inexorable law.

—John G. Whittier, in "Abraham Davenport."

Whittier in this remarkable poem presents perhaps as true and vivid a picture of the effect of the Dark Day as can be found. The above is a wonderful delineation, but there are other references in it that are very striking:—

Meanwhile in the old State-house, dim as ghosts,
Sat the lawgivers of Connecticut, Trembling beneath their legislative robes.
"It is the Lord's great day! Let us adjourn,"
Some said; and then, as if with one accord,

All eyes were turned to Abraham Davenport.
He rose, slow cleaving with his steady voice
The intolerable hush. "This well may be The day of judgment, which the world awaits,"

he said, and then proposed to be found doing his duty, and to perform the duties of the hour, and spake upon the business before them, while—

His awe-struck colleagues listening all the while,
Between the pauses of his argument,
To hear the thunder of the wrath of God
Break from the hollow trumpet of the cloud.

The scene would well be worthy a master artist, to paint the old State-house in the darkness of that awful day, with its trembling members at noonday doing the work of legislation by candle-light. The poet has not exaggerated the terrors of that scene. A multitude of testimonies prove this statement.

We quote next from the Journal of that same "Connecticut House of Representatives," May 19, 1780:—

"A solemn gloom of unusual darkness before ten o'clock,—a still darker cloud rolling under the sable curtain from north and west before eleven o'clock, excluded the light, so that none could see to read or write in the house, even at either window, or distinguish persons at a small distance or perceive any distinction of dress in the circle of attendants; wherefore at eleven o'clock adjourned the House till two in the afternoon."

"An extraordinary phenomenon! In most parts of the country it was so dark in the day-time that people could not tell the hour by either watch or clock; nor dine, nor manage their domestic business without the light of candles. The birds having sung their evening songs, disappeared and were silent; pigeons and fowls retired to roost; the cocks crow'd as at daybreak, objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance, and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night. The extent of this darkness was extraordinary."—Dr. Gordon's Hist. Revolution, Vol. III, p. 56, 1789, quoted from "Great Consummation."

"The darkness appears to have extended all over the New England States. It was observed as far northeast as Falmouth, now Portland, Me.; to the westward it extended to the farthest parts of Connecticut and to Albany, N. Y.; to the south all along the sea-coast, and north as far as our settlements extended."—Prof. S. Williams of Cambridge, Mass., in "Memoirs of the Academy of Arts and Sciences," 1785.

"I have seen a very sensible captain of a vessel, who was that morning about forty leagues southeast of Boston. Between one and two o'clock P. M. he was obliged to light a candle to steer by."—Independent Chronicle, Boston, June 15, 1780.

"This strange darkness covered all the country from northern Canada to Pennsylvania, and from Nova Scotia to Lake Champlain, besides hundreds of miles out to sea."—Boston Journal.

"A tract of land and sea 800 miles in length, and 400 miles in breadth, embracing an area of 320,000 square miles, was known to be covered with the cloud, and so far as can be ascertained, a population of 700,000 souls sat for a portion of the day and night in a gloom more or less profound and inexplicable."—Boston Journal, June 14, 1871.

These extracts give important data concerning the extent of this wonderful obscuration. At least we know from the testimony given, that it covered all the territory stated, and very likely much more. Away back in that age of the Revolution, the country was sparsely settled, and but few papers published, compared with now. One extract says it was dark as far west as Albany, in New York State; but how much farther we know not. It also extended northward into Canada, and southward in the colonies; we cannot tell its exact dimensions. But we have plain evidence of its prevalence over a territory 800 miles long by 400 wide, embracing 320,000 square miles. Would any question this being a special, supernatural sign, because its extent was not sufficient? Let such note this fact: The supernatural darkness at Christ's crucifixion was said to be "over all the land." Matt. 27:45. Probably the land of Palestine was intended. That contained about 13,000 square miles only. But suppose it included all Syria? That would include 55,500 more, or 68,500 square miles in all, which that darkness might be supposed to cover. How could that compare with 320,000 for extent? It is said that the darkness at the exode was over the "land of Egypt." Ex. 10:21. The land of Egypt, according to Schaff's Bible Dictionary, contains 212,000 square miles only—less by considerable than the territory covered by the Dark Day. Egypt, Syria, and Palestine altogether contain only about two hundred and eighty thousand square miles, some forty thousand in the aggregate less than the extent of the great darkness of 1780. Yet all who believe their Bibles must admit that those at the exode and crucifixion were mighty signs of the supernatural influence which gave them as tokens of the Deity's interference, indicating who were the Lord's and who were not. But in extent, each of them was probably much exceeded by the Dark Day.

The intensity of the darkness has been referred to already in the extracts. We will make other quotations:—

"The printers acknowledge their incapacity of describing the phenomenon which appeared in that town on Friday last. It grew darker and darker, until nearly one o'clock, when it became so dark the inhabitants were obliged to quit their business, and they had to dine by the light of the candle. . . . Such a phenomenon was never before seen by the oldest person living."—The Boston Gazette of May 22, 1780.

The Concord, N. H., people speak of it thus:—

"It was not the blackness of the storm-cloud, such as sometimes with a frightful agitation breaks over a single city; it was the silent spreading of the pall-cloth over the earth by strong invisible hands."

We present another extract from the Boston Journal:—

"And the brute and the feathered creation seemed puzzled and agitated. The birds ceased to fly, and hid themselves in the branches of the trees. As the darkness increased, they sang their evening songs as they do at twilight, and became silent. Pigeons on the wing took to the shelter of the forests, as they do at night. The whip-poor-will, as if it were truly night, cheerfully sang his song through the gloomy hours. . . . Bats came out of their hiding places, and flew about. The fowls marched solemnly to their roosts, as they do only at nightfall, and after cackling for a while over the mystery of so short a day, became still. Cocks crowed as is their custom at nightly intervals and the early breaking of the day. Frogs peeped their evening concert, and dogs whined or howled, and ran away, as on the approach of an earthquake. The herds of cattle on New England's thousand hills sought the shelter of the shed or barn-yard, lowing as they came to the gate; and sheep huddled around the circle with their heads inward,—the invariable token of apprehended danger."

Says the Portsmouth Journal of May 20, 1780, the day following the Dark Day:—

"The alarm produced by this unusual aspect of the heavens was very great."

Martin Page, in Providence Journal of 1863 says:—

"I was twelve miles from Providence, R. I., in the eighth year of my age, assisting R. Sheldon to plow. At 10 A. M. we could not see far. We had to leave off plowing and go home. It was very thick and dark before twelve o'clock, and after that it looked frightful."

Says a Newport, R. I., correspondent:—

"It is not recollected from history that a darkness of equal intenseness and duration has ever happened in any part of the world except that at the crucifixion of our blessed Saviour. It is to be desired that curious and philosophical gentlemen would favor the public with a solution of this phenomenon."

No doubt many have desired to see such an explanation, but we have no record of any such ever having been produced. It remains as unaccountable and mysterious after the lapse of a century as it was the day of its occurrence, as many eminent scholars have admitted.

An essay by John Kennedy, a farmer, presents his reflections concerning it:—

"The late wonderful and unusual darkness struck the inhabitants of this State (Massachusetts) with horror and amazement, and filled them with alarming apprehensions. The very brutes seemed greatly agitated. If so, could a thinking being sit unmoved, while he beheld the sun veiled in darkness at noon-day, to view nature dressed in mourning attire; the earth-enveloped in darkness; the husbandman returning from the fields in great surprise; the midnight sentinels crowing in answer to each other; the night birds singing their dreary notes; the beasts gazing in wild consternation? Every countenance seemed to gather blackness, and a dismal gloom filled the beholder with fear and astonishment, all waiting with much anxiety for some great event. In fine, the darkness was such as we or our fathers never saw equaled. 'It is the Lord's doing; it is marvelous in our eyes.'"

These extracts are quite explicit as to the degree of darkness which prevailed, and the emotions it excited. It was, in short, the turning of day into night.

Notice the following from the Massachusetts Spy, May 25, 1780:—

"It was the judgment of many, that about twelve o'clock the daylight was no greater, if so bright, as moonlight, which by calculation has been found to be 90,000 times less than that of a clear, sunshiny day."

Truly, then, the "sun" was "darkened." It greatly affected all beholders. Even many of the brute creation were in terror. They thought night had come.

"WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"—NO. 2.

Our Canvassing Work.

We wish to speak particularly of the canvassing work in its relation to extending a knowledge of the truth to the world. Ten years ago there was not a single canvasser in the field, supporting himself by selling our publications; but how do we start in the year 1892? Within this ten years the fields of Australia and New Zealand have been opened, and two Conferences organized, with about eight hundred keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, where there was not one ten years ago. This is simply one field alone which has been opened. In 1891 we find in these two fields about fifty self-supporting missionary canvassers, converts in their own territory, visiting during the year no less than eighty-five thousand families, and by personal labor presenting the truth in some of its phases, and placing books in about twenty thousand families who before had no knowledge of it. Let it be remembered that many of these people are reached by this means alone, who could not be reached by any other agency. To illustrate the amount of work done, we take Australia. During 1891, its thirty-five canvassers took 14,000 orders. Allowing that four families are visited to secure one order, then we have 56,000 families visited in Australia, who heretofore had no knowledge of the truth. Allowing the same ratio for New Zealand, we have the 85,000 mentioned above. These fifty self-supporting missionaries are individuals who have embraced the truth in these newly opened fields. Australia is not an exception to this canvassing work; but what is true of that country is also true of the United States, England, Africa, and portions of the continent of Europe. In the year 1892 we started out with 1,000 well-trained canvassers in the different fields, making no allowance for those who have entered the field during the present year, nor for those who canvass for a few weeks at a time and then return home. Over three quarters of a million of dollars' worth of books were sold in this manner during the year 1891.

On the same ratio of canvassing, four individuals to secure one order, we would have 40,000 families visited and canvassed weekly in the entire field, or over two million during the present year. It should be remembered that when these books are delivered, they live and bear their testimony until the coming of the Lord. The books are not all laid upon the shelf. Some fall into the second-hand bookstores, or are passed from family to family, so that no estimate can be given of the number of those to whom they bear their testimony.

A short time since, we entered a second-hand bookstore, and saw the different volumes of the "Great Controversy" on the shelf for sale. Individuals came in one after another, took them down, ran them through, spending all the way from two to five minutes each with the books. At first I was inclined to purchase them, but when I saw them bearing their testimony to these individuals, I concluded that it was better to let them thus continue to bear their testimony than to take them myself.

Now if one additional phase of the work which did not exist ten years ago has already reached a point where without any increase, it reaches, in one year, 2,000,000 families who are not in the truth, and in addition to this it lives and witnesses to the end, who can form an estimate when the gospel will be preached in all the world for a witness? The above considerations do not include the twenty-five more or less periodicals that are published in the different languages, the tract and missionary societies throughout the world, nor the individual work of the living preacher. All these branches of the work have been in existence for a much longer period. Upon these estimates alone, we can only conclude that solemn and momentous times are these in which we live; for we are, as the hymn says, in "an age on ages telling—to be living is sublime." As it relates to the spreading of the knowledge of the truth in the earth, who can tell when the gospel of the kingdom has been preached as a witness in all the world? Let none be deceived upon this point. As surely as it relates to the spreading of the rays of light as an evidence of the immediate coming of Christ, the end is near, stealing upon us so stealthfully, so imperceptibly, so noiselessly, like the muffled tread of the thief in the night to surprise the sleepers on guard, that many will be planning for the future, looking forward to the time when the world will be warned, but will awake to find it is warned, the end has come, and they are not ready. May God help us to realize where we are, and the rapidity with which the truth is spreading, lest we be found unprepared, and be among those who will say, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved." FROM AUSTRALIA.

We are trying to learn the lesson that the psalmist tried to impress so deeply upon our hearts in these words, "Wait, I say, on the Lord." We remember that with those injunctions are connected some gracious promises. We still have to report that sister White is under the hand of pain and weakness. She is not able at present to do any work except in writing, and that is done under great difficulty. For several weeks she has been unable to meet with us on the Sabbath or at any other time. Her trouble is principally with rheumatism, which in this country, as in others, is apt to prove a very formidable and obstinate disease to deal with. Her brain and mind have not been affected, and she rejoices in clearness of thought, and is cheerful in her trust in God. She feels that God hears the prayers of his people in her behalf, and that in his own good time he will remove the power of the enemy, and rebuke the disease. We would be submissive to what the Lord sees to be best, but we trust that it will soon seem good to him to bless the means which are put forth for her recovery.

At present they contemplate removing to Adelaide, where the climate is more genial during the winter than in Melbourne. Sister Tay, lately of the "Pitcairn," has joined the family of sister White, where her presence is a mutual comfort. It is a pleasure to report that sister Bolton seems to be recovering from the injury to her foot, mentioned in my last report.

Brother W. D. Curtis and family, who have been over five years in Australia, are now with us, having left Adelaide on their way to return to the States, for which purpose they take advantage of the sailing of the "Pitcairn" from Auckland to San Francisco, via Pitcairn and other islands of the Pacific Ocean. They will be greatly missed in the field which they are now leaving, and by our people generally; but the associations which they will gain will no doubt make a return to their native land desirable to them.

The "Pitcairn" company and all friends of the cause have been in deep anxiety over the serious illness of Captain Marsh, which terminated so sadly on the 3rd inst. Amid all the discouragements of this life there would be enough to dishearten those who are trying to do good, if the power of the enemy were not limited, and if we did not realize that our cause was the cause of the omnipotent God, who can by his word bring light out of darkness, and speak peace and blessing in every time of trial. We are often made to realize that our strength is but weakness itself, but in every extremity God makes his strength to appear so that his counsels will prevail.

But though we are so subject to circumstances, it is a blessed assurance that our God is above all circumstances, and that the agencies which are his own continue to work, even when the human arm is paralyzed, or the heart trembling on account of the weakness of the flesh. At no time in the history of our work has it been more apparent that the heavenly agencies are at work pushing forward the last work of mercy in this part of the world. We surely need apprehend no failure on the part of

"There is some soul of greatness in things evil."

And so we might reasonably expect to find a faint reflection, at least, of this greatness in those who were inspired by fallen angels, and who learnt to own them as lords. Nor would such an expectation be disappointed; for if we investigate early paganism by the light of recent discoveries, we soon perceive that its chief strength lay in its intellectual attractions, and that many of its priests and initiates were distinguished as philosophers and men of science.

"But—still more strange!—if, after our investigation, we glance at the world of to-day, we see the men of this nineteenth century returning to the wisdom of long past ages, and modern thought sustaining its flight upon the wings of ancient lore. Nay, almost every characteristic of antiquity seems to be re-appearing. Open intercourse with demons is being renewed on a vast scale in the very heart of Christendom, and even among the hitherto somewhat Sadducean Protestants; numerous circles are carrying on magical practices; attempts are being made to restore the influence of those ancient Mysteries which are said to have been always kept up by a few initiates; the old mesmeric healings are again performed; star-gazers and planet-rulers have greatly increased, while many amateur students are zealously assisting to re-establish the power of astrology over the human race; the use of the divining rod, and countless other practices of primal and medieval times, are once more becoming common. And, impossible as it would have seemed a few years ago, all these 'superstitions' are floating back to us upon the tide of 'modern thought.' They come no longer veiled in mystery, nor claiming to be miraculous or divine; but in accordance with the spirit of the age, present themselves as the fruit of science, as an evidence of the progress of knowledge in regard to the laws of the visible and invisible worlds."

Of the means by which these ancient Mysteries have been preserved, and of some of their modern exponents, with the objects of the Theosophical Society, the author says:—

"By means of various secret associations, Occultism appears to have been handed down from the times of the Mysteries to our own days. The only Brotherhood at present mentioned in the outer world is one which extends its branches throughout the East, and of which the headquarters are reported to be in Thibet. It is open to any person who can prove himself fit for membership; but the neophyte, or chela, must undergo a discipline of many years, and pass through terrible ordeals, before he can be completely initiated. These trials, it is affirmed, are neither arranged by caprice, nor designed to support a jealous exclusiveness; but are necessary to the pupil himself, to prepare him for the tremendous revelation which will at last reward his successful perseverance.

"But—as we are informed by those who claim authority for their statements—the advances of modern science, and especially the spread of evolutionary philosophy, having fitted the world for deeper teaching, the Brothers decided that the time had come to communicate with it, and openly influence its religion and philosophy. They have, however, become so etherealized by their practices that they are unable to endure contact with coarse human nature; it was, therefore, necessary to employ intermediaries.

"The first person known to have been chosen for this purpose was a Madame Blavatski, a Russian gentlewoman, granddaughter of Princess Dolgorouki of the elder branch, and widow of General N. V. Blavatski, Governor, during the Crimean War and for many years, of Erivan in Armenia. This lady, after devoting herself to occult pursuits for some thirty years, repaired to a Himalayan retreat, where she spent seven years under the immediate direction of the Brothers, and was initiated and instructed for her mission. She was then dismissed to the outer world, and having proceeded to America, and attracted there a number of sympathizing minds, she organized the Theosophical Society, at New York, under the presidency of Colonel Olcott. This was in the year 1875. Then, after crossing to England and establishing the society in this country, she returned to India, where her flattery of the natives and dislike to their British rulers, together with her nationality, caused her, and not without reason, to be regarded as a spy. At last, however, perceiving her mistake, she changed her mode of action, and, having obtained introductions to British officials at Simla, began to make some progress. The objects of the society were then set forth as follows:—

- "1. To form the nucleus of a universal brotherhood of humanity.
- "2. To study Aryan literature, religion, and science.
- "3. To vindicate the importance of this inquiry.
- "4. To explore the hidden mysteries of nature, and the latent powers of man.

"Subsequently a fifth object of the society, the destruction of Christianity, was revealed. 'Later it has determined to spread among the "poor, benighted heathen" such evidences as to the practical results of Christianity as will at least give both sides of the story to the communities among which missionaries are at work. With this view it has established relations with associations and individuals throughout the East, to whom it furnishes authenticated reports of the ecclesiastical crimes and misdemeanors, schisms and heresies, controversies and litigations, doctrinal differences and Biblical criticisms and revisions, with which the press of Christian Europe and America constantly teems. Christendom has been long and minutely informed of the degradation and brutishness into which Buddhism, Brahmanism, and Confucianism have plunged their deluded votaries, and many millions have been lavished upon foreign missions under such false representations. The Theosophical Society, seeing daily exemplifications of this very state of things as the sequence of Christian teaching and example—the latter especially—thought it simple justice to make the facts known in Palestine, India, Ceylon, Cashmere, Tartary, Thibet, China, and Japan, in all of which countries it has influential correspondents. It may also in time have much to say about the conduct of the missionaries to those who contribute to their support."

"It will, therefore, be seen that this foe has made a formal declaration of war. By the autumn of 1883 there were already seventy branches of the society in India, and many thousands of Mohammedans, Buddhists, Hindus, Parsees, Christians, officials and non-officials, governors and governed, have been brought together by its instrumentality."

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Important Testimony on the Dark Day.

WE next introduce testimony, showing the effect of this great "sign" on multitudes of beholders. It would be reasonable to expect a sign of the great day of the Lord would be so striking as deeply to affect the minds of those who saw it, making them think most seriously of the event of which it was a premonitory token. If no such thoughts and emotions were caused by it, one would naturally think it was a failure, so far as its effects were concerned. But if it did move the general public greatly, causing intense alarm, because nearly all felt it was a mighty evidence of the soon coming of the Saviour, that would be a strong argument in favor of its being a "sign" indeed of that event.

"The 19th of May, 1780, was a remarkably dark day. Candles were lighted in many houses. The birds were silent and disappeared. The fowls returned to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of judgment was at hand. The Legislature of Connecticut was in session at Hartford, but being unable to transact business, adjourned."—President Dwight, Conn., Historical Collections.

"Almost, if not altogether, alone, as the most mysterious and as yet unexplained phenomenon of its kind in nature's diversified range of events during the last century, stands the Dark Day of May 19, 1780,—a most unaccountable darkening of the whole visible heavens and atmosphere in New England, which brought intense alarm and distress to multitudes of minds, as well as dismay to the brute creation, the fowls fleeing bewildered to their roosts, and the birds to their nests, and the cattle returned to their stalls. Indeed, thousands of the good people of that day became fully convinced that the end of all things terrestrial had come; many gave up for the time their secular pursuits, and betook themselves to religious devotions."—Our First Century, pp. 88-96, by R. M. Devins.

These accounts are from cool-headed historians, writing many years after, from the historical data in their possession. Let us read extracts from eye-witnesses, giving their own impressions.

Rev. Elam Potter, A. M., at Enfield, Conn., May 28, 1780 (just nine days after the Dark Day), taking Matt. 24:29, 30 for his text, the very scripture indicating the sun's darkening, used the following language:—

"But especially I mention the wonderful darkness on the 19th of May inst. Then, as in our text, the sun was darkened—such a darkness as was probably never known before, since the crucifixion of our Lord. People left their work in the house and in the field. Travelers stopped; schools broke up at eleven o'clock; people lit candles at noon-day; and the fire shone as at night. Some people, I have been told, were in dismay, and thought whether the day of judgment were not drawing on. A great part of the following night also was singularly dark. The moon, though in the full, gave no light, as in our text."

Here we see a learned minister, who had had days for reflection, preaching on this very prediction of our Lord, and he made the application of the text to the dark day just past. This is as we should expect a true "sign" of the Lord's coming would affect the beholder.

In the "Life of Edward Lee," by the American Tract Society, No. 379, we have the following:—

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when all faces seemed to gather blackness, and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived; 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment-day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man; for his lamp was trimmed and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."

Milo Bostwick, writing from Camden, N. J., March 3, 1848, said:—

"The 19th of May, in the year 1780, I well remember. I was then in my sixteenth year. The morning was clear and pleasant, but somewhere about eight o'clock my father came into the house, and said there was an uncommon appearance in the sun. There were not any clouds, but the air was thick, having a smoky appearance, and the sun shone with a pale and yellowish hue, but kept growing darker and darker, until it was hid from sight. At noon we lit a candle, but it did not give light as in the night, and my father could not see to read with two candles. My father and mother, who were pious, thought the day of judgment was near. They sat up that night, during the latter part of which they said the darkness disappeared, and then the sky seemed as usual, but the moon, which was at its full, had the appearance of blood. The alarm that it caused, and the frequent talk about it, impressed it deeply on my mind."

In the diary of Mrs. Abigail Bailey, at Newburyport, Mass., she says:—

"The sky toward which all eyes were turned, appeared of a yellowish hue. No distinct cloud was visible. There was no motion of the air sufficient to move a leaf, and darkness overshadowed the earth. . . . The cattle which had been turned to pasture came along homeward, and lowing as they slowly returned. The birds were fluttering on the trees, and hiding among the leaves, as when a thunder-storm is coming on. The fowls hastened to their roosting places. All nature seemed hushed, as though Jehovah was about to make himself known by some mighty act. Every eye was turned upward, every one inquiring, What is going to take place? Some asked, Is the judgment-day approaching? The vessels at the wharves, with sails loosened and colors unfurled, appeared as in mourning on some great occasion. Not a color waved at mast-head, nor a sail showed the least appearance of any wind. The bells rung for meeting. The sailors poured into the house, and filled it. Mr. Spring (Rev. Samuel Spring, pastor of the North church in Newburyport), standing at his place, cried, 'O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord.' Jer. 22:29. In speaking he excelled himself. The congregation was motionless, and heard with intense interest."—Morton's Life of Mrs. A. Bailey, p. 39, 1849.

Says the Young Folks' Magazine:—

"Every one believed that the most dreadful thing he could imagine was about to happen, and nearly every one began to pray aloud. They read and prayed the whole day through."

Says a correspondent of the Massachusetts Spy, 1780:—

"During the whole time a sickly melancholy gloom overcast the face of nature. Nor was the darkness of the night less uncommon and terrifying than that of the day; for notwithstanding there was almost a full moon, no object was discernible but by the help of some artificial light." "This unusual phenomenon excited the fears and apprehensions of many people."

"Victor," on May 27, 1780, writes from Ipswich, Mass., to the Boston Gazette, published in the issue of May 29, 1780, of observations made there by several gentlemen of liberal education, as follows:—

"At eleven o'clock the darkness was such as to demand our attention. At half-past eleven, in a room with three windows, twenty-four panes each, all opening toward the southeast and south, large print could not be read by persons with good eyes. About twelve o'clock, the windows being still open, a candle cast a shade so well defined on the wall that profiles were taken with as much ease as they could have been in the night. At one o'clock the darkness was greater than it had been any time before. In the evening (at Salem) perhaps it was never darker since the children of Israel left the house of bondage."

Many other similar quotations gathered from various sources might be presented, but surely these are sufficient to convince any one that the Dark Day was a wonderful and mysterious phenomenon. It was not caused by an eclipse, for as many of these extracts have shown, the moon was full at the time of this darkness. The sun cannot be eclipsed when the moon is full, as an eclipse of the sun is caused by the moon coming between the sun and the earth to intercept its rays, while at the time of a full moon the sun and moon are always on opposite sides of the earth, the moon rising as the sun has just set. It is a physical impossibility for the sun to be eclipsed at the time of a full moon.

Again: the length of time the darkness continues during an eclipse is quite brief, very brief indeed during the time when the darkness is very noticeable. While the mysterious darkness of May 19, 1780, began at 9 A. M., and continued till near the following morning, the darkness of the night, according to many testimonies, was as strange and marked as that of the day. Never did any eclipse cause such a darkness as that.

Some have suggested the burning of forests as the cause of this darkness, though having no evidence whatever that they could ever produce, showing that there was any remarkable conflagration about that time to cause it. The middle of May in New England is not the time for extensive forest fires. But who ever heard of a smoke from any forest fire that would cover a space 800 miles long and 400 broad, embracing 320,000 square miles of the earth's surface? Such an idea is wholly preposterous. There were no volcanoes within many thousands of miles to scatter smoke, dust, or ashes, and no record has been presented, to the best of our knowledge, that any volcano was active at that time. Many of these witnesses declare no cloud, such as we ordinarily observe, appeared to cause it. It was, and still is, wholly mysterious, unexplainable, unaccountable, only upon the hypothesis of our Saviour's prediction. In view of that, all is clear, consistent, harmonious, and convincing.

It came at the right time, just after the greatest tribulation God's elect ever saw in this world's history, after more than fifty millions of them had been put to death. It was after the great earthquake of Lisbon, the greatest ever seen. "It came just before the period of 1260 years (which was allotted by the prophet Daniel and our Saviour to "those days" of wearing out the saints), closed, i. e., "in those days, after the tribulation," and before the darkening of the moon and the falling of the stars.

It was in its extent, so far as we have any data, the greatest sun-darkening we have recorded in Scripture or history. We speak of the event occurring May 19, 1780, in comparison with the darkness at the exode and crucifixion. But when we associate with it the strange partial obscurations seen in Europe in the summer of 1783, which though not nearly so intense, were so wonderfully extensive, reaching all over Europe to the center of Asia, then nothing recorded in history can be compared to them. Both these come under the descriptive phrase of our Lord, "The sun shall be darkened," and, "There shall be signs in the sun." And all of these came in the allotted space where Jesus foretold they would occur. The intensity of the darkness was also most remarkable, being, as intelligent witnesses declare, a portion of the time no less than an ordinary night, the light of a day of sunshine being 90,000 times as great. To judge from Scripture language, it fully equaled the darkness at the crucifixion in degree, and much exceeded that darkness of three hours, in length of continuance.

In its effects upon the people, we see precisely the same results we should reasonably expect from a supernatural "sign," intelligent ministers and vast numbers feeling in their souls it was a solemn token of the King's approach. All were solemnized when it was beheld. It seemed to affect the minds of all beholders as something portentous. It led to prayer, to seeking God, to humiliation of the soul, and preparation to meet him in peace. Multitudes felt it was a sign of the great day of judgment.

It fulfilled in a remarkable manner the peculiar phraseology of the various predictions of Scripture, concerning the sun-darkening: "The sun shall be darkened." Matt. 24:29; Mark 13:24. "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair." Rev. 6:12. "The sun shall be turned into darkness." Joel 2:31, 10; 3:15. "The sun shall be darkened in his going forth." Isa. 13:10. "I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in a clear day." Amos 8:9. We have in these references as many as eight separate predictions of the darkening of the sun, the connection in every instance indicating that event to be a sign of the day of the Lord, showing the great prominence of this special sign. We notice the peculiar form of expression of only two or three of them: "As black as sackcloth of hair," i. e., no light could be observed by the beholder to emanate from it; "The sun shall be darkened in his going forth." The going forth is the opposite of its decline, i. e., the sun was to be darkened in the earlier part of the day, before noon. This was the case, as the numerous testimonies quoted, declare. The darkness was first observed about 9 A. M., and became very great by noon.

"I will cause the sun to go down at noon." Mark the definiteness of the expression. That this was emphatically fulfilled, let the reader remember the many statements quoted where the candles were lit at noon, the sun not being seen afterward till the following day; the peculiar darkness continuing till the next morning. The beasts and birds in thousands of instances testified in their mute way to the literal truthfulness of this prediction, returning to their night resting-places generally at about that hour.

"I will darken the earth in a clear day." Let the reader recall the testimony of two eye-witnesses—Milo Bostwick and Mrs. Bailey, who both speak on this point. Says the former, "There were not any clouds," and the latter, "No distinct cloud was visible;" and not a testimony speaks of any clouds being seen. Josiah Litch, in "Prophetic Expositor," says, "It was not owing to thickness of the atmosphere; for the stars were seen." The earth was indeed "darkened" in "a clear day." So wonderfully does God take care to fulfill his word. How would it be possible to fulfill this sign, if it has not already been fulfilled? It would now be utterly impossible; for time allotted for its fulfillment is in the past. "Those days" within which it was to transpire closed in 1789. Therefore we must conclude that if the event of which we have been speaking be not its fulfillment, the Bible predictions must fail. But granting its fulfillment, we must admit we are now in the last days of our world's history.

"WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"—NO. 3.

The Loud Cry.

THE expression "loud voice" is found in the third angel's message. "The third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation."

The prophecy of Rev. 18:1 refers to the special light and power to attend this proclamation in its closing work; and as this light would come upon the people, success would be given to the preaching of the message, so that its closing work would be accomplished in a brief period of time. But how must this work begin? In what way will it affect the hearts of God's people? Many have looked forward to a time when it would come, as it were, like a mighty, rushing wind, as on the day of Pentecost, and by some special miraculous interference of God's providence, men would almost immediately be transformed to proclaim the truth. But when we come to consider the nature of God's work, that he ever works by means, we have to conclude that men themselves have a duty to perform in placing themselves in a condition where God can do his work through them for his own glory. The people of God individually need an experience in the things of God that will fit them to receive the outpouring of his Holy Spirit. The Saviour told the disciples to tarry in Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high. The ten days spent in the upper chamber were not spent simply waiting, without any contemplation of the outpouring of his Spirit, but they were spent in self-examination and seeking to prepare themselves to receive the Holy Spirit, and in praying for the same. They had reviewed Christ's manner of beginning the work with the disciples, and considering that he had just twelve, they decided that they must choose one to take the place of Judas, so that they might sustain the same relation to the work that Christ did at the beginning of his ministry. His disciples were to be his ambassadors, take up the work as he left it when he ascended to heaven; they were to be co-workers with him, and, consequently, they must not only be enlightened as to the nature of the work, but their hearts must be in a condition to receive the Spirit of God when it should be poured out upon them. Can we expect less now?

The first movement necessary to fit the people to receive the outpouring of the Spirit of God is to realize that Christ is our personal Saviour, to make to ourselves a personal application of his promises, and to realize that the testimonies of inspiration are addressed to us personally; and in thus making a personal application of the promises of God, we are bringing Christ into the heart, which will fit us to take a part in the closing work; consequently, when our attention is more particularly turned to this phase of the work, and a personal application of the promises is made, it is really the beginning of the loud cry of the third angel's message. In a late testimony from sister White, she says:—

"What more can I say? My heart is filled to overflowing. Only those are fit for this work who are imbued with the Holy Spirit. The light has come; the light which will enlighten the whole earth with its bright rays, has been shining from the throne of God. Shall we fail to appreciate the most precious privileges that are brought within our reach? Shall we go on in our own weakness? Shall we walk in the sparks of our own kindling? The Lord means that these privileges and opportunities shall do a special work for us. Will we walk in the light? Will we let this light flash upon the pathway of others? How long will we disappoint Jesus by a cold, half-hearted life, destitute of love? Must the candlestick be removed out of its place? . . . I tell you God is testing us now, just now. The whole earth is to be lighted with the glory of God. The light is shining now, and how hard it is for proud hearts to accept Jesus as their personal Saviour; how hard to get out of the rut of legal religion; how hard to grasp the rich, free gift of Christ!

"Those who have not accepted this offering will not understand anything of the light which fills the whole earth with its glory. Let every heart now seek the Lord. Let self be crucified, for rich and glorious blessings are waiting all who shall maintain contrition of soul. With them Jesus can abide. They will let nothing interpose between their souls and God. I long, O, so much, to see the people of God elevated, ennobled, sanctified by the truth, manifesting in all their labors that intense, that earnest faith and hope which are proportionate with the value of the object of which they are in pursuit."

It is evident, therefore, that none but those who experience this incoming of the Saviour into their hearts will be in a condition to receive and take part in the loud cry which is to begin in the immediate future. This is really the beginning of it, and is not this now taking place? Has not our attention been called more especially to this part of the work? It does not lessen the importance of any of the points of the truth which have been preached for the last fifty years, but it gives to the individual a living experience and vitality in the truth that has not been experienced by many in the past. Our experience has become too legal and formal. There has been altogether too much of the Pharisaical spirit and too little of the tender, melting Spirit of Christ. Self-righteousness has been too prominent. We therefore conclude that even in this evidences are not wanting that we have reached the beginning of the loud cry of the third angel's message. Is there no limit to the time of the closing work? Do we not read that the work will be cut short in righteousness? and if so, should we not at once turn our attention and live in view of the actual ending of probation, and the second coming of Christ? Said our Saviour: "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." Who cannot discern even in this movement of especially calling the attention of our people to Christ as a personal Saviour, imparting present salvation, the "sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry trees"? if so, should we not "ask of the Lord rain in the time of the latter rain"? which, if we do, he has promised to "make bright clouds, and give them showers of rain, to every one grass in the field." Zech. 10:1. Has not the time come for this?—We verily believe it has.

individualized soul to the organic cell in which it has manifested itself. From this stage it passes on to animal life, and from the merely animal to the human; and after experiencing many existences in this state of being, the conditions of each rebirth being determined by the results of the preceding life, it rises to the supernatural and becomes again united to Deity, but returns with conscious individuality, and the full advantage of all its experiences. Thus the Theosophic conception of God is that of a vast number of spiritual elements united under one will, but each retaining its individuality, so that God is not one, but millions! They assert that Buddha, during his sojourn on earth, recovered the recollection of 550 of his own incarnations! and "the chief end of his doctrine is to induce men so to live as to shorten the number and duration of their earth-lives." The Hind scriptures assert that "he who in his lifetime recovers the memory of all that his soul has learnt, is already a god."

With equal facility and assurance, Theosophists reject Scripture or quote it in defense of their positions. The fall of man means to them "such an inversion of the due relations between the soul and the body" as involves a subjection of the former to the latter; and, as in their view the body is masculine and the soul feminine, the "fall" was really a subjection of the feminine to the masculine, and of this, say they, the subjection of the woman to the man in the world is the outward and visible sign. Redemption is to be effected by "the complete restoration, crowning, and exaltation of the woman," as the proper head of creation. The atonement means, in their view, the unification of the body with its soul and spirit, taking place within the individual. The sufferings necessary to the salvation of the soul, each one must bear for himself; and the man who attains to the consummation of the Greater Mysteries becomes "a Christ." Although there is none other name under heaven whereby men must be saved, that name, say they, has been shared by many!

This, says the author, "prepares us for the assertion that Christianity is no rival of Buddhism, but was the direct and necessary sequel to that system, the two being parts of one continuous and harmonious whole!"

"Hence, of course, the union of the two religions is to be desired, and Moslems also are exhorted to join the league!"

Theosophy denies the existence of a personal Devil, affirming that that which is mystically called such is the negation and opposite of God; and that as God is "I AM," the Devil is simply, NOT.

The author asserts that "there is little doubt that the culmination of the Mysteries was the worship of Satan himself;" and then says:—

"One of the great secrets of lawlessness has already been offered to, and accepted by, mankind: the spells by which spirits may be summoned from the unseen are now known to all; and those unearthly forms, which in past times were projected from the void only in the labyrinths, caverns, and subterranean chambers of the initiated, are now manifesting themselves in many a private drawing-room and parlor. Men have become enamored of demons, and ere long will receive the prince of the demons as their God."

That such was and is the culmination of this, we can readily believe; for what else could follow when Adam had fallen, and man had been brought under the dominion of Satan, but that the latter should set up his kingdom on the earth (in lieu of that which he had hoped to have in heaven) with a religion which would lead the nations of the earth to worship him instead of the Creator. As there is a "mystery of God,"—the gospel,—so there is a "mystery of iniquity," which is the plan devised by the Devil for the worship of himself, devised no doubt directly after the fall; and as the author from which we have quoted says, that plan is truly a "mystery,"—something adapted to and with a power to charm the most intellectual men of the race. Well does the history of the heathen world teach that power of intellect cannot save a man from the darkest of spiritual delusions. This "Mystery," which is no doubt identical, in part, if not wholly, with the "Mysteries" of Theosophy, runs through all the false religious systems of ancient and modern times; and its foundation doctrine is that of the immortality of the soul.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

The Darkening of the Moon, and Its Appearance of Blood.

"THE moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun, from whom she borrows her light, is turned into darkness, she must fail of course, and become bankrupt."—Matthew Henry. "And God said, Let there be light in the firmament of the heaven, to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years." "And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night." Gen. 1:14, 16. The great lights of heaven are for "signs" and to "rule" the day and night. Martin Luther declared three centuries ago: "A something strikingly awful shall forewarn that the world will come to an end, and that the last day is even at the door." Such, indeed, was the "dark day." That wonderful obscuration of the sun must needs affect the ruler of the night, as she receives her light wholly from the ruler of day. Hence we should naturally expect the moon would be darkened by the same sackcloth intervention which shut out the sun's rays. The moon was supernaturally darkened on the night of the same day the sun was obscured. It was a night of blackness itself, though the moon was at its full. The same pall of darkness pervaded the heavens that had shut out the sun's rays, and caused such astonishment, gloom, horror, and dismay. Persons were as truly affected by its peculiar intensity as during the daytime. Many testify to its strange, profound darkness.

Says Rev. Elam Potter:—

"The moon, though in the full, gave no light, as in our text."
"A great part of the night was singularly dark."

Says Gage, in his history of Rowly, Mass.:—

"The darkness was continued through the day, and the night until near morning was as unusually dark as the day."

Says the Hon. Mr. Wheeler, in the Subaltern Providence, 1780:—

"I well remember that the gentleman of the house read the following scripture by candlelight to his numerous family: 'The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come.' Acts 2:20. The darkness was so great in the night-time that Dr. Blackington, who resided near the northeast of Rehoboth, who had occasion to be out among his sick patients that night, said that he could not see his white pocket handkerchief placed before his eyes. The darkness was so thick that it could be felt."

"Nor was the darkness of the night less uncommon and terrifying than that of the day."—Mass. Spy, 1780.

"In the evening, at Salem, perhaps it was never darker since the children of Israel left the house of bondage."—Boston Gazette, May 29, 1780.

"At eight in the evening the darkness was so great as to render traveling impracticable."—Ind. Chronicle, June 1, 1780.

Said Mr. Temple:—

"It seemed as if a veil was drawn over them. The night resembled the darkness of Egypt, which might be felt. It was so intense that many persons in Boston and the country were bewildered in going from house to house, where they were intimately acquainted."—London Letter, 1780.

"The night was the perfect blackness of darkness. Not the faintest outline of any object could be discerned against the sky. A light would penetrate it but a little way, and then seemed to disclose but a solid wall of blackness around."—Cape Ann Advertiser.

"The night succeeding that day was of such pitchy darkness that in some instances horses could not be compelled to leave the stable when wanted for service."—Stone's History of Beverly.

Mr. Tenny, of Exeter, N. H., quoted by Mr. Gage to the Historical Society, says:—

"The darkness of the following evening was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty fiat gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eye was equally invisible with the blackest velvet."

Dr. Adams, speaking of the dark night, says:—

"At nine it was a darkness to be felt by more senses than one, as there was a strong smell of soot. Almost every one who happened to be out in the evening got lost in going home. The darkness was as uncommon in the night as in the day, as the moon had full the day before."

We have in these brief extracts summed up a mass of testimony which cannot be invalidated. It demonstrates the fact that the darkness of that night was as mysterious, wonderful, and portentous as that of the day preceding. And why should it not be? It was caused by the same supernatural agency, designed for the same purpose, coming in fulfillment of the same prediction. Considering the fact that the light of the sun and moon are so intimately connected, it seems most consistent that they should occur at the same time, and be in consequence of the same Almighty fiat. Had the sun's darkness not affected the moon, it might be counted as militating against its being really darkened.

At first thought, one might think it an objection that the darkening of the moon should occur on the selfsame twenty-four hours of the sun's obscuration. It might seem as if there should be an interval between these as between them and other signs, like the great earthquake and the dark day, and between that and the falling stars, etc. But when we consider the close relationship between the light of the sun and the moon, this objection disappears. What would affect the sun, causing it to be veiled in blackness, we should certainly expect would obscure all light from the moon. So it was. The darkening of the sun is by far the most prominent sign, as it is the great orb of day. The moon being but a satellite of our earth, and giving no light of itself only as a reflector of the sun's light, its darkening cannot be so surprising. Yet God has said it should be a sign of the coming One. It corroborates the truthfulness of the fulfillment of the whole prediction, coming in at the proper place, being a most striking event of itself, caused by a wholly mysterious agency, and meeting the specifications of Holy Writ concerning the moon's darkening.

But there is another statement connected with this that should not be overlooked: a variation, rather, in the statements of several Bible writers concerning this sign in the moon. "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come." Joel 2:31. The apostle Peter quotes and repeats this statement. Acts 2:20. The revelator also gives a similar prediction: "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood." Rev. 6:12. Joel speaks in two other places in his prophecy, of the sun and moon being darkened (Joel 2:10; 3:15); and from the connection we cannot doubt that these references all refer to the same great signs in the last days; only both features will be connected with these signs in the moon. It will be darkened, as we have seen, and its bloody appearance will be specially noticeable.

No sane person would claim that the body of the moon became really blood. The Bible often uses the language of appearances, just as is common with many authors, and in conversation. It speaks of the sun's "rising" and "setting" the same as we do, though, scientifically, we know this is only in appearance. While Joel says the moon was turned "into blood," John says "the moon became as blood;" i. e., it appeared like blood, just as "the sun became black as sackcloth of hair;" i. e., in appearance to the beholder, as it gradually disappeared from view altogether by the intervention of the dark curtain spread by omnipotent hands over the arch of heaven. Therefore we are justified in concluding that in the time specified for the "signs" "in the moon" there would be most remarkable appearances in the body of the moon;—blood-red, fiery, and strange. Have they been seen?

In the extract from Milo Bostwick, Camden, N. J., previously given, we repeat the following:—

"My father and mother, who were pious, thought the day of judgment was near. They sat up that night. The darkness disappeared, but the moon, which was at its full, had the appearance of blood."

Thus we learn that the darkness and blood-red appearance were both present on that occasion. During the memorable summer of 1783 in Europe, when the sun was partially obscured so long, and in which so great a territory was affected, this bloody characteristic in the moon was constantly and strikingly noticeable. D. T. Taylor, in his "Great Consummation" (a valuable work of over 400 pages, to which we are indebted for many important extracts), who has devoted many years to researches for testimony concerning our Lord's soon return, says concerning this summer:—

"During the gloomy summer of 1783, the nights in Europe were a fearful aspect. The obscuration which Humboldt declared had never been satisfactorily accounted for, not only gave, as King testifies, 'a rusty red' to the sun all day, but science asserts that at night 'the moon high in the heaven, had the color of heated brick.'—Milner's Physical Phenomena, p. 68."

"Others affirm that it wore a bloody hue. In places in the north of Europe, where the vapors of Hecla permeated all the air, the sun and moon seemed 'blotted out of the heavens,' and the terror of man was indescribable. Arago says the fog or vapor was phosphorescent, and neither wind nor rain could disperse it."—Great Consummation, p. 257.

Rev. Mr. Beadle Christian, missionary at Aleppo, in Syria, writing of an earthquake which shook that place in 1822, said:—

"On the night of the earthquake there was something peculiar in the atmosphere, the moon appearing as red as blood. This greatly alarmed the inhabitants, who were continually crying out, Now we shall hear the trumpet sound! Now the dead will arise! The day of judgment has arrived."—Missionary Herald for June, 1842.

These instances, which might be greatly multiplied, are sufficient to prove beyond question that both of those features described in the prediction of the prophets were literally fulfilled in the interim between the darkening of the sun and the great star showers coming later. They were therefore in the time predicted by our Lord, and presented the same characteristics that he had foretold. They fulfilled every statement he made concerning them. He said there would be "signs" (plural) "in the sun and in the moon." We are therefore authorized to expect more than one. More than one has been seen, and precisely such as he said would occur. The safe, sensible, and only consistent rule for the interpretation of prophecy is this: when all the statements predicted of such events foretold come to pass, it must then be truly fulfilled, and we have no right to expect another fulfillment. If it were otherwise, we could never be sure a prophecy was fulfilled. So it was at Christ's first advent. He was to be born in Bethlehem of Judea. Micah 5:2. There the wise men found him. They were not to look for him again or elsewhere. He was to be anointed at the end of the sixty-nine weeks. Dan. 9:25. When that point was reached, he went forth proclaiming, "The time is fulfilled." Mark 1:15. They had no right to look beyond that point for that event. He was to be put to death, and thus cause the virtue of the Jewish sacrifices to cease in the "midst," or middle, of the seventieth week. Dan. 9:26, 27. This he did in the spring of A. D. 31, when crucified on Calvary. Then the veil of the temple was rent from top to bottom, and their house was "left desolate," God no longer accepting its offerings. So prophecy is ever fulfilled. When the time comes which the prophet predicted, and the events transpire which he declared would occur, the prophecy is then filled full or fulfilled. So was our Lord's prediction concerning the darkening of the sun and moon; and the sign stands out before the world as fully accomplished, according to an abundance of testimony.

"WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"—NO. 4.

Work of the Two-horned Beast.

It is the fulfillment of the prophecy of Revelation 13 that shows the importance of the third angel's message, and it is not necessary for us to present any argument to show that this prophecy has its application to the United States of America, and that persecution has actually begun, even in this country, upon those who keep the commandments of God. Neither does it require any great effort to show that the strenuous efforts put forth to secure the observance of the first day of the week are directed mainly against those who keep God's commandments: nay, more, it is because they keep the commandments; for they are the ones upon whom the attack is first made. It is not, therefore, because that people generally do not observe the first day of the week, neither is it because that people do work on Sunday, for this is the case generally with liverymen, hotel-keepers, railway companies, etc., etc. These are not usually molested. Neither is it because that men are obliged to work on Sunday; there is perfect freedom in this respect.

But who are they that are persecuted and sent to prison?—They are those who conscientiously observe the seventh day. The evidences are that these individuals who, from religious convictions, observe the seventh day of the week, according to the commandment, and then quietly go about their work on the first day, are the ones who are indicted and made to suffer. In some of the same neighborhoods where arrests have been made, there are those who have been conducting their business seven days in the week, but they have been passed by; while those who conscientiously regard the fourth commandment, but have gone about their business on the first day, are arrested. But the crime of going out hunting, running railway trains, and seeking pleasure on the first day of the week is not sufficient to arouse the ire of the dragon. In every instance where those keeping God's commandments were arrested, there were those in the immediate vicinity who lived as regardless of the sanctity of the first day of the week as did those who kept the commandments of God. It requires no great discernment to see the animus of this movement. Were all this talk about the sacredness of the first day what it claims to be, would there be any partiality used? In fact, would not those who are Christians, and acknowledged to be good citizens, rather be exempted, while the godless and insincere would be the point of attack?

Those who enter this campaign of persecution do not expect to cease their work, but they even call to their aid the Romanists and every agency of whatever character, if they will but unite to persecute those who keep God's commandments and the faith of Jesus. Why do not these men meet them with Bible argument? Why do they not point out from the Scriptures wherein they are wrong? No; this they cannot do, and for this very reason they resort to civil power to compel men to observe an institution originated by the papal church. America, that has been the foremost of all nations on the earth in its free institutions, and in protecting those of different religious beliefs, is now becoming one of the foremost in entering the arena of religious persecution. This is according to the exposition of prophecy for the last forty years. Revelation 13 distinctly states that they shall make an image to the beast, or papacy, and they shall have power to give it life. Does not the spirit manifested show already the nature of this work? Does not that which we now see tell us plainly what is to come? In this it is not difficult to discern that those who do not observe the first day must soon meet an issue that will be settled by the actual appearing of Christ in the clouds of heaven. It is only a question of time before we cannot buy or sell because of results that follow the course already begun. Disfranchisement and confiscation of property are only a question of time. Nearly every State in the Union has laws on its statute-books which, if they were enforced, would imprison every Seventh-day Adventist in this country; not but that there are provisions for the Sabbatarian, but the unjust course developed in the Tennessee experience, against those who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week and disregard the first, leaves no guaranty of justice in the future. The Sunday agitation in States where they have no Sunday laws, is as great as it is in the others.

It is true that we have actually reached the time of persecution; yes, we have seen the very best days that this world will ever see. Each year our liberties as a people will be curtailed more and more. The freedom with which we have worked will be interfered with, and we may as well make up our minds right here to meet the issue.

Somewhere in this period probation will end. How long before he that is holy will so remain, and he that is filthy will so remain, we cannot tell; but it becomes us as a people to look well to our position, and inquire, Where are we? The coming of the Lord draweth nigh, and soon probation will end, and the die for eternity will be cast. There is an interest in heaven and earth on this question. This will become more and more intense both by the holy and the unholy agencies. Satan and evil angels are becoming intense in their efforts to bring the final crisis. Already this nation has begun its crusade. Protestants are reaching over the dark chasm which for two centuries has separated them from the Romanists, and they are clasping hands on the Sunday question. But have the Romanists changed? They say not; they never change. They only wait for Protestants to cuddle into their bosom, sacrificing their principles, when they will again endeavor to bring into subjection the incorrigible. Then, we ask, where are we in this line of events? The fulfillment of prophecy shows where we are, near the time when probation will end. In a political excitement, the interest increases until the vote is cast. So in this work God's people will be actively engaged in their work, encouraging educational interests and health institutions, and will be interested in giving the truth to the world, while persecution like a fatal disease will continue to increase, until like the pall of death it settles upon all who will not worship the beast, or his image; probation ends; the burden for the world ceases; and the faithful watchmen turn their attention toward encouraging the little flock. We appeal to all to get ready for the final crisis; for the day of the Lord hasteth greatly. S. N. H.

A SCRIPTURAL BASIS.

A LEAFLET upon the subject of the Sabbath has been sent to this Office, with the request that it be reviewed. The title of the leaflet is, "Why do Christians Observe the First, or Lord's Day, as Sabbath? and Why do We Call it Sunday?" The title itself is a curious mixture of ignorance and error. The writer does not ask, "Why do Christians observe Sunday, or the first day of the week, as the Sabbath?" but "Why do Christians observe the first, or Lord's day, as Sabbath?" We would "first" like to know what he means by "first," whether it is the first day of the month, year, or the first day he began to write his leaflet. The title gives no clue by which we can find out his meaning. He has either failed to express himself, or else he had no clear thought to express. A great portion of the Christian church, popularly so-called, do not call the first day of the week the Sabbath, and they would scorn the idea of so doing. They call it Sunday, as the majority of men still do.

The article commences by asking the following question: "What Scripture basis have the Seventh-day Christians to stand upon?" He does not, however, make an attempt to find the Scripture basis which seventh-day Christians have to stand upon, but devotes himself energetically to the task of finding an unscriptural basis for Sunday-keepers to stand upon! This will become apparent as we proceed.

We will notice his most noteworthy points as briefly as possible, to see if he answers his own question, "What Scripture basis have the seventh-day Christians to stand upon?" He devotes his first statement to Constantine, and tells how he became an adherent to Christianity. But as Constantine had nothing to do with the "Scripture basis" of the seventh day or any other day, we feel that he has jumped the track already, and is off upon a side issue. He then tries to introduce a basis for Sunday, as may be seen by the following:—

"Under the designation 'the Lord's day' (Rev. 1:10), this day was, from the resurrection of Christ onward, the most sacred day of the week to Christians; and when they observed but one day of rest in the week, from secular labor and for the worship of God, the Lord's day was that day."

This is the old worn-out dodge of assuming the very thing upon which they should give proof, that the "Lord's day" of Rev. 1:10 is the same as the first day of the week. Assuming the thing to be proved, for the proof, is called a master stroke in argument; and it is only used when one has a poor cause to sustain. When he can prove what he assumes, that the first day of the week is called the "Lord's day" in the Scriptures, then his succeeding statement that "constructively and practically the first day of the week became the Christian Sabbath," shall receive due attention. We would, however, remark that only a little over sixty years before the Revelation was written, Jesus, speaking of the seventh day of the week, or Saturday, as all admit, said: "The Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath day." And as the Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath, and as "the seventh day is the Sabbath" (Scripture basis), it therefore follows that the seventh day is the Lord's day, and that the Lord's day is the seventh day, or the Sabbath. We would further remark that Jesus, speaking in A. D. 31, and describing scenes which were to take place in A. D. 70, only 26 years before the Revelation was written, cautioned his disciples in reference to the Sabbath (Matt. 24:20), and said not a word about the first day being sacred; and we would call attention to the fact that in the Gospel of John, which critics acknowledge to have been written after the book of Revelation was written, whenever John has occasion to mention the first day of the week, as he did in describing the events connected with Christ's resurrection, he always called it the first day of the week, and nothing more; while he invariably spoke of the seventh day as the Sabbath.

Again we quote: "Honest Christians who are well taught, drink from the New Testament Sabbath stream nearer the fountain; namely, above, and not below the point where the beast, the false

THE MARVELOUS HEIRSHIP.

"Heirs of God," exclaims the apostle, in Rom. 8:17. It has been well said that the 8th chapter of Romans is like the garden of Eden, filled with delights; that if one was shut up to preach only from this chapter, he would have a subject for a lifetime; for every line might serve as a text, and prove an inexhaustible mine.

The more we contemplate these words, "heirs of God," the more the wonder grows. When we take into view the parties—man and God—and think of the distance spanned, from the lowest depths of rebellion to the crowning heights of the universe, who can comprehend them?

To be an heir is to be in a position where one is to succeed to a possession. And in this case the possession contemplates that which is supreme in every conceivable privilege and blessing: "heirs of God."

The context brings out the steps by which this wonderful end is reached. The apostle begins with one who is walking after the flesh; a slave of the carnal mind; not subject to the law of God, but filled with enmity against both that law and its Author. Then he reveals a provision that has been made for a wonderful change, whereby the promptings of the flesh give way to those of the Spirit; the carnal mind, to the spiritual mind; hatred against the law, to delight therein. This change is wrought by the Spirit of Christ, which is freely offered to all who will seek it. But this Spirit is the Spirit of adoption; and by it we are enabled to look upon God, not as a hard master, a merciless tyrant, but instead, are prompted to cry, "Abba, Father." Then the apostle says, if we are "led by the Spirit of God," we "are the sons of God," and "the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." Then, still ascending in the scale of blessings and privileges, he adds, "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together."

In what a light does this place the gracious dealings of God with the children of men! From a state of sin and rebellion he pardons us and receives us into his house. This he might do, and consider us simply as servants; and that would be a marvelous condescension to us; but he does more than this, he makes us children; then from children we become heirs; but all his heirs are princes, and all his princes are to be glorified.

One condition connects us with this line of inheritance, and that is, to be Christ's. "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." If we have the Spirit of Christ, we are his. If we are his, we are children; and if children, then heirs. Thus all centers in Christ. The "if" can be overcome, for he will receive all who will receive him, and under the power of such an attraction, who can stay away from Christ, and who would not be willing to suffer a little with him here? In him, the apostle elsewhere says, "All things are yours, for ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

IN THE QUESTION CHAIR.

219.—SHALL BE KILLED. REV. 13: 15.

Will you please explain Rev. 13: 15? I am at a loss how to harmonize it with 1 Thess. 4: 17. L. E.

Answer.—We understand the question to refer to that part of the passage which speaks about the saints being killed if they will not worship the image of the beast. The text reads, "And he [the two-horned beast] had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed;" but 1 Thess. 4: 17 says that some will be "alive and remain" to the coming of the Lord. How can they be killed, and yet remain alive to the coming of the Lord?

In answer, let us look at another expression. Verse 16: "And he [the two-horned beast] causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads: and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name." Here the same expression is used, "He causeth all to receive a mark," etc. A similar expression occurs in verse 12: He "causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed."

But in Rev. 20: 4 John says that he saw on thrones of judgment those who had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads or in their hands. So although it reads that he "causeth" all to worship the beast and his image and receive his mark, all do not do these things. Therefore the word "causeth" does not mean that the intention expressed thereby, will be actually carried out. The image issues a decree. And this shows that it must be just as distinct and definite an organization as the government itself, and capable of legislating and enacting laws. And this image, when the government gives it power to speak, issues a decree that all who will not worship itself shall be killed, just as the two-horned beast issues a decree that all shall worship the beast and receive his mark, or be deprived of the privilege of buying and selling. But these wicked powers are not able to carry out their decrees, for Rev. 15: 2 says that the people of God get "the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name." And certainly, if they get the victory over the image, they will not be killed by it.

In reference to the meaning of the word "causeth," we quote the following from "Thoughts on the Revelation," pp. 638, 639:—

"It is a canon of interpretation of frequent use in the exposition of the sacred writings that verbs of action sometimes signify merely the will and endeavor to do the action in question. Thus in Eze. 24: 13: 'I have purified thee, and thou wast not purged;' i. e., I have endeavored, used means, been at pains, to purify thee. John 5: 44: 'How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another?' i. e., endeavor to receive. Rom. 2: 4: 'The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance;' i. e., endeavors, or tends to lead thee. Amos 9: 3: 'Though they may be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea;' i. e., though they aim to be hid. 1 Cor. 10: 33: 'I please all men;' i. e., endeavor to please. Gal. 5: 4: 'Whosoever of you are justified by the law;' i. e., seek or endeavor to be justified. Ps. 69: 4: 'They that destroy me are mighty;' i. e., that endeavor to destroy me; Eng., 'That would destroy me.' Acts 7: 26: 'And set them at one again;' i. e., wished and endeavored, Eng., 'Would have set them.' — Prof. George Bush, on Ex. 17: 11.

So, in the passage before us, the two-horned beast causes all to receive a mark, and the image causes those who will not worship itself to be killed. That is, they will purpose and endeavor to do this. They make such enactments, pass such laws; but they are not able to execute them; for God interposes in behalf of his people. And then those who have kept the word of Christ's patience are kept from falling in this hour of temptation, according to Rev. 3: 10. Then those who have made God their refuge are kept from all evil, and no plagues come nigh their dwelling, according to Ps. 91: 9, 10. Then all who are found written in the book are delivered, according to Dan. 12: 1; and being victors over the beast and his image, they are redeemed from among men, and raise a song of triumph before the throne of God, according to Rev. 14: 2-4.

220.—CHURCH FELLOWSHIP.

1. Does it require a unanimous vote to receive members into a church? 2. Should opposing votes be counted if based on a mere hearsay, the parties personally having nothing against the applicant? To illustrate: a member of a church apostatizes, and moves to another place. Afterward he sees his error, repents, and takes up the service of the Lord again, and offers himself for membership where he then resides. Two thirds of the church vote to receive him. The other third object because they have heard some reports against him. They have nothing personally against him, and have been acquainted with him about eighteen months. Should such votes prevent his admission to the church? 3. Can a church drop the name of a member at his request, no overt act having been committed?

C. H. B.

Ans.—1. All votes to receive members into the church should be unanimous, otherwise a church trial is voted in with the member.

2. Old Mr. Hearsay is generally a liar, and his testimony would be rather poor ground for keeping a person out of a church who wished to join. However, if the matter is of a serious nature, and the objectors think they have good grounds for their scruples, they should take immediate steps to ascertain the truth in regard to the rumors; and if they prove true, then, of course, there is some ground for objection to the individual; and if they prove untrue, that, in like manner, disposes of them. But it is evidently doing an injustice to a person to hold him under condemnation on the strength of certain rumors, and then to do nothing to ascertain whether the rumors are true or false. But, as stated above, let the matter be so investigated, that when a vote is taken, it will be unanimous.

3. On this point we have no precedents to quote. But it seems to be a very proper question to ask, Why not? All the relations of the church of Christ should be free and voluntary and cordial. If all the members of a church are walking in the light, of course they will rejoice together in their church relationship. So, if one wishes to withdraw, there is some room for an inference, perhaps, that all is not as it should be; but if there is no overt act, what can be done about it? We cannot read the heart nor judge of motives, and to try to hold a person in a relationship which is not agreeable to him, would hardly be calculated to foster that union of feeling which should exist between the members of a church. Would we not be much more likely to exert a good influence over a brother not to hold toward him the attitude of coercion, compelling him to remain in a relation that for some reason is not agreeable to him, but to keep our mutual relations as pleasant as possible? The suggestion here made of course presupposes that all the influences of kind and Christian conference and persuasion shall have been brought to bear upon the member, before granting his request, to induce him, if possible, to change his mind and remain with his brethren.

THE CHARACTER AND AIMS OF THEOSOLOGY.

(Concluded.)

THEOSOLOGY in the West is Buddhism in the East, and the latter has evidently had much to do with the propagation of the former. There is that about Buddhism which passes for purity and self-denial, and which attracts the attention and awakens the admiration of men from civilized lands. "Of late," says Mr. Pember, "a considerable impulse has been given to the study of its sacred literature, and some surprise has been excited by the discovery that its grosser forms are confined to the more uneducated classes, while its esoteric teachings are, at least, equal to the philosophies of the West." The appearance, in 1879, of Edwin Arnold's poem, "The Light of Asia," did much to popularize Buddhism in England and America. About the same time a society was formed for the purpose of publishing trustworthy texts of the early Buddhist literature, which has since met with great success. From various other quarters also a great flood of Eastern literature and philosophy has of late been pouring in upon Western civilization, and meanwhile the revival of Mysticism, the growth of evolutionary philosophy, and even such movements as the temperance crusade (for Buddha has altogether forbidden wine) and the societies for the prevention of vivisection and other forms of cruelty to animals (for Buddhism teaches the transmigration of the soul through the various forms of animal life) are favorable for the spread of this ancient heathen religion.

As to the teachings of Buddhism and its connection with other false systems of worship, the author of "Theosophy" says:—

"The system of Buddha may be briefly summed up as follows:—

"1. There is no God, save what man can himself become.

"2. The state of Nirvāna, or perfection, is reached by means of transmigrations, or a succession of earth-lives.

"3. So long as a man retains any desire for earthly things, he must continue to be reborn upon earth.

"4. Therefore, the shortest way to Nirvana is by severe asceticism, suppression of all action, abstract meditation, and a concentration of all desire upon the extinction of earth-life.

"5. Animal sacrifices, and every kind of vicarious suffering, are useless, and must be done away.

"6. All men are equal; therefore, caste must be abolished.

"Such are the main points of Sakya Muni's teachings; for the present our brief commentary must be no more than this. The circumstances which led to the rise of Buddhism, as described above, and its consequent doctrines, could not but bring it into favor with the iconoclastic and leveling spirit which is now abroad. Its severe asceticism is no bar to this, since in our self-indulgent age nothing is more common than to hear men warmly supporting a theory in the abstract, without any intention of submitting to it in practice. Its, at least, virtual atheism renders it attractive to secularists: its mysticism and introspection allure minds disposed to quietism. In all essentials its doctrine is esoterically identical with that of Theosophy, upon which we have already remarked. In both systems we are undoubtedly confronted with Satan's plan of salvation, communicated from the earliest times—probably by the Nephilim—to those who could bear it, and preserved in the esoteric teachings of the Rishis, the Brahmins, and the Buddhists of the East, and in the Mysteries of the West. And the plan is, that, without God or Saviour, men must wear away their own sins, and as soon as they have done so, will become gods.

"But if the esoteric teaching of Buddhism coincides with Theosophy, its general practice is in entire sympathy with Spiritualism. For worship—if we may so term it—among the Buddhists is largely connected with the cultus of the dead, who are believed to have the power of conferring aid and blessings upon those who seek to them. But an addition was made to this doctrine, which has been adopted by Romanists, and is beginning to show itself in the church-yard mediums and some other features of Spiritualism. While the spirit of a deceased person was not supposed to remain in his corpse, there was evidently a belief that a certain animal magnetism, or some occult force, made it more easy for the disembodied spirit to return and communicate with living mortals when they were in the actual presence of his corpse. This explains much of the rites in both the Brahmins and Buddhists, the tomb-worship, relic-worship, and image-worship.

"For the doctrine was extended to any portion of human remains. Hence, 'in the Cingalese history of the famous tooth of Buddha, the tooth is constantly represented as acting as if the remainder of Buddha's person, though invisible, joined the tooth when great miracles were necessary.' As the natural result of such an idea, 'Bengal was by and by covered with stately tobes and columns, each supposed to contain a minute fragment of Buddha's relics.' And probably the skulls and bones worn by the Brahman Rishis who frequented the cemeteries are to be explained in the same way.

"The introduction of images, again, seems to have been an advance upon corpse and relic-worship. A likeness of the departed was supposed in some way to attract his spirit to it, and hence 'the solemn marble Buddhas, each seated on his throne, the four great Dhyani Buddhas, the eighteen great disciples that figure in every temple in China, and the crowd of minor saints. Directly the crystal eyes are put into an image in China, the spirit of the departed is supposed to animate it.'

"Mr. Lillie sums up his chapter on Buddhist demonology, from which the above extracts are taken, in the following words: 'Buddhism was plainly an elaborate apparatus to nullify the action of evil spirits by the aid of good spirits operating at their highest potentiality through the instrumentality of the corpse, or a portion of the corpse, of the chief aiding spirit. The Buddhist temple, the Buddhist rites, the Buddhist liturgy, all seemed based on this one idea that a whole, or portions of a dead body were necessary.'

"There can be little doubt that the Buddhist tope is the original of the Roman Church, the great feature of which is its high altar containing beneath it some relic of the patron saint. But the two religions have very many other things in common, among which we may mention the crozier, mitre, dalmatic, cope, and censer swinging on five chains; sacerdotal celibacy, worship of saints, fasts, processions, litanies, holy water, the tonsure, confession, relic-worship, the use of flowers, lights, and images on the altar, the sign of the cross, the worship of the queen of heaven, the aureole, the mystic fans of peacocks' feathers carried on either side of the popes and lamas on grand festivals, the orders of the ministry, and the architectural details of the churches."

And if the Devil has made such use of the doctrine of the worship of the dead, not less persistently has he foisted upon the world the equally dark delusion that man may be his own Saviour. Let the reader notice the contrast drawn by the author in this respect between Buddhism and Christianity.

"With one more remark we close this necessarily brief and imperfect chapter. According to the statement of the Himalayan adepts, an ordinary being must pass through some eight hundred incarnations before he can complete his purification from sin, and attain to the rest of Nirvana. During the weary ages of these existences he must struggle with blind fate and with his own corruptions; there is no God of love and of all comfort to whom he can look and pray; he must either, by his own painful and unaided exertions, raise himself to the gods, or retrograde, in ever-increasing misery and wileness, until he drops unpitied into the bottomless abyss of annihilation.

"Higher than Indra's ye may lift your lot,
And sink it lower than the worm or gnat;
The end of many myriad lives is this,
The end of myriads that.

"Only, while turns that wheel invisible,
No pause, no peace, no staying place can be;
Who mounts will fall, who falls may mount; the spokes Go round unceasingly."

"It is said that the incarnations of one soul, together with the intervening periods spent in Devachan or Avitchi—paradise or purgatory—would occupy some seventy millions of years! There is a certain wisdom in this calculation leading us to suspect that it comes from a source wiser, at least, than any which is merely human. It exhibits some appreciation of the frightful nature of sin, and of the gigantic task set before the man who would fain be his own Saviour.

"With what thankfulness should we turn to the gracious Lord whose blood speaks better things to us; who, looking on the sin-stricken and penitent face of the paralytic, said: 'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven,' and in a moment effected that work for which Buddha demands ages; who beholding with pitying gaze the fast-falling tears of the contrite woman at his feet, took the burden of her guilt upon himself, and bade her depart in peace.

"No melancholy, unbefriended, and almost endless way lies before his disciples. Nay, he himself is with them alway, even unto the end; he guides his sheep through the wilderness of life, gently leading those that are with young, and carrying the lambs in his bosom. He has not only borne the sins of his people, but will also sanctify them wholly, spirit, soul, and body, and present them faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy, by that mighty working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

"Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift!"

With these facts before us, we may view more intelligently the proposition, of which our readers must all have heard, for a "Conference of the World's Great Religions" at the coming World's Fair.

Thus does the rise of Theosophy join with multitudinous other signs to announce the end of the age.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

"And There Shall be Signs in the Stars."

Luke 21:25.

OUR Saviour declares, "The stars shall fall from heaven." Matt. 24:29; Mark 13:25. This is one of the prominent "signs" which he gives to show when his coming is nigh, for he declares when this and the others we have already considered are fulfilled, his disciples are to know "he is nigh, even at the doors." Revised Version, Matt. 24:33, etc. The falling stars do not destroy the world, or usher in his coming; but they are a remarkable sign of it. Some time elapses after it occurs; for then his people are to look for him, knowing he is near. The sign then is to be a striking one; and the knowledge of it, and beholding it, is to be very general. What would be the reasonable exegesis of this statement? and what are the "stars" that shall fall?

That the language is literal, every circumstance connected with our Lord's discourse makes certain. He was speaking to his own disciples, answering their direct question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming?" To answer it in parables which were never explained, would be strange and contrary to Christ's usual course with them; for the parables he gave to the Jews he explained to his own disciples. Matt. 13:11, 36, 37; 15:13. Besides, unexplained parables would shed little or no light upon the subject of their query. No one could be certain of its meaning. But these signs were to be so forcible and certain that his obedient and intelligent disciples were commanded to "know" he was "nigh even at the doors" when they were fulfilled. To be thus certain, the signs must be plain, striking, and definitely fulfill his prediction in a literal manner.

What kind of "stars" should we reasonably expect would fall as a "sign" that the world would end after a little season of expectancy? In the scientific language of the present age, the meaning usually attached to the term refers either to the "fixed stars," or rather suns of the solar systems countless millions of miles away, bodies vastly larger than our earth, or to the planets which revolve around our sun, like Mars, Jupiter, etc., many of which are vast bodies far greater than the little planet on which we live. The revelator, when speaking of this same sign, says, "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, as a fig-tree casteth her unripe figs, when she is shaken of a great wind." Revised Version, Rev. 6:13. Let the reader imagine for a moment such heavenly bodies falling upon our earth as a loaded fruit tree in a tempest scatters its green fruit! Such would not be a sign of the end of the world, but its utter ruin and destruction. Could it be possible our Saviour would make such an event a sign of his coming, after which his disciples were to look for and constantly expect him till he should come? Preposterous! It is impossible for large numbers of greater bodies to fall upon a smaller one.

How then shall we understand him? His meaning is plain when we take into consideration the fact of the change in the use of language. By the Greek word aster, or Latin stella, the ancients understood the lesser lights or bodies of heaven, as much as the greater. So of the word kokab in Hebrew.

The Scriptures speak of stars in all these senses. Thus the suns and planets are called "stars" at creation. Gen. 1:16. A single wandering meteor going out in darkness, is so called. Jude 13.

Showers of destructive aerolites, are evidently so called. (Compare Judges 5:20, with Josh. 10:11.) A great blazing meteoric stone falling to the earth is named a "star." The traveling meteor directing the wise men to the spot where the infant Saviour lay, sent on its mission by divine power, is a remarkable instance of the use of the word. It was so small a body that it could by its position point out the very place where the babe was to be found. Matt. 2:1-10. Yet it is called a "star" just as really as the eleven planets. Gen. 37:9. Biblical language, therefore, does not confine itself to the refinements of modern science, making a distinction between the greater and lesser bodies of heaven. It uses language more like the common people. "See the stars fall," is our common mode of expression, instead of, "See the meteors fall."

Neither can we deny that what are called "meteors" are of heavenly origin, not deriving their existence from our earth. Many instances have been recorded where some of these falling bodies have been found weighing tons, presenting a fearful sight as they come blazing through our atmosphere. The earth in its orbit comes in the way of myriads of these, which fall singly or in small numbers to our world. We little know how many of these abound in the great regions of space. The small planetary bodies called "asteroids" were wholly unknown before the beginning of this century, and now nearly if not quite one hundred and fifty of them have been discovered, and more are continually found by the diligent efforts of astronomers. It is estimated that all of these combined would not aggregate one fourth the bulk of our earth. (See Johnson's Cyclopaedia, p. 302.) There may be multitudes of other bodies revolving in space, too small to be seen even by the telescope. They are really stars—small stars.

Says the Christian Union of May 1, 1872:—

"The gold medal of the British Royal Astronomical Society was presented in February to Signor Schiaparelli for his researches upon the nature and orbits of meteors, which have helped to demonstrate that these bodies belong to the stellar region, and are in fact falling stars."

Prof. Olmstead, of Yale College, an eminent astronomer and meteorologist, says, speaking of the great star shower of 1833:—

"This is no longer to be regarded as a terrestrial, but as a celestial phenomenon; and shooting stars are now to be no more

THE PROMISES OF GOD.

In 2 Cor. 1:20 is found a declaration which has been blessed to myriads of souls in trouble and affliction: "For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us."

It is interesting to mark the circumstances which called out these assuring words. It may be inferred from verses 15-17 that Paul had purposed at some time to pass through Corinth, but had changed his plans. This led some of the Corinthians to criticize his conduct, and speak of him as one whose word could not be relied upon, who was fickle and changeable, saying yea, yea, and nay, nay. This, coming to the apostle's knowledge, led him to correct that false impression. He declared that he was not of that order, that he did not use lightness and follow the whims of his own mind, even in so small a matter as making a visit to Corinth at a certain time. Then he goes on to say that his preaching was not yea and nay; for Christ, whom they preached, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea. And then, carrying the thought still further, he says, "For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God."

Thus a seemingly trivial incident and ungenerous criticism of the apostle called out a most precious and comforting declaration for the people of God in all ages. It brings out also a pleasant characteristic of the apostle himself. He would not let personal annoyances and troubles disturb his mind, but only lead him out into the great field of God's goodness and promises. Peter assures us that the promises are given unto us, that they are exceeding great and precious, and that by them we become partakers of the divine nature. 2 Pet. 1:4. Thomas Manton, D.D., says, "Every promise of God is built upon four pillars: God's justice, which will not suffer him to deceive; God's greatness and goodness, which will not suffer him to forget; God's truth, which will not suffer him to change; and God's power, which makes him able to accomplish."

The text says all the promises are in him yea and Amen. What a treasure is thus put into the hands of the child of God. There is not a blessing or mercy in all the range of God's dealings with his children that is not included therein. A speaker at the Fulton street (New York) prayer-meeting once said: "I count all checks as cash when I am making up my money and striking a balance." And these promises of God are so many drafts at sight upon his divine mercy, and are among our richest possessions.

But the promises are based upon conditions. We must have a living connection with the source of the promises to make them ours. They have been likened to the clothes we wear. If we have life in the body, they warm us, but if the body is dead, the clothing would produce no effect, imparting neither warmth nor life. So on a mind lifeless and unfeeling the promises can produce no effect.

But how do we through the promises become partakers of the divine nature, as Peter declares? It will be noticed that Paul says, "in him," that is, in Christ. So, by contemplating the promises, we contemplate Christ, and by beholding him we become changed into the same image. 2 Cor. 3:18. He "that hath this hope in him," says John, "purifieth himself, even as he [Christ] is pure." 1 John 3:3.

And so we are brought to Christ as the great center of all; and in him, alone, we see the strength and fullness of all the promises of God. Mr. Spurgeon quotes Faithful Teate as saying: "If thou lean upon the promises of God themselves, and not upon Jesus in them, all will come to nothing. Whence is it that so many souls bring a promise to the throne of grace and carry so little away from it? They lean upon the promise without leaning upon Christ in the promise."

And these promises are to be turned by us to the "glory of God." This can be done only by our reducing them to experience, so that others can see their effect in our lives and characters. If by them we indeed become partakers of the divine nature and are led to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord, being filled with the heavenly graces, and showing forth the fruits of the Spirit, then we shall give to the world such an idea of their value as will attract them also. "Let your light so shine before men," says Christ, "that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

IN THE QUESTION CHAIR.

[DESIGNED for the consideration of such questions as will be of interest and profit to the general reader. All correspondents should give their names and correct post-office address, that queries not replied to here, may be answered by mail.]

221.—THE LAW OF SIN. ROM. 7:25.

"So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin." What is the law of sin?

N. O.

Answer.—If we correctly apprehend the teaching of the apostle in Romans, chapters 7 and 8, there are three things brought to view in his discussion of man's relation to God: First, the law of God, the moral law, which is the rule of life and the standard of right and wrong; secondly, the carnal mind, the working of sin in the flesh, which is not subject to that law, but continually prompts us to rebel against its principles, and work in opposition to its claims; and, thirdly, the spiritual mind which is given us in Christ, which is subject to the law of God, and delights in it, and prompts us in all things to obey it.

In the process of conversion, when a man turns from sin to holiness, when the new nature is coming in to take the place of the old, and the mind is enlightened and the conscience quickened to see the right, and the old nature still endeavors to hold its place and keep control of the heart, there is a conflict and a struggle. This is the condition described in the latter part of Romans 7. And at such time as these two principles are about evenly balanced, and each is striving for the mastery, the individual would often have occasion to exclaim, as recorded by the apostle in portions of chapter 7, "For to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not." "The good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do." "With the mind I serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin." "I delight in the law of God after the inward man: but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind." A person in this condition knows what the law requires, and would be glad to follow it; but the motions of sin, the flesh, often prevail.

But the apostle takes the penitent on to complete victory in the first part of chapter 8, "There is therefore now no condemnation [from the moral law] to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh [follow not the carnal nature], but after the Spirit [that is, follow the new nature]. For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus [the new nature received through Christ, which prompts us to live in obedience to the moral law] hath made me free from the law of sin and death [the old carnal nature which prompts us to hate and disobey the law of God]. Thus "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus," is the new nature in Christ, while "the law of sin" is the carnal nature, the "old man." When we take Christ and give the new nature the entire field, the whole control, that law of the Spirit makes us free from, releases us from the control of, the law of sin, the old carnal nature, so that we can keep the law of God acceptably.

222.—FAITH AND FORGIVENESS. LUKE 17:3, 4.

When the Lord told the disciples to forgive a trespassing but repentant brother even seven times a day, they said: "Lord, increase our faith." Luke 17:4, 5. In view of this, is it possible truly to forgive without faith? and is it proper to ask the Lord for faith?

D. McN.

Ans.—The Lord had told his disciples that they were to forgive their brethren as many times as seventy times seven. Matt. 18:21, 22. And Luke may refer to the same spirit of forgiveness; but it seemed so difficult to exercise this spirit thus continually, that they perceived that it would require an extraordinary degree of faith in the words of Christ, and a conviction that his instruction must be obeyed, to enable them to keep this commandment. This was doubtless the kind of faith which they asked the Lord to increase; and this would seem to be a very proper kind of prayer, not only from this case, but from that mentioned in Mark 9:24.

223.—THE LAME MAN'S FAITH. ACTS 3:6.

Did the lame man mention in Acts 3:6 exercise faith in the name of Jesus? or was it Peter's faith that made him perfect whole?

C. W. O.

Ans.—The light which has been shed upon the text by what sister White has written concerning it, seems to put the matter in a very natural, forcible, and clear light. She says that this man had heard of Jesus, and had long desired to go to him to be healed, and that his earnest pleadings finally induced some kind persons to bring him to Jerusalem; but upon arriving there, he discovered that Christ, the Healer, upon whom his hopes had been centered, had been put to death. His disappointment excited the pity of those who knew how long he had hoped and expected to be healed by Jesus, and so they daily brought him to the temple to receive alms. When Peter said he had neither gold nor silver, the man's countenance fell, but greatly bright with faith and hope as the disciples continued. Doubtless when the name of Jesus of Nazareth was mentioned, his faith revived in that name, so that his faith co-operated with that of Peter and John in the wonderful miracle that was wrought. OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

How the Stars Have Fallen.

The statements of prophecy concerning the manner in which the stars fall is worthy of consideration. Matthew says, "The stars shall fall from heaven." Mark states: "The stars of heaven shall fall." But St. John presents the matter more specifically: "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth as a fig-tree casteth her unripe figs, when she is shaken of a great wind." Revised Version, Rev. 6:13. This language presents the manner of their descent quite clearly. In such a tempest, the green fruit does not drop down perpendicularly, as ripe fruit falls. The fruit is thrown violently in various directions, as the different branches are bent before the gale. It is "cast" as the prophet states; and in such a wind the fruit would fly off, the track of some crossing others, all going more or less obliquely, but from one source—the tree. So declares the prophet, the stars will fall from "heaven" "to the earth." There must in such a fulfillment, then, be some great central point in the heaven of space from which they would fly off in all directions, as if "cast" violently from it.

Let us notice now the testimony of eye-witnesses and scientific men as to the manner of the great star showers of this century. As to the first, in 1799, we have no very exact description.

"The first great star-fall occurred Nov. 12, 13, 1799, and the best account of it is found in Humboldt's work entitled, 'Personal Narration,' Vol. III, pp. 331-346. The display was simultaneously beheld from the equator, lat. 0; Greenland, lat. 64° 14', and in all the intervening breadth between longitude 46° and 82°, an area or region embracing fully 11,000,000 square miles. The distinguished Humboldt and his friend M. Beupland, with multitudes of others, beheld the awful phenomenon; and the latter, a French savant, wrote: 'There was not a space in the firmament equal in extent to three diameters of the moon that was not filled at every instant with bolides and falling stars.'—'Great Consummation,' p. 262.

But concerning the manner in which they fell in 1833 and 1866-8, there is an abundance of testimony. Says Henry Dana Ward, then a merchant at New York, afterward an author and Episcopal minister, in Journal of Commerce, Nov. 15, 1833:—

"At the cry, 'Look out of the window,' I sprang from a deep sleep, and with wonder saw the east lighted up with the dawn and meteors. The zenith, the north, and the west also showed the falling stars in the very image of one thing, and only one, I ever heard of. I called to my wife to behold! and while robing, she exclaimed, 'See how the stars fall!' I replied, 'That is the wonder!' And we felt in our hearts that it was a sign of the last days. For truly 'the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Rev. 6:13. This language of the prophet has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday it was literally fulfilled." "And how did they fall? Neither myself nor one of my family heard any report! and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens as that which

St. John uses in the prophecy before quoted." "The falling stars did not come as if from several trees shaken, but from one; those which appeared in the east fell toward the east; those which appeared in the north fell toward the north." "And they fell not as ripe fruit falls. Far from it; but they flew, they were cast, like unripe fruit which at first refuses to leave the branch: and when under a violent pressure it does break its hold, it flies swiftly straight off descending; and in the multitude falling, some cross the track of others as they are thrown with more or less force; but each one falls on its own side of the tree. Such was the appearance of the above phenomenon to the inmates of my house."

This was an eye-witness, giving, the day following its occurrence, an account through a leading newspaper in New York City, to multitudes who beheld the same spectacle. It was certainly reliable. Its exact fulfillment of the prediction made eighteen centuries before, occurred to his mind. Thus God fulfills literally his word by the prophets.

Says Prof. Olmstead:—

"The extent of the shower of 1833 was such as to cover no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface, from the middle of the Atlantic on the east to the Pacific on the west, and from the northern coast of South America to undefined regions among the British possessions on the north, the exhibition was visible, and everywhere presented nearly the same appearance. The meteors appeared to emanate from a point in the constellation Leo near a star called Gamma Leonis in the bend of the sickle."

Says the "New American Cyclopaedia":—

"It was observed that the lines of all the meteors, if traced back, converged in one quarter of the heavens, which was Gamma of Leo Major; and this point accompanied the stars in their apparent motion westward, instead of moving with the earth toward the east. The source whence the meteors came was thus shown to be independent of the earth's rotation, and exterior to our atmosphere."

"They all appeared to come from the same quarter of the heavens, the vicinity of the star Gamma in Leo."—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

The same is said concerning the point from whence the great star showers of 1866-8 proceeded.

Says the Scientific American, Dec. 8, 1866:—

"They radiated from an exact point in the constellation Leo, located in a line between the stars Gamma and Wu Leonis, about three degrees from the former, and five and a half degrees from the latter star. The areas traversed by the meteors increased without exception according to their distance from this point; while those near the radiant had an extremely short path and train—that is, extremely fore-shortened to the eye—with proportionately slow movement, some of the nearest even appearing for an instant as if without motion. One close to the radiant is described as simply a star that shone out, waxed, waned, and vanished where it stood."

Says the Washington (D. C.) Intelligencer, 1866:—

"They appear to come mostly from the constellation Leo in the east; and to move in nearly a horizontal direction, though many fell obliquely and perpendicularly, and the direction varied as the constellation changed its place."

"Sometimes a minute point of light like a fire-fly would dart with an angular, jerking motion, and zigzag course, hither and thither, but still as if away from Leo."—New Orleans Picayune, Dec. 6, 1866.

"They flashed from every part of the compass vertically, transversally, and some on parallel lines, the balls of fire seeming to have dropped from the heavens as they shot across the starry vault."—Washington (D. C.) Chronicle, Nov. 14, 1868.

"Thousands of shooting stars going in the direction of the northwest."—Baltimore Gazette, Nov. 14, 1833.

More testimony might be produced upon this point if space and the reader's patience would admit; but surely sufficient has been presented to show beyond question that the one special characteristic of these wonderful displays was their falling as the Bible, eighteen hundred years beforehand, had declared. They came from one point in the heavens and flew, or were "cast," in all directions, often crossing the lines of each other's descent, even as the unripe fruit would be cast by the tree in a fearful tempest. So God said it would be, and so it was. The testimony, so far, has also been plain that these falling bodies were really "stars," as the Scripture declares. Still more may be given.

"They are small bodies of solid matter revolving around the sun in eccentric orbits, not uniformly distributed in space, but in groups or clusters, their orbits coming near the earth's orbit in that part in which the earth arrives about the 13th of November. Here a collision takes place between these small bodies and the earth's atmosphere, through which they pass with a velocity of about thirty miles a second. Their light probably results from the heat generated by the compression of the air before them, the earth moving toward them with a velocity of nearly twenty miles a second, or 68,000 miles an hour."—Portsmouth (N. H.) Chronicle, 1866.

"There is reason to believe that they sometimes descended very low. A credible witness informs us that he saw one explode and leave its train between his eye and an opposite precipice several hundred feet high."—Prof. Olmstead, in Journal of Science, Vol. X.

"The stars flew in all possible directions except from the earth. Some of them descended perpendicularly over the vessel we were in, so that I was in constant expectation of their falling on us."—Andrew Ellicott, U. S. Commissioner at Sea.

"Some seemed to fall over trees or houses, bright to the last, but with the ruddy hues of a lower atmosphere. There were times when it seemed as if a mighty wind had caught the old stars and loosed them from their holdings."—London Times, Nov. 15, 1866.

An objector may say,—

"The fall of these meteors is periodic, and there is nothing supernatural in the star showers. They usually fall about the 18th of November in the years they are discernible."

But if we admit they are not specially supernatural; or created for the occasion by a special fiat of divine power, that would not invalidate the fact that they are solemn portents of the great day, and heralds of its approach. It seems to be a fact that there is a degree of periodicity in their display, and that scientists in comparatively recent years predicted the probable occurrence of them again about 1866-8, and that then they came as they expected. But what would that prove?—Simply that in the latter part of the century since they have come somewhat periodically, the wise men have been able to discern the length of the period of time when there would be a recurrence in their display. But our Saviour pointed out the time of their occurrence eighteen centuries beforehand. He did not state that these stars would be created at the moment of their fall as a direct act of supernatural power. But he did tell us the time when they would fall, and how they would fall; and his words have been precisely fulfilled. That Almighty power should have arranged all this in advance, is but reasonable and consistent. The Saviour made no mistake in his arrangements. It came as he said, and when he said. What more could we ask? And why not believe the great event will follow which he also predicted, of which the star-fall is the herald?

These grand and wondrous displays have come in our time alone. Not a scrap of history can be found concerning any similar displays before the sun was darkened, or in any preceding age. Now the world is full of recorded facts of them. Multitudes of extracts can be given. Yet there were many keen, intelligent, faithful chroniclers living before this age, who recorded with great exactness other phenomena that seemed remarkable. Their failure to make any records of such tremendous showers of meteors shows, conclusively, that such never occurred before this last wondrous century. So the objection has no force.

When fairly considered, it seems necessary, in order to the fulfillment of the express words of Holy Writ, as to how the stars should fall, that God should make such provision as the facts show was made. These meteoric stones must be in one place in the heavens in a comparatively small area, or else they could not fall as the unripe fruit fell in a tempest, from one tree. God's work is all planned beforehand, and provision is made for every contingency. The fulfillment never fails. As the "treasures" "of hail" are "reserved" by Him in readiness for the great day (Job 38:22, 23; Rev. 16:21) he has declared would come, so the heavenly arsenal of fiery stars and balls of fire in countless multitudes were all in proper position to make their descent at the very time he foretold, to serve as a great herald of the soon-coming King.

And they did alarm and arouse multitudes, producing the same feelings and effects, terror and alarm, as the darkening of the sun produced when it occurred. This is a point not to be overlooked. A great sign of Christ's coming, foretold and consummated by divine presence and power, we may be sure would not pass, and not alarm, or produce solemn feelings. Multitudes felt most deeply that it was a sign of the day of judgment.

"While a mere lad, I was waked in the night to see a pale face bending over me, and to hear 'Get up! get up! the day of judgment has come, I believe; for the stars are all falling.'"—Horace Greeley, New York Tribune, June 4, 1859.

The Connecticut Observer of Nov. 25, 1833 (copied from the Old Countryman) speaks as follows:—

"We pronounce the raining of fire which we saw on Wednesday morning last an awful type, a sure forerunner, a merciful sign, of that great and dreadful day which the inhabitants of the earth will witness when the sixth seal shall be opened. The time is just at hand, described not only in the New Testament, but in the Old. A more correct picture of a fig-tree casting its green fruit when blown by a mighty wind, it is not possible to behold."

The following is taken from "Burrit's Geography of the Heavens," pp. 157, 158:—

"But the most sublime phenomenon of shooting stars of which the world has furnished any record, was witnessed throughout the United States on the morning of the 13th of November, 1833. The entire extent of this astonishing exhibition has not been precisely ascertained; but it covered no inconsiderable part of the earth's surface. The first appearance was that of fire-works of the most imposing grandeur, covering the entire vault of heaven with myriads of fire-balls resembling sky-rockets. Their coruscations were bright, gleaming, and incessant, and they fell thick as the flakes in the early snows of December." "To the splendors of this celestial exhibition the most brilliant sky-rockets and fire-works of art bear less relation than the twinkling of the most tiny star to the broad glare of the sun. The whole heavens seemed in motion, and suggested to some the awful grandeur of the image employed in the Apocalypse upon the opening of the sixth seal, when the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind."

Thoughts on the Message.

THE interpretation given to the prophecy of Rev. 14:6-12 by Seventh-day Adventists is to us of great importance. As a people, we would not have existed, had it not been for the application of the prophecy. While it is true that the truths taught here are in harmony with all the truths of divine revelation, and they contain nothing new in and of themselves, it is the application of this prophecy that has become the vital separating principle from all other denominations and from the world. Consequently, there can be no prophecy in which we as a people are more interested than this. When individuals lose their faith in the general principles of interpretation given by Seventh-day Adventists, respecting the application of these three messages, they either become wandering stars without any anchorage whatever, or lose their identity as being separate from other denominations. Much depends, therefore, upon the correct understanding of this prophecy. Neither should we forget the first principles of interpretation given to this prophecy by those whom God chose to lead out in the third angel's message; for if their position at that time was all a mistake, then our existence as a people is a mistake, and consequently, the application of the prophecy of Revelation 14. Then when we come to this conclusion, there is but one alternative; namely, to take sides with our persecutors, and cause the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the beast and his image, for there will be but two classes when the message closes.

The first angel's message is understood to have its application to the great advent movement throughout the world, especially from 1840-44. The distinctiveness of this message was the time connected therewith; for it proclaimed with a loud voice, "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." The proclaiming "of the hour of judgment was equivalent to preaching the coming of the Lord; for God 'shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom.'" It was taking "time" from the sealed book of Daniel, and crying with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth, "that there should be time no longer."

This was the prophetic time found in the prophecy of Daniel, which terminated in 1844, bringing us to the cleansing of the sanctuary, to the hour of God's investigative judgment. During the loud cry of the first angel's message, which was from 1840-44, but more especially from the spring to the autumn of 1844, there was joined with it the announcement of the fall of Babylon, which was the second angel's message. In the application of this prophecy, there could be no mistake, any more than regarding the first angel's message. That a moral fall did take place at that time in the organization of the professed church of Christ, is a fact that their own testimony at that time, and their subsequent history abundantly prove. But it will be noticed in Rev. 14:8 the announcement of the fall is simply made, and the reason briefly given, but in Revelation 18 we have the same announcement with certain additions. It reads as follows: "And after these things I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lightened with his glory. And he cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird. For all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth have waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies. And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues. For her sins have reached unto

THE SHADOW AND THE SUBSTANCE.

In the 2nd chapter of Colossians, the apostle Paul speaks of certain things, "which," he says (verse 17), "are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ." Here the present tense is used for the past; for the apostle is speaking of a state of things which existed previous to the crucifixion of Christ; and all shadows have now ceased. The sense is, "which were [before Christ] a shadow of things to come."

Some of the things which composed this shadow are enumerated in the preceding verse: they were sabbath days, new moons, holydays (or feast days, distinct from the sabbaths), drinks and meats. Verse 16. These had all disappeared in Christ, as a shadow ceases when the substance which cast it is reached. For this reason he told the Colossians that they were not to let any man judge them with respect to these things; that is, they were not to be suffered to lay any obligation upon them in regard to them, nor to condemn them if they did not observe them.

To the Hebrews Paul stated further what constituted that shadow of things to come. In Heb. 10:1, he says: "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices, which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect." Here again the present tense is used for the past; for that had all passed away, when this was written to the Hebrews; and the sense is that the law spoken of could not, while it was in force, with only such sacrifices as they had, make any one perfect, however strictly he might follow it.

In Heb. 9:9, 10, the same thing is again referred to: "Which [the Mosaic tabernacle] was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; which [service] stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation." Again, chapter 7:18, 19: "For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. For the law made nothing perfect."

"The law" spoken of in these passages certainly cannot be the moral law; for there was not about that the least element of anything that was typical or shadowy. All its principles were in existence, and its Sabbath was specially instituted, before it was possible for a type or shadow to exist; that is, before the fall of man. And it was never necessary to disannul the moral law for something better to follow.

But there was another system called "the law," which consisted of regulations concerning meats, drinks, holydays, new moons, sabbaths (yearly), gifts, sacrifices, divers washings, and carnal ordinances, which could make nothing perfect, the weakness and unprofitableness of which existed in itself, and which was disannulled to make way for something better.

In other passages the apostle tells us how this law, in respect to which we are not now to be judged in any particular, was disannulled. Thus, in Eph. 2:15, we read: "Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances." In Col. 2:14, he states the same fact: "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross."

That it is the typical and ceremonial law that is referred to by the expressions "law of commandments contained in ordinances," and "the handwriting of ordinances," and that that is what was nailed by Christ to his cross, we know, because it is for the reason that Christ has blotted out and nailed something to his cross, that no man is to judge us in reference to meats, drinks, and all that constituted a shadow, of which Christ's work is the body; and the book of Hebrews shows that it was that law which had sacrifices and offerings that was a shadow of good things to come. This, then, is what is spoken of in these passages, as being blotted out and nailed to the cross; not the moral law, nor the Sabbath of that law.

But it may be said that Col. 2:13 speaks of the forgiveness of sin, which is the transgression of the moral law; and why does not verse 14, and onward, therefore have reference to the same thing? Why is there such a sudden transition to the ceremonial law?—A moment's consideration of the situation will show why the apostle frames his argument in this way.

It appears from verse 8 that the church in Colosse, like that in Galatia, was troubled with Judaizing teachers who taught that unless they were circumcised after the manner of Moses, they could not be saved. Acts 15:1. The Jews had fallen into the error of supposing that their system of worship, of which circumcision was the test and token, would really take away sin; and they made it of immense importance, teaching that unless one was circumcised, he could not be saved; and, conversely, that if he was circumcised, and kept the law of Moses, he would be saved. When the gospel as presented by Christ was introduced, of course so important a matter as that on which salvation depended, could not be discarded, and so some imagined and taught that the two systems could be amalgamated, the chief features of each being retained; for it was certain of the Pharisees who professed to have embraced the gospel, who were causing all the trouble with regard to the law of Moses. Acts 15:5. With them every convert from the Gentiles must adopt circumcision and other features of the Jewish system.

But all this had then become obsolete, and was of no more account than the superstitious observances of the Gentiles, which were always apostasy. So the apostle labors to show the Colossians that it is not necessary to go through the Jewish system to reach Christ and salvation. He calls this "the rudiments of the world," in verse 8, just as in Gal. 4:3, and bids them beware lest any man spoil them through it. He tells them that the fullness of the Godhead dwelt in Christ bodily, and that in him they are complete. He informs them that in Christ they have the true circumcision made without hands, and consequently don't need the Mosaic rite. He shows them that by baptism they have shown their faith in Christ, and that he has quickened them with the new life of the gospel, and forgiven their sins. Then he shows that Christ has blotted out, by nailing to his cross, that very system to which these Judaizing teachers were trying to turn them. Now we can see why he introduces it as he does. Christ is the only source of life and forgiveness; it is not to be attained as these teachers claimed, through circumcision and the law of Moses, where the Jews were seeking it. From the darkness of heathenism they could come directly to Christ, as well as from the then obsolete system of Judaism; and they might as well stay in the former as to adopt the latter.

The terms of verse 15 doubtless refer to the great exaltation and importance attributed by those Jewish teachers to that system which had passed away. Satan, working with the wisdom of over four thousand years' experience, and with the energy of despair, would of course try to make that a rival and obstacle to the work of Christ. But the successful accomplishment of the sacrifice upon the cross was a complete despoiling and nullification of all the false systems which the powers of darkness would try to build up in that line. On the cross Christ openly triumphed over them.

But if verse 14 refers to the ceremonial law, the Jewish system, it may be asked in what sense that was "against us," and "contrary to us." These expressions are applicable to it when contemplated with reference to the finished work. That system was only a temporary arrangement. In itself it made nothing perfect (Heb. 7:19; 9:9; 10:1), hence to make that perpetual and eternal, would be only a farce. It was weak and unprofitable. Heb. 7:18. It was a yoke which they were not able to bear. Acts 15:10. It was "imposed on them until the time of reformation" (Heb. 9:10), or until the seed should come. It was contrary to, and against, us, just as the staging and scaffolding is against a building, after the structure is completed.

It is then, after having served its purpose, an impediment and an offense, and must be removed. It was the enmity between Jews and Gentiles, the middle wall of partition, which Christ broke down and abolished. Eph. 2:14-16.

A careful study of these scriptures, and a clear understanding of the relation of the two dispensations as therein set forth, would save many from the error they have fallen into with reference to the perpetuity of the moral law. It was the ceremonial law, not the moral, that was nailed to the cross.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

How the Stars Have Fallen.

FATHER CLARKSON, well known in Iowa as the father of the Clarkson brothers who founded and own the Des Moines Register, and who was for a long time himself agricultural editor of it, a man of prominence, a staunch Methodist, formerly editor and proprietor of a paper in Indiana, wrote an article in the Register when nearly eighty years old, concerning the falling stars. He says:—

"There was an article in the Register on the 4th of July claiming that improved fire-works for the amusement of small and mature boys 'eclipse the glories of the greatest meteoric showers.' The writer of that sentence did not witness the glorious meteoric showers of November, 1833, when the display was so much superior to any artistic display of fire-works that neither language nor any element in nature can furnish comparisons. The comparison of the sheet-iron thunder of the theaters to the electric display of Providence when the heavens are all on fire and the earth trembles, would be tolerable. But the awful grandeur of the display on the night of the 13th of November, 1833, which made the stoutest hearts to stand in awe, and the most defiant infidel quake with fear, is never to be compared to the most brilliant fire-works. Those who witnessed the meteoric shower named saw the greatest display that ever man will see until the day that Paul [Peter] speaks of when the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. The agricultural editor of the Register was out alone with a team and load of lumber all night on that never-to-be-forgotten night. And he cannot now consent to hear of human fire-works being superior to that most grand and sublime spectacle ever before or since beheld by man. Immense meteors mingled together with smaller shooting stars, fell like snow-flakes, and produced phosphorescent lines along their course. Intermingled with these were large fire balls; some larger than the moon fell or shot in the arc of a circle of thirty or forty degrees. These left behind them luminous trains which remained in view several minutes, and sometimes half an hour or more. Some of these luminous bodies, whatever they were, remained stationary for a considerable time, irregular in form, emitting brilliant streams of light. There was no moon, but starlight; and as the whole firmament was lit up and descending in fiery torrents, everything was on a grander scale than man may ever aspire to imitate. Where these meteors, falling stars, rockets, and balls of fire came from, has never yet been explained; but astronomers and scientists who witnessed it, decide that as they were independent of the earth's rotation, their origin was exterior to our atmosphere. Prof. Olmstead of New Haven, who had the best means of observing this display, decided that they at least came from a point 2,238,000,000 miles from the earth. This display extended all over North and South America and the West India Islands. Patent fire-works were no nearer this wonderful phenomenon than a lightning bug is equal to the sun. The display lasted from about ten o'clock in the evening of the 13th until it was obscured by the light of the sun on the morning of the 14th of November, 1833."—Des Moines Register of July 12, 1889.

Such is the impression left upon the mind of a man of great observation and experience. He was not an Adventist. Writing this account more than half a century after its occurrence, it was fresh in his mind. So deep was the impression made that he can describe it in this thrilling manner. He was out all night, and saw it all. None who failed to behold it themselves can appreciate properly its wonderful grandeur.

The Journal of Commerce informs us that—

"Three hundred miles this side of Liverpool the phenomenon was as splendid as here; and in St. Lawrence county there was a snow-storm during the phenomenon, in which the falling stars appeared like lightning. . . . In Germantown, Pa., they seemed like showers of great hail."

The Christian Advocate and Journal of Dec. 13, 1833, describes it as follows:—

"The meteoric phenomenon which occurred on the morning of November last, was of so extraordinary and interesting a character as to be entitled to more than a mere passing notice. . . . The lively and graphic descriptions which have appeared in various public journals, do not exceed the reality. No language can come up to the splendor of that magnificent display; and I hesitate not to say that no one who did not witness it can form any adequate conception of its glory. It seemed as if the whole starry heavens had congregated at one point near the zenith, and were simultaneously shooting forth with the velocity of lightning to every part of the horizon; and yet they were not exhausted—thousands swiftly followed in the track of thousands, as if created for the occasion."

The following is taken from the Elizabeth (N. J.) Transcript:—

"While engaged as a compositor on a leading New York paper, on the nights of November 12, 13, 1833, it was my good fortune," says James S. Drake, an employee of the Sunday Leader, "to be detained at the office in Wall St. until a very late hour. It was a night memorable in history for the most brilliant display of meteors ever witnessed. While busy at our allotted tasks, with the aid of sperm-oil lamps, suddenly the whole heavens shone as if in flames, and for several hours countless balls of fire flashed along the sky. The marvelous display of the Creator's glory was generally spoken of as a 'rain of fire.' When my duties were completed, I proceeded up Broadway, which was as light as at noonday, and throngs of citizens were still abroad at three o'clock on the morning of the 13th. The splendor of that night will fade from my mind only when my faculties fail to distinguish the brilliant noon from a night which envelops the landscape in gloom. In all sections of the country, from Maine to Georgia, came tidings that the people were awakened and watched with wonder the falling stars. Many fancied the earth was burning, and that they themselves would soon perish in the fiery furnace. The colored people in the southern States, who were very ignorant, came out from their cabins, and often fell into wild convulsions of terror. They prayed, they shouted, they cried out, 'The judgment day has come.' The beautiful sight continued till morning."

Our leading extracts thus far have related to the star shower of 1833. More testimony will now be presented concerning the grand displays of 1866-8. Says Taylor:—

"The star showers of 1866-8 were fully equal to their predecessors in extent and sublimity. Nov. 12-14 saw the conflict of worlds; and the earth again plunged into and passed through the vast meteoric ring whose breadth in the heavens as it lay in the track of our planet, was estimated by Professor Proctor to be fully 500,000 and perhaps 1,000,000 miles. Once more Christ's words proved accurate and scientific, and 'the stars of heaven fell.' The evidence is overwhelming, the testimony sure. Millions of witnesses still live. Before us lies proof of deep and solemn interest, gathered from published accounts in all lands. The world is witness to the divine warning of the approaching end, and is without excuse. The phenomenon was divested of no part of its earlier grandeur and impressiveness. Europeans and Asiatics only beheld most of the display in November, 1866, as the globe's eastern hemisphere was that year at night turned toward the stream of stars. But they came in millions. At the Mediterranean, over Northern Africa, in all Turkish lands, at Jerusalem where He foretold them, at the Azores, and on the entire European continent, it was a repetition of the awful splendors of 1832-33." "The scientists of Great Britain in wonder and excitement kept vigil to watch the phenomenon. Queen Victoria was summoned from her dreams on her palatial couch, and became for hours an earnest observer of the flashing heavens."

"The heralding stars, 'tumbling from off their towers,' came again in November, 1867 and 1868, and covered the skies from ocean to ocean, and continent to continent, with their cortasations; and Europe's nations, with people at every capital in our own broad land, beheld them. The stream of tiny burning worlds appeared to be inexhaustible, requiring several years to pass it, the earth each time striking the strange ring of cosmic atoms at the well-known date, Nov. 12-14. From Chili in South America northward for over six thousand miles the stars fell in the sight of crowds of sleepless, marveling races of men. Over Maine, Mexico, and at the Sandwich Islands, the spectacle was equally grand. Half of London's four million souls were awake to behold the unwonted sight. Few had seen, or could ever hope to see, the like again."—"Great Consummation," pp. 266, 267.

We give this lengthy extract from Mr. Taylor's book, as it presents a comprehensive view of those later star showers. Some brief extracts from a variety of sources over places far apart will complete our list.

"Shortly after midnight the celestial fire-works began. At one o'clock the display became magnificent. The meteors appeared in every portion of the heavens—rose in majesty and exploded in fire. They were visible all over the land."—Philadelphia Inquirer, 1868.

"The stars instantly began to fall as thick as autumn leaves."—Prof. Harkness, at Richmond, Va., 1867.

"They shot to all parts of the sky with a swift and stately motion, most beautiful to behold, if not almost too wonderful and too surprising to describe."—Prof. A. S. Herschell, at Glasgow, Scotland.

"Countless numbers of luminous bodies, darting almost uninterruptedly from east to west."—Sweden Post, Nov. 14, 1866.

"At times the display actually looked as if the heavens were raining down stars."—New Orleans Picayune, 1868.

"On looking up, the appearance was as if the city was being shelled. Showers of meteors seemed to be pouring into the place. Excited crowds in the streets cried, 'Look! It is just as if it were in the time of siege.'"—Letter from Saragossa, Spain, in London Times, 1866.

"At Beirut, Syria, the meteors were pouring down like a rain of fire."—N. Y. Tribune, Dec. 28, 1866.

"As brilliant as were ever witnessed at these islands."—Cor. at Sandwich Islands.

"There was one which surpassed in magnitude all the rest. It rose in the north and disappeared in the southwest. It was like an immense ball of fire, and had a train more brilliant than a rocket and as long as a rainbow. Stars and planets were eclipsed by the display, as is artificial light by the rising of the sun. The finest print could easily be read by the light. The people of this earth seldom have the opportunity of witnessing anything so awful, so sublime, or so grandly beautiful."—The Telegraph, Macon, Ga.

"A scene of magnificent splendor, and appearing as if all the stars were really falling from heaven, as a fig-tree casteth its untimely figs when it is shaken of the winds."—Bath (Me.) Sentinel, 1868.

Extracts might be greatly multiplied on this subject, as vast numbers of them exist. But as there are many living witnesses of the showers of 1866, and those later, it is not necessary. It is about impossible to exaggerate the grandeur of these, in the opinion of all who beheld them.

The following conclusions are presented in closing our notice of this important sign. 1. Its chronology. It was to be after the great tribulation, after the great earthquake, after the darkening of the sun and of the moon. 2. In the time or order of events as given by our Saviour and St. John (Matt. 24:29,30; Mark 13:24-26; Rev. 6:12-14), the falling stars are the last of the list of great signs which take place just before the close of probation. There are others given in other places, which may occur as late or even later. But in these scriptures there is a special order, a connected succession of leading signs, of which this is the last. Then the disciples are to look for their Lord's appearing till he comes. And he does not authorize them to look for or expect him before. 3. These great star showers came in the exact order and at the time he foretold. 4. They were beheld more universally than any of the others, even over the principal portions of our globe. Surely, they were extensive enough to fulfill the prophecy. 5. Of the grandeur and wonderful character of these exhibitions of celestial fire-works, the extracts given abundantly testify. It would seem about impossible to surpass them in the estimation of the beholder. 6. The effect produced on the minds of whole multitudes was precisely such as we should expect would be produced by a great sign of the day of God. Vast numbers felt in their souls that it was either a sign of the day of judgment, or its very commencement. The minds of intelligent men were involuntarily called to the very words of the prophecy, it so literally fulfilled. 7. If these star showers were not a fulfillment of it, how would it be possible to have one? How could a more striking one be given? Should a score of these now occur, the effect upon the mind of the beholder would greatly lose its force. The more common they became, the less force would they have on the ordinary mind. To be a sign implies something startling—something out of the common order. Such have been these displays; nothing like them in sublimity, grandeur, and extent have ever been seen in past ages. Surely, if these be not a fulfillment of our Saviour's prediction, there is no likelihood of one ever being seen on our globe.

This great sign is fulfilled before the eyes of this generation, and therefore we are in the last days of this world's history. Solemn thought, momentous conclusion! To a rushing world, bent on personal pleasure, pride, and worldliness, the thought would be most disagreeable; but to the true disciple, the prospect is most glorious. Our King soon cometh. This world, filled with aching hearts, sin, and evil, tyranny, woe, sickness, sad partings, grievous toil, hatred, jealousy, lust, and depravity, passeth away. A better world opens before the child of God. Ages of joy, light, and blessing, beckon the children of Abraham. Such will look up, knowing their redemption draweth nigh.

"WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"—NO. 6.

The Third Angel's Message.

THE message of the third angel of Rev. 14:9-12 is simply a warning against certain powers and their agencies, that were developed in the continued proclamation of the two former messages, and the consequences of rejecting these messages. The commandments of God and the faith of Jesus are clearly revealed by the gospel, or in other words, they are the "everlasting gospel." "And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name. Here is the patience of the saints: here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." Rev. 14:9-12.

That this is the closing work of the gospel is shown by many considerations: 1. The next event of importance mentioned is a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sitting "like unto the Son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle," which is none other than Christ at his second coming to reap the harvest of the earth, which takes place after the gospel has accomplished its work. Rev. 14:14-16. Matt. 13:37-45. Therefore any message purporting to offer salvation to any people subsequent to this message, would be another gospel. Gal. 1:8, 9.

2. The wrath of God which is poured out into the cup of his indignation which follows the closing of this proclamation, is without mixture, and shows there is no mercy, while the dregs are being drunk by all the wicked of the earth. Ps. 75:8.

3. Those who are not found keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, when this message closes, are the ones who receive this wrath without any mixture of mercy, and suffer the seven last plagues. Rev. 15:6-8, also chapter 16.

4. During the pouring out of the seven last plagues, Great Babylon comes up "in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the fierceness of his wrath." This identifies the closing of the work of the third angel's message with the work brought to view in chapter 18. (See former articles.)

5. The warning is against any man worshiping the beast and his image and receiving his mark in his forehead or in his hand. This beast and its image is the subject of chapter 13.

6. The conflict between the beast and his image-worshippers and God's commandment-keepers is the last conflict that will ever come between God's people and the world; for when the image of the beast is made, he causeth "as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed." Rev. 13:15-17. But deliverance comes just then, for John says, "I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire: and them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God." Rev. 15:2. The sea of glass was before the throne in heaven. Rev. 4:1-6.

7. It will also be noticed that the two-horned beast of Rev. 13:11-17 gradually develops into a persecuting power, at the same time that the messages of Revelation 14 are doing their work. As one progresses, so does the other. As one ripens into a persecuting power, so the others increase until the earth is lighted with their glory, and every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, hear the proclamation of salvation. By a careful reading of the work of the two-horned beast, as mentioned in Rev. 13:11-17, there are several points of interest brought to view:—

(1.) "He exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the first beast whose deadly wound was healed." This embraces the entire development and work of the two-horned beast. From the expression, "He exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them that dwell therein," etc., we conclude that it will become the prominent government in this persecution, and lead other nations by its example in this final conflict.

(2.) To "cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed," will require miracles and wonders.

(3.) Among these wonders, "he maketh fire to come down from heaven on the earth, in the sight of men." And there must have been other wonders and miracles, but this appears to be a crowning one, as it is so prominently mentioned, for it reads: "And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth, by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast."

(4.) It would seem that there was at first a reluctance on the part of the people to make an image to the beast "which had a wound by the sword and did live," because the speaking of the image would put to death those who would not worship it. The fact that the people themselves are not prepared to go as rapidly as the leaders, indicates that the ripening off in iniquity is a gradual process, and will be worked up by the leaders. It also shows that the execution of the laws is controlled by the sentiment of the people; for they say "to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by a sword, and did live."

the scepter, or the tribal constitution, did not depart from Judah before the predicted era."

The term "lawgiver" doubtless means, in a collective sense, "teachers of the law," a body of men which continued in Israel as long as the national polity of that people lasted, not one who originated and promulgated laws; for God always retained that prerogative in his own hands. The office of teachers of the law was performed by the priests and Levites, from whom were the lawyers and scribes so often mentioned in the New Testament. These joined themselves to Judah, as we read in 2 Chron. 11:13, 14: "And the priests and the Levites that were in all Israel resorted to him out of all their coasts. For the Levites left their suburbs and their possessions, and came to Judah and Jerusalem." So Judah was the ruling and the teaching tribe until the coming of the Messiah. There can be no doubt that the expression "till Shiloh come," refers to the first advent of Christ; and after his coming the gospel was to go to all the world, to gather out from the Gentiles a people for his name. The gathering would therefore seem most naturally to refer to the gathering of the people to Christ by the gospel, resulting, of course, in their gathering at last into the kingdom of God.

226.—WORKING ON THE SABBATH.

What is one to do who works for his living, and who cannot get work unless he will work on the seventh day, when he knows that to be the Sabbath, on which we are commanded to do no work? W. J. E.

Ans.—Seek for some independent employment. The canvassing field is always open. Or find something to be done by the job, on which you can labor in your own time and way. Find a piece of land to rent or work on shares. Farming is the most independent, and in some respects the most desirable kind of employment. A man is master of his own time on a farm, and can arrange his work to suit his own conscience and convenience. If a man has health and a fair amount of good judgment, it would seem that he need not be long out of employment in such a country as this, where there are so many avenues open for seeking a livelihood.

227.—RAISED UP AT THE LAST DAY. JOHN 6: 54.

Please harmonize John 6: 54 and 1 Cor. 15: 52, with Rev. 20: 5, 6. What power will raise the wicked one thousand years after the last day spoken of by Christ, when the righteous are raised? L. B.

Ans.—The Lord in the first text speaks of his people, and also 1 Cor. 15, from verse 23 to the end of the chapter, speaks only of the righteous. These of course are raised up by Christ as a part of the plan of redemption. Those raised in the first resurrection are raised in honor and glory, to die no more. But it is in the plan of redemption also that all men shall be restored to life, from the death they die in Adam; for every one must give an account of his deeds at the judgment-seat of Christ, whether good or bad. Nothing short of the power of God can raise any one from the dead; and the wicked are raised for this purpose, that they may stand on their own responsibility and realize that their destiny is decided by their own acts. The day when the righteous are raised is called the "last day," with reference to this dispensation and the present order of things. It is not the last day in any other sense.

228.—REPAIRERS OF THE BREACH. ISA. 58: 12-14.

Where and how will the promise made to the repairers of the breach in God's law, Isa. 58: 12, be realized: "I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth"? etc. L. B.

Ans.—Besides a promise to ride upon the high places of the earth, denoting great exaltation and honor, the scripture in question says also, "And feed thee with the heritage of Jacob, thy father." This is doubtless the same heritage to which we become heirs through Christ, by thus becoming Abraham's seed. Gal. 3: 29. And the promise is therefore to be fulfilled in the new earth.

229.—BOUND IN HEAVEN. MATT. 16: 18, 19.

We have frequently had occasion to answer correspondents on such passages as Matt. 16: 18, 19, "Whosoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," and John 20: 23, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted," etc. We find that we are not alone in the views heretofore presented, that these passages refer to special endowments conferred on the apostles, not necessarily to be transmitted to their successors. Thus the Christian

(New York) of Aug. 17, in answer to a correspondent on Matt. 16: 18, 19, says:—

"The confession which Peter had just made was the rock on which Christ said he would build his church. The keys Peter used at the day of Pentecost, when he opened the doors of the kingdom, by his sermon, to the first great influx of believers, and when he preached the first sermon to the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius. He, in common with the other apostles (see Matt. 18: 18; John 20: 23), had mysterious and miraculous powers conferred upon him, which Christ referred to as 'binding and loosing,' but there is not the slightest ground for imagining that they could transmit them to their successors."

THE OHIO CAMP-MEETING.

This meeting was held as appointed, Aug. 12-22, in the city of Cleveland. The camp was located on vacant grounds in the eastern part of the city, easily accessible by street-car, and was favored most of the time by a cooling breeze from Lake Erie, which tempered the heat and made up largely for the absence of shade trees, of which there were none on the ground. The weather was nearly perfect, with the exception of one hard rain-storm on Friday morning, which from its suddenness occasioned some slight damage. Enough people were in camp to nearly fill the new Conference tent, 80x120 ft., which had been purchased with money raised at the meeting last year. The attendance from the city was comparatively small, but with those who did come, the motive seemed to be one of interest rather than mere curiosity, and there was evidence that a deep impression was left upon the minds of many who visited the camp, from which tangible results may be expected.

In point of laborers the meeting was highly favored, there being present from outside the State, Elders Loughborough, Farnsworth, Jones, Shultz, Conradi, Wakeham, and Prof. Prescott, either all or part of the time. Elders Jones and Farnsworth especially bestowed most earnest labor to make the meeting one of spiritual profit.

The preaching was both doctrinal and practical, as indeed, all preaching must be which has for its theme the everlasting gospel of God. Elder Jones preached several discourses, calling particular attention to the nature of the gospel, as being the power of God unto salvation to every one that believes, his aim being to show the necessity for this power in the Christian life, and how it was to be obtained by each of his hearers individually. This brought in the subject of the exercise of faith in God's word,—the sufficiency of that word as a foundation for faith, and the nature of faith itself as distinguished from mere intellectual belief. To every one was brought home the questions, Have I been justified by faith? Am I a Christian? and do I know it? Have I yielded my will to God? Has God blessed me with all spiritual blessings in Christ? The gospel was presented as being "Christ in you, the hope of glory,"—Christ being in us in our earthly lives, even as God was in him in his earthly life, so that there is no room whatever for self. We are to yield our wills to God each day and hour,—let him take possession of the heart,—and then he works in us, and our lives are a manifestation of his power.

Elder Farnsworth gave two discourses in the nature of Bible readings, on the subject of God's ownership of the world and everything that it contains, bringing out the thought that in everything we should see him—in the land we till, the stock that we raise, the crops that we gather, the money that is in our purses, and even the clothes that we wear; that he who did thus see God in all these, would be much more spiritually minded than one who did not. He presented also the necessity of a deeper experience in spiritual things,—that the great difficulty in this respect was that people were so easily satisfied with little or nothing of that which God wants them to have, that those who had been justified ought to claim the promise of the gift of the Holy Ghost; for the promise was unto them, and in the great commission to his disciples the Saviour said: "And ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost has come upon you." This power is needed now no less than it was in the days of the apostles, and why is it that we do not see it? Is it not simply because we do not have the faith, do not see and believe in the power that God's word has promised to us? We cannot get more out of the word of God than we see in it.

As the spirit of faith and consecration came into the camp, there came with it the spirit of praise, the last Sabbath of the meeting being especially noticeable in this respect. About seventy-five, mostly young people, signified for the first time that they yielded themselves to God, and of these sixty-one were baptized on the following day, one other having been baptized on the preceding Friday. Much light was imparted from the word of God, and all felt that his faithful servants had brought forth from the storehouse of divine wisdom, things new and old. Will this light be treasured up and given out in the life, or will it die out and be forgotten? It is to be hoped that our brethren and sisters in Ohio and elsewhere who are so highly favored with the labors of those especially set apart for the work of instructing in spiritual things, will realize the importance of studying God's word for themselves, and of cultivating the presence of the Spirit of God which will guide them into all truth, and not get the idea that they are to be carried along the path of spiritual knowledge by others who are in advance of themselves. Now is the time to study our Bibles as we have never studied them before.

The usual Conference, tract and missionary, health and temperance, and Sabbath-school meetings were held, and also a session of the Religious Liberty Association, at which $190 was raised to further the Association work. These meetings will be mentioned in another report. L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

The Shaking of the Powers of Heaven.

In our Saviour's prophecy as recorded in Matthew and Mark, the shaking of the powers of heaven is the next event following the falling of the stars, then "the sign of the Son of man" is seen, and "all the tribes of the earth mourn," and then the Son of man is beheld in the clouds of heaven, coming with great power and glory. None of these events are designed to teach the people that his coming is near. They are the advent itself, or the events in close connection with it. They all occur at, or immediately after, human probation closes. The falling stars is therefore the last sign given in the record of the order of events preceding his coming, for the purpose of warning all who will believe that that great event is near. There is an interim of more or less length between the falling of the stars and Christ's coming, during which a message of warning will go forth to the world, proclaiming the advent near at hand. Luke states that "when these things begin to come to pass" (i. e., when the first sign is given—the darkened sun), "then look up, and lift up your heads: for your redemption draweth nigh." To a waiting church, just come forth from the great tribulation, these were blessed words of encouragement. But he adds further, in reference to all the signs given in the connection, closing with the falling stars: "When ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." Luke 21: 25-31.

Great confidence, even knowledge—perfect certainty—shall then fill their hearts, that his advent is immediately impending. And such knowledge would surely be communicated to others. These precious truths would be proclaimed to multitudes, that the day of deliverance to God's people was dawning. But of this, more will be said hereafter. The signs in the sun, moon, and stars, then, are great landmarks—guide-posts on the road to the heavenly city. They furnish a special foundation for the proclamation of the good news of the coming kingdom.

But to return to the order of events in the record: Matthew, Mark, and Luke all use the same expression in substance. "The powers of heaven shall be shaken." The word "powers" is translated from the Greek word dunamis, which is found in the New Testament about one hundred and twenty times. It is rendered "power" or powers some eighty times. It is also rendered several times "mighty works," "mighty deeds," "wonderful works;" a few times "miracles," "strength," "abundance," "virtue," etc. Greenfield defines it by a variety of meanings. First as "power; i. e., faculty, ability, strength;" "power; i. e., might, potency, strength;" "power; authority, right;" "power; i. e., efficacy, efficiency, energy"—by the figure of metonymy, "one who possesses power and authority." "power of language; i. e., sense, signification;" "a miracle; i. e., a remarkable occurrence resulting from the exercise of supernatural power"—by metonymy, "the power of working miracles;" "one who possesses the power of working miracles;" "the hosts of heaven," "the celestial bodies, stars." He cites various scriptures where he thinks these various meanings are attributed to this Greek word dunamis. It will be noticed that in the last definition given, he refers to the heavenly bodies, the stars, as the meaning of this word. The only instances in the New Testament where this meaning is attributed to it, is in the three texts occurring in our Saviour's discourse. Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:25; Luke 21:26. In view of the various uses of this word, it must be admitted that our Saviour's meaning at this distance of time is somewhat obscure to us. There has prevailed an opinion quite extensively that he meant when he declared, "The powers of heaven shall be shaken," that the sun, moon, and all the starry host would vibrate, and be violently moved in their places, or even utterly destroyed. If this was certainly the statement of the Bible, we would not question it: for the God who made all things and who spoke his word, certainly has power to shake or even annihilate the whole economy of nature if he chooses. But has he said so? We recall no such statement clearly made in Holy Writ, that the sun, moon, and starry host shall be shaken when Christ comes. These statements occurring in our Saviour's discourse seem hardly sufficient to serve as a foundation for such a grave conclusion. The ordinary meaning of the word dunamis, certainly would not warrant it. Power, might, and strength are the ordinary meaning of it. And since in no case but in these three passages does any one attribute such a meaning to it as the heavenly bodies, how can we be at all certain it has such a meaning in these instances? Looking at it merely from the standpoint of reason, we can discern none why the distant suns of other systems, or the sun, moon, and planets of our solar system, should be violently perturbed, when the Son of God should come to redeem his people or destroy the sinners of this earth, and make it the abode of the saved. We cannot suppose the sins and miseries of this little globe have affected other worlds. Why, then, should they be thrown out of their accustomed order when its Maker comes to restore it to its first and happy condition?

"According to Liddell and Scott, dunamis is not used in the classics to signify a ruling body, certainly not a solar or stellar body." These authorities give as its primary meaning, bodily and mental strength, then ability, influence, and authority.—Lexicon, p. 373. Dr. Robinson says its first meaning is physical, moral, innate, and inherent power.—Lexicon, p. 194. With these all others agree. "Dunamis is from a root which signifies ability to perform an act."—Taylor's "Great Consummation," pp. 303, 304.

Some translators have rendered the expression, "And the strength of the heavens shall be shaken." But the best way to obtain the meaning of Bible statements is to compare scripture with scripture. What do parallel scriptures say concerning the terrible shaking which will take place in connection with the second advent?

Says the prophet Haggai, some five hundred years before Christ, "I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land." Hag. 2:6.

Says St. Paul, contrasting the glories of the gospel dispensation with that of the Mosaic, "Whose voice then shook the earth: but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven. And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain. Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire." Heb. 12:26-29. What will cause this terrible shaking?

Another prophet declares, "Therefore prophesy thou against them all these words, and say unto them, The Lord shall roar from on high, and utter his voice from his holy habitation; he shall mightily roar upon his habitation; he shall give a shout, as they that tread the grapes, against all the inhabitants of the earth. A noise shall come even to the ends of the earth; for the Lord hath a controversy with the nations: he will plead with all flesh; he will give them that are wicked to the sword, saith the Lord. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Behold, evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth. And the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth: they shall not be lamented, neither gathered, nor buried; they shall be dung upon the ground." Jer. 25:30-33.

Says the prophet Joel, "The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake: but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Joel 3:15, 16.

The prophet Isaiah, after referring to the darkening of the sun and moon, declares, "I will punish the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity; and I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease, and will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible. I will make a man more precious than finegold: even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir. Therefore I will shake the heavens, and the earth shall remove out of her place, in the wrath of the Lord of hosts, and in the day of his fierce anger." Isa. 13:11-13.

We cannot doubt that each of these prophets refers to the same shaking of which our Saviour speaks when he says, "The powers of heaven shall be shaken." The language is so similar and the time when it should occur so evidently the same, that their identity is unquestionable. The voice of God in awful majesty is heard from his holy habitation on Mount Zion in the New Jerusalem above. The heavens and the earth are shaken like the reed in the tempest. Fearful commotions take place such as nature has never felt before.

RATIFYING THE ACTS OF CONGRESS.

FROM all parts of the country we hear of meetings being held to ratify the late action of Congress in closing the Columbian Exposition on Sunday. It goes without saying that all these meetings have been held in churches, and that the church people are the ones who are doing the ratifying. It strikes us as a little curious that an act of Congress can be ratified. We should have supposed that even if the "unco gude" people, as the Scotch say, should wish to express their satisfaction at what Congress has done in the matter of Sunday legislation, they would have used some other term to express their satisfaction than "ratification." They might properly meet to approve, indorse, or sanction any action that Congress might make that was in harmony with their feelings; but how could they properly ratify an act of Congress? The especial definition of "ratify," above the meaning of its synonyms, "approve" and "sanction," is "to give sanction to, as something done by an agent or servant; as, to ratify an agreement or treaty."—Webster. This is no doubt the very sense in which it is used by the church people who are holding ratification meetings all over the country. Congress is their servant,—the servant of the churches. If Congress does their bidding as their "agent," all is well; they will promptly "ratify" the act of Congress. By the same token we are to conclude that if Congress should have the temerity to pass an act giving people permission to depart somewhat from the rules laid down by the churches for "such cases made and provided," then we should hear of nullification meetings being held in the churches, and that the act of Congress, whatever it might be, not being ratified by the churches, would be a dead letter! If not, why not? If the churches have the power to ratify, why not to nullify?

But how happens the churches so suddenly to have such overweening confidence in their power that they think it devolves upon them to ratify the acts of Congress? Is not the passage of the Sunday-closing law of the Columbian Exposition at their demand? And did not Mr. Hawley plainly say in the Senate that it was not good statesmanship to refuse the demands of the churches? Therefore the churches are rising to accept the position offered them by Congress, as the suggester of suitable legislation, and as the final court of appeal which shall ratify or nullify the acts of Congress. After this, Congress is to be the power of whom the churches shall "ask whatsoever they will, and it shall be done!"

There is no question but that the popular Christians of our day and country will take all the advantages that Congress will give them, and they will use them, too, in a way to prove them to be the spiritual descendants of the self-seeking, ambitious bishops of the fourth century. The people have no rights which these religious zealots are bound to respect. This was well illustrated in a remark made by the Rev. Mr. Patton, at a meeting of the World's Fair directors. A speaker advocated the opening of the Exposition on Sunday, on the ground that the laboring men could not lose time during the week to attend, when this representative of the church most unfeelingly remarked: "So much the worse for the laboring man!"

But how about the rich men? Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton is authority for saying that the closing of the Centennial on Sunday, about which so much has been said, kept out the poor to let in the rich; for it is a known fact that American millionaires, prominent statesmen, and foreign autocrats got in at their own sweet will on Sundays, the same as other days. If the World's Fair shall be closed Sunday, doubtless the same thing will be repeated. The "rich men and the chief captains," and perhaps the clergymen will be admitted, and the laboring man on his one leisure day will be allowed to stare at the high fence surrounding the grounds, and wonder what possible good can come from such pious hypocrisy. And we, who by the sure light of prophecy know the beginning and the end of this movement to give the churches the control of legislation in this land, know that nothing but evil and only evil can come from it. The result will be persecution upon those, who, in the exercise of the rights given every man by God, and every man in this country by the letter and spirit of the American Constitution, shall dare to worship God, as his own conscience, instructed by the word of God shall approve, and not as this spiritual hierarchy shall attempt to dictate to him. When was prophecy ever fulfilled faster than it is being done now, and in our country? We need to heed the Saviour's words written for this time, "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch!"

M. E. K.

HOW THE LAW WILL BE PROCLAIMED.

DR. TALMAGE, in a late sermon preached in London, Eng., described in his usual rhetorical, imaginative style, the marching of Christian missionaries from Europe and America to conquer the world for God. After describing the various conquests of these armies, he says:—

"And crossing into Asia, the law shall again be proclaimed on Sinai, and Christ in the person of his ministers, will again preach on Olivet, and pray in Gethsemane, and exhibit his love on Calvary. And then the army will halt in front of the other wing, the twain having conquered all the earth for God."

At the first casual reading of the above, we thought that Mr. Talmage had the idea that the Lord himself would proclaim the law again on Sinai; but as the preaching of Christ also mentioned is to be accomplished "in the person of his ministers," we conclude that he thinks that the law will be proclaimed in the same way. We are sorry that this is to be so; for if the proclamation of the law is to be left to the popular ministers of this age, its rendition will vary very materially from the way it was given by God on that wonderful occasion when "Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke." We thus conclude from the way the majority of ministers, including Dr. Talmage, now render the fourth commandment. If these ministers should surround the mountain and then endeavor to proclaim the fourth commandment, as they do in their churches at home, there would be the greatest confusion of sentiment that this world has witnessed since the work on the tower of Babel was suspended. And if there would be any likelihood of their preaching the other nine commandments in the way they do the fourth, we have no idea whether we should be required to honor our own parents or some other persons, whether we should be commanded to worship Jehovah or some other God, or whether we should be told to honor God's name or Baal's. This we do not know; but this we do know: That while it is very improbable that there will ever be any special proclamation of the law again at Mount Sinai, there is to be a proclamation of the law in harmony with the "everlasting gospel" made to the world just previous to the coming of Christ; that that proclamation is now going to the world in the threefold message of Rev. 14: 6-12; and that upon the reception or rejection of this message depends the salvation or destruction of those who are living at the time of Christ's appearing. This proclamation of the law is not imaginary, but real, and it is accomplishing real work in the earth.

the words of man; it is not to be perused merely as they are; otherwise this difference will not be apparent. If we read the words of the Scriptures simply as we read any other book, they become to us only the words of an ordinary book. There must be something to give them their intended force. The Spirit of God has a part to act in all profitable Scripture reading. The word of God is the sword of the Spirit. Eph. 6:17. It is therefore wielded by the Spirit when it does its work, and without this it cannot be "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." The word of God must be approached with a realization that it is "quick [or living] and powerful," and is to be received and felt in the mind and on the heart through the agency of the Holy Spirit.

This agency is dependent upon faith in the individual's mind. Where faith is present in the mind, the Holy Spirit does its office work upon the heart; but where faith is not present, the power of the word of God is not felt; and its character is not understood, nor the truths of which it speaks discerned. The word of God did not profit the Hebrews of old in the wilderness, "not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." Heb. 4:2. No more does it profit people to-day, in whose minds it is not mixed with faith. This is why the Bible is to many only a book of literary value, inspired only as are the writings of Shakespear, or other eminent works of human origin. They see in the Bible nothing more than this, and accordingly that is all it is to them. It could not, under such circumstances, be anything more. But when faith comes, when the power of choice to believe or disbelieve God's word is exercised on the side of belief, that word is found at once to be a living word, filled with infinite power. To him who believes, the word of God is powerful, able to accomplish for him all that it promises to him (for he must believe this if he has faith). It is powerful to that end, and it is powerful in proportion to the strength of his belief. He gets out of it just what his faith finds in it.

Faith and the word of God are inseparably connected. How then can any one have true faith who takes the word of man in place of the word of God,—not necessarily in opposition to that word, but in place of it? Yet this is just what many are doing. It is what the members of the popular churches are doing, and it is what many who profess to be free from popular errors in religion are also doing. It is well to be told what the word of God contains, but it is better to study the word, and make the discovery ourselves. It is well to be told, if need be, what is in the word of God, but our belief of it is not faith until we see it in the word itself. Until then our faith rests upon the word of man; and that faith is not the kind that saves.

Every person who enters the kingdom of God must be tested. He must endure the trial of his faith, and when that trial comes, he must stand upon, and be upheld by, the word of God, or he will not endure the test. It will not do then to believe the truth because brother —, one of our denominational leaders, said it was so. He may by that time have renounced his former faith and become an advocate of other doctrines. There is no sure foundation but the word of God itself. That will stand, though heaven and earth should pass away.

"Search the Scriptures." He who uttered these words ere they had been placed in the inspired record, knew that the Scriptures would bear searching. They are the revelation of omniscient wisdom. Shall we expect, then, that there are not in them deeper things than are to be found in the products of earthly wisdom? Shall we not expect, too, that as the people of God draw nearer and nearer to the glory of the perfect eternal day, more light should shine continually upon their pathway? "Now," says the apostle, "we see through a glass, darkly;" but we are nearing the time when sight is to be undimmed. We have been accustomed to speak of "the truth," meaning thereby the distinctive doctrines of our denominational belief; but does "the truth" mean to us only the theological doctrines long ago sought out and established? Are we to get all the truth revealed in God's word, here in this abode of spiritual night, before being ushered into the light of day itself? Are we to be ushered into the realities of heaven, into the presence of Christ and the living God, with no deeper, clearer conceptions of God, his holiness and majesty, than we have now? Well might we fear, were it so, that the change would be too great to be endured.

Therefore, "search the Scriptures," for it is certain that light is to shine upon the pathway of the just "brighter and brighter unto the perfect day." Search them for the truth which is to be a "shield and buckler" (Ps. 91:4) in the time of trouble, and a sure foundation upon which to stand when every island and hill shall be moved out of their places. But cultivate the presence and seek the aid of the Spirit of truth, that the search may not be in vain; for "the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God" (1 Cor. 2:10), and the Spirit of truth is able to guide you into all truth. "He will show you things to come." John 16:13.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

The Shaking of the Powers of Heaven.

THE revelator speaks quite fully of this awful crisis, in his description of the seven last plagues, in which "is filled up the wrath of God." They are "the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture" upon those who finally reject the warning message given to the last generation of men. Rev. 14:9-12. This "wine" "without mixture" is wrath unmixed with mercy, which can never occur till probation has closed. It will be felt by the incorrigibly impenitent who reject offered salvation. The time when these "vials" of the "wrath of God" are poured out is called in many places the "day of his wrath." This "day" may very likely be a prophetic day of one year's duration. Revelation 16 contains a description of these plagues and their effects. Under the sixth, or next to the last, Christ says, "Behold, I come as a thief." Then the seventh plague is inflicted. "And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done. And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings: and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great." "And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found. And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent [over sixty pounds]: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great."

Here the voice of God is heard from his "temple in heaven," "his holy habitation," as Jeremiah states it. What that voice declares is here given: "It is done." The great scheme of human salvation from sin and its effects has now closed forever. The wicked are now being punished; the righteous are now safe, to be oppressed no more forever. The earth shakes to its inmost center. All the powers of nature give their last throb of expiring agony. The fearful hailstones fall. The whole surface of the earth is broken up, torn asunder. The "mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs." As mountains and islands are moved out of their places, what takes place in the atmospheric heavens? The same writer pictures the scene as it passed before him in prophetic vision, in chapter 6:13-17: "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places." Then the rich, great, and mighty, "hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us and hide us, from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?"

The departing of the heavens as a scroll, and the shaking of the powers of heaven are substantially the same thing; or to be more exact, one is the effect of the other. But perhaps it would be well to inquire more particularly, what is the heaven that is to be shaken?

The words "heaven" or "heavens" are used in reference to three different things in the Bible, and in common language, 1. The atmospheric; the region where the birds fly, winds blow, the blue curtain or dome over our heads, filled with life-giving air; 2. The vast regions of space in which planets, sun, moon, and fixed stars are placed; 3. The special abode of God, Christ, and the angels. All these are called "heaven."

An abundance of references may be obtained from the Scriptures of the uses of this word,—Gen. 1:20; Dan. 4:25; Gen. 1:14, 17; Ps. 8:3; Rev. 4:1, 2; 2 Cor. 12:2, 4. In the "third heaven" is "paradise," where God resides. We cannot suppose the powers of that heaven will ever be shaken. Neither would it be consistent to believe the suns and worlds lying in the vast space, billions of miles in length, depth, and height, would be shaken, when our little globe is brought to its last account. But it would be most reasonable to expect our atmospheric heaven, an envelope to the earth, an essential part of it, without which light, life, and existence of physical beings could not be seen upon it, would share in the great catastrophe of its utter desolation which will be inflicted upon it when Christ comes.

Hear the prophet Jeremiah as he beholds it in prophetic vision at this great crisis: "I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form, and void; and the heavens, and they had no light. I beheld the mountains, and, lo, they trembled, and all the hills moved lightly. . . . I beheld, and, lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger." Jer. 4:23, 26.

When the voice of God is heard announcing the close of human probation in the solemn words, "It is done," and the whole of the present order of things passes away, the blue curtain above us is rolled up like that of a spread-out ancient parchment, leaving all dismal and dark. All physical life here ceases, the "powers;" i. e., the "strength," support, ability to sustain and uphold the present order of things in the atmospheric heavens, is shaken, shattered, and passes away, so to remain until a new heavens and new earth are created at the end of one thousand years. Isa. 65:17; 66:22; 2 Pet. 3:7-13; Rev. 20:4-9; 21:1.

Peter evidently refers to this sublime and awful scene while giving a catalogue of the great events of the day of the Lord, in the quotation above referred to. From other scriptures we learn that this day of the Lord is over one thousand years long, embracing the closing events of the dispensation, the coming of Christ, and reaching to the final punishment of the wicked and the establishment of the New Jerusalem on the new earth God will re-create. "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." "Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

No doubt the major portion of this description pertains to the final punishment of the wicked in the lake of fire (see Revelation 20), at the end of the thousand years, when the earth will be finally purified, re-molded, re-created from its present materials to be the everlasting abode of the children of God. The New Jerusalem will be upon it, and Christ will reign forever in it, upon the throne of David to all eternity.

But the passing away of the heavens "with a great noise," and the destruction of the works of man may well be at the beginning of that period, when the day of the Lord comes as a thief. In the terrific convulsions consequent upon the voice of God shaking earth and atmospheric heaven, the blue dome above passes away like a scroll when it is rolled together, and the whole supporting power of that heaven is shaken, shattered, and utterly demolished. The Greek word dunamis, translated "powers," in our Saviour's prophecy, never means suns, stars, or heavenly bodies; but does mean a quality of stability, a power to sustain and uphold. Such powers are in the atmosphere. The electric power so mightily potent has its special location there, where it is often exhibited. Other powers also are connected with the atmospheric heavens. But the voice of God will shatter them.

This exegesis of the shaking of "the powers of heaven" may seem novel and fanciful to some; but to the writer it seems most consistent with the Scriptures and with the great facts of nature, and therefore more in harmony with our Saviour's meaning.

(To be continued.)

THE DAYS OF CREATION.

WE hear a good deal nowadays about the "six great cosmogonic days" of creation. This is the high-sounding term that is used to convey the idea that the six days of creation were periods of time of indefinite length,—of thousands, and perhaps millions, of years. The scientific men who hold to the theory of the formation of the earth through long geological periods, have declared again and again that there is no such thing as six geological periods, and that an attempt to reconcile the Bible account of creation with the deductions of geology is a useless and impossible task. With them, the Bible is of no authority whatever, and they are too honest to pretend to believe the Bible, while doing their best to undermine its teachings. The "cosmogonic day" preacher is not so consistent. He ostensibly stands up for the Bible, but he explains its teachings in harmony with the deductions of modern science. Of course, where the Bible and science come in contact, the Bible and not science must go. Thus these desecrators of the Bible strengthen the hands of the infidel, who is not slow to perceive the advantages he has gained, and he follows up his victory with another determined attack; and before these attacks, boastful but weak defenders of the Bible are giving way upon one point after another, surrendering, with no necessity or excuse for so doing, the strongholds of the Bible and Christianity. One of the plainest statements in the Bible is the creation of the heaven and earth in six days, and the rest from creation which God enjoyed the seventh day. There is, of course, a chance to doubt this statement; but the same chance exists for doubting any and every other fact or facts recorded in the Bible. Without faith, no part of the Bible can be believed. This is as true of the record of the creation of the earth as any other part of the Scriptures; for "through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God;" and the lack of faith is the underlying cause of doubt of any part of the contents of the Scriptures. We do not propose to examine geological claims. Geologists cannot agree among themselves, and their most tremendous conclusions are often based upon very slight premises; but we will look at the Bible record of creation, and notice to what errors any departure from the scriptural account of the creation will inevitably lead.

1. The account of the creation as it is given us in Genesis, purports to be the record of actual facts. It is recorded in a book given by especial inspiration of God to make known to the inhabitants of the world which he had created, the fact that he was their Creator; the process and time in which the world was created, and the duties, which in view of their relation to him as their Creator, they were under obligation to perform. This being the case, if we disbelieve the account, we shall believe that in the first chapter, and the first statements in that chapter of the book given by God for such a purpose, he employed language which did not convey the truth,—language well calculated to be believed in another way, and which actually has been understood contrary to truth by those who have been the most anxious to know just what the book contains and to practice what it teaches! Does not such a theory make God a deceiver, and prepare the minds of mankind to doubt other portions of the sacred volume? Most books which are confessedly full of errors do not parade them upon the first pages. But according to the "cosmogonic day" theory, God knowingly and deliberately placed a glaring and inexcusable falsehood in the first chapter of the book which was prepared by his direct and particular agency to teach mankind his character and works! We shall be slow to accept such a position at the dictum of a science "falsely so-called."

2. Those who try to harmonize the Scriptures with the "cosmogonic day" theory, claim to believe that we are now in the seventh "cosmogonic day," which has reached from the close of the sixth long period until the present time, and is to extend much further, even for ages. Let us look at the simple record in Genesis, and see what it says about the seventh day: "And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." Here we learn that on the seventh day God rested, and that he blessed and sanctified the seventh day "because that in it he had rested from all his work." Now if we are still in the seventh day, as it is claimed that we are, and God is still resting, then as the blessing and sanctification was not pronounced upon the day until after he had rested, we are forced to the absurd conclusion that God has not yet blessed and sanctified the seventh day, and will not do so until the "cosmogonic day" of rest shall be finished; and consequently that the record of the resting, blessing, and sanctification of the seventh day is altogether "too previous!" We shall also be compelled to conclude, either that the record is not trustworthy, or that those who hold to this fanciful interpretation of Genesis are wrong in their position. We are inclined to take the latter position.

The next definite reference to the institution of the Sabbath is given in the fourth commandment, about twenty-five hundred years later. At this time the same God who created the world descended upon Mount Sinai in sight of the thousands of Israel, and proclaimed his law, a part of which commands the observance of the Sabbath. The reason for this commandment is thus given: "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it." Ex. 20:11. If any meaning can be gathered from these words, we must conclude: (a) That the Sabbath day they were to keep was not only the successive seventh day from the creation, but that it was a day similar to the days of creation; for to the work and days of creation, reference is made in the commandment. (b) We would also as certainly conclude that the seventh day upon which he had rested, and which had been blessed and sanctified, was also as much in the past as any other of the six days of creation.

If this was not the idea meant to be conveyed by these words of the commandment, we have no idea what words could be used to convey that meaning. The Lord could as easily have worded the commandment to show that he was at that time resting, as that that rest was in the past, but he did not do so. We cannot believe that he falsified or deceived us the least in the matter.

We will now return to Genesis 2, and notice the work that was performed upon some of the days of the week. Fowl and fish were created upon the fifth day. If in this day the Lord made the fowl and the fish, according to this new "cosmogonic day" theory, Almighty God spent ages of time making two of each kind of fowl and fish! This is an open indorsement of the theory of evolution of the fowl and fish during this period, and prepares the way for the evolution of man from the fish or the fowl during the next, or sixth, period. During the sixth day we are told that the beasts of the field, and Adam and Eve, the crowning glory of creation, were made. If the sixth day is also a period embracing many thousands of years, then as the creation of the beasts and man fully occupied this period, we must further conclude that God was many ages creating beasts and men. This would be nothing but evolution, but the record assures us that the man was made out of the dust of the ground, not evolved from previously existing life, and that Eve was made out of a rib taken from the side of the man! This being the plain record, we must, if we believe the Bible, deny the theory of evolution; for if we believe that Adam was made of the dust of the ground, and Eve was made of one of his ribs after he had become fully grown, we cannot believe he was ages doing it, or that either of them were evolved from other forms of life. Moses, with whom God "spake face to face as a man talketh with his friend," evidently believed it as he wrote it, and we believe that a man who communed with God face to face, and who received from him a history of his creation of the earth, will be more likely to have a correct idea of it than men who commune with nature, and know nothing of the God of nature. "Let God be true, but every man a liar."

To conclude: If the theory we are considering should be adopted, it removes no difficulties, but only plunges us into doubt and uncertainty. It may place us more in harmony with what is called the "progressive thought" of the age, but it prepares our minds to enter a field of skepticism, leading directly into channels of unbelief and apostasy. It is in the direct line of the attempt now so popular to dispense with God entirely, and allow that the world and all that it contains have arisen through natural causes, extending through vast periods of duration.

"WHY STAND YE HERE ALL THE DAY IDLE?"

BY MRS. ELIZABETH ROSSER.
(Salem, Oregon.)

"Why stand ye here all the day idle?"
'Tis the Lord of the harvest-field speaks.
Who knows if thy day yet remaining
May be measured by years or by weeks?
Come, labor, ere yet the light fadeth;
Come, labor, while life doth endure!
My yoke and my burden are easy;
My wages are bounteous and sure.

"Why stand ye here all the day idle?"
The field to the harvest is white,
And thousands are sitting in darkness,
Who yet must be brought to the light.
Go thou, and proclaim the glad tidings
Far, far from thy home and thy hearth;
For this gospel of me and my kingdom
Must go to the ends of the earth.

"Why stand ye here all the day idle?"
The enemy soweth his tares;
By day and by night he is watching
To take whom he may unawares.
And many in darkness are dying,
Who into the light might have come,
To join in the song of the ransomed
In the day of the glad harvest-home.

"Why stand ye here all the day idle?"
Work while it is yet called to-day,
The branch that continues unfruitful
From the vine must be soon cut away.
But yet there remaineth a season
Ere the darkness of night settles down;
Go, win precious souls for the kingdom,
They shall shine as the stars in thy crown.

WASHINGTON.

Mt. VERNON.—This place is the county-seat of Skagit county. The village has about twelve hundred inhabitants. It is on the Skagit River, ten miles up from Puget Sound, and is fifty miles from the United States boundary on the north. We came here July 5, began meeting in the tent the 9th, and have had meetings every evening but one since. We also held day meetings on Sabbath and Sunday. The attendance has averaged about sixty-five, and the interest has increased from the first, so at the last meeting we had the largest audience.

We now leave the work here for a time, to attend the camp-meeting at Seattle, hoping soon to return. The Lord has greatly blessed his message of truth to the good of the people here. On Sabbath, Aug. 20, seven were baptized, and the presence of the Spirit was greatly manifested. The same evening three more sought the Lord by coming forward for prayers. Twelve have already come out and signified their determination to follow the Lord and keep all his commandments. We have faith that several more will also walk in the light.

But little work has been done in this part of Washington, and we hope a company may soon be organized here, from which the light may shine out through all this section. We shall probably hold meetings in the villages around Mt. Vernon, and at the same time return quite often to continue the work here.

As we are obliged to take down our tent and go to another place, we wish some faithful Bible worker might be left to help those who are so deeply interested. But the question immediately arises, "Where can such help be found?" And it remains unanswered. O, that our young people might realize what golden opportunities of working for the Master are being lost, because they are not ready to answer the calls. Get ready, get ready, dear youth, to spread the light of this glorious gospel (Matt. 24:14); for soon the night cometh when no man can work.

Pray for the work in this part of the harvest.

MASSACHUSETTS.

REHOBOTH AND WALKER.—At the close of our spring meeting, May 30, it was decided that brethren C. H. Edwards, D. W. Johnson, sister E. P. Farnsworth, and the writer and wife, should make up a tent company to go into the town of Rehoboth, as there seemed to be a providential opening for tent work in that place. It being a country town and not having had such kind of work, we ex-

But if there had been strictly a community of goods, this distinction of rich and poor would not have existed, as one would have been possessed of just as much as another. And besides, none were allowed to help themselves indiscriminately to whatever they liked, but regularly-constituted authorities distributed it to each one as circumstances might require. This seems to have been done, first, by the apostles; afterward, by seven men chosen for that purpose. Acts 6:1-4.

237.—LEST THEY SHOULD SEE. MARK 4:11, 12.

Please explain Mark 4:11, 12. The language of the text would seem to imply that the Saviour spoke in parables so that the people could not understand him, because he feared they would be converted and forgiven, and so be saved. Yet I cannot believe that this is the meaning; for the Scriptures teach that God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should be saved. W. D. P.

Ans.—The Saviour does not propose to instruct or redeem us without our co-operation. So, in teaching the people, he adopted that method which would lead them to show how much interest they had in the matter. He spoke in parables which it would require some thought and study on their part to understand, but such that the lesson could be easily perceived by any one who had the least desire to be spiritually enlightened. But they chose rather to remain in a gross and sensual condition, and to have darkness rather than light. And Christ said that he that doeth evil will not come to the light "lest his deeds should be re-proved." Matthew's record of this parable is more full. Matt. 13:13-15: "Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them." This places the responsibility with themselves, where it belongs. "Their eyes they have closed," etc.

238.—RESURRECTION OF THE WICKED.

It is claimed by some, from such texts as Ps. 49:19, Isa. 26:14, Prov. 21:16, and Jer. 51:57, that the wicked dead will never have a resurrection. What is the meaning of these passages? H. J. S.

Ans.—Isolated texts should never be interpreted to conflict with great principles uniformly taught in the Scriptures. The plan of salvation itself involves as a necessary condition that all men shall be released from the death they die in Adam, and the Scriptures everywhere teach that the wicked shall give an account of their deeds in the judgment. To do this, they must be raised to life. To rightly interpret a writer's language, we must take into account the subject he has in mind. Frequently the sacred writers refer only to the future eternal life of the righteous, and when, in such a connection, they say that the wicked shall not see life, they have reference to that kind of life only. But this does not contradict the fact that sinners will be raised to give account of their deeds, and perish in the second death. In this way we may understand such passages as John 3:36; Ps. 49:19. Isaiah in the passage cited seems to refer to the false gods of the heathen; Prov. 21:16 to a spiritual condition in this life, like Eph. 2:1, and Jer. 51:57 is simply contrasting the long sleep of death with the temporary slumber of drunkenness. See the subject of the resurrection of the unjust fully discussed in the pamphlet on that subject published at this Office.

239.—PERFECTED FOREVER. HEB. 10:14.

Will you please explain Heb. 10:14-17? Who are the sanctified? How were they made perfect? And what sins and iniquities are to be remembered no more? J. R. B.

Ans.—The offering referred to, is the offering of Christ upon the cross. In that there was provision for the forgiveness of sin and for crowning with eternal heavenly perfection all those who will give themselves to the service of God, and accept these offers of his grace. The word "sanctified" here means those who will, and do, separate themselves and consecrate themselves to the service of God. The sins and iniquities are the sins of those who will avail themselves of the provisions and privileges of the new covenant. And remission means the final putting away and blotting out of the sins of the people of God. And when that is done, his people will be forever perfected in the kingdom of God, and there will then be no more offerings for sin.

240.—GOG AND MAGOG. EZEKIEL 38.

Please give a brief explanation of Ezekiel, chapters 38 and 39, especially 39:8-16. F. P.

Ans.—Many things have been offered by the Lord to the children of men in different ages of the world, on certain conditions to be fulfilled on their part. But men not complying with the conditions, the promises were never fulfilled. The prophecy of the 38th and 39th chapters of Ezekiel, seems to be one of this nature. It was a conditional prophecy, but the conditions never having been complied with, it was never fulfilled. Under different conditions, the real design of the prophecy, that is, the end had in view, will be accomplished at the end of the thousand years, where Gog and Magog again appear, as brought to view in Rev. 20:8.

WHAT IS WANTED.

WHAT the cause of truth wants to-day is more power; and there is no doubt that it is going to have it.

Power is not argument. In the domain of morals it is not knowledge. Those who go out to proclaim the third angel's message know that it is not very difficult to get people to admit that this message is the truth. They know the difference between getting people to admit the truth, and getting them to take their stand for it. If all who admit the truth would also accept it, there would be a vast increase in the number of those now reckoned as keepers of God's commandments.

On the argumentative side there is nothing lacking. The various distinctive points of our faith have been studied and developed until they can be set forth with the utmost clearness, as truths sustained by plain and positive declarations of Scripture. And they are thus presented, and the people listen to them and admit their correctness; but they will not, save in few instances, take their stand to obey them. In a time like the present, when new discoveries, real or pretended, are daily coming to the front, and error, in the religious world, is able to make about as plausible a showing as truth, the latter needs something more than mere assertion, even though clearly scriptural, to give it force. When voices are everywhere crying, Lo, here, and lo, there, the message of truth must be something more than merely a voice among the rest. Something more than this seems necessary to convince people as to what is the will of God, for them, to-day. So it was in the days of the prophet Elijah. The people were not moved by all the words contained in the book of the law; but when fire came down out of heaven upon Elijah's sacrifice, they said with one voice, "The Lord, he is God."

Truth, in the contest with error, needs a stronger ally than argument; and it will have it. It will be allied with power,—power to work miracles, power as great as that employed in the creation of the heavens and the earth. This power will be with those who present the truth, and will be seen and felt by those who hear it. The mighty sermon preached by St. Peter on the day of Pentecost furnishes an instance of what truth thus allied can do. It was not a long sermon, nor one containing plausible arguments, but its effect was the conversion of 3,000 persons; while now, with an abundance of argument, there seems to be about 3,000 sermons to one conversion. The power of the "spirit of truth" attended Peter's sermon, and his hearers were "pricked to the heart." A plain, simple, positive assertion, so attended, is much mightier than the most logical argument alone.

What is needed, then, by those who present the truth, is not greater clearness of argument than has been yet attained, but greater power. The power will come with greater faith; but not without it. It has always existed, for it is the power of God, promised always upon condition of faith. It is ready to-day upon the same condition; and never was there a time when it was more greatly needed.

To his disciples, while on the earth, the Saviour gave power over unclean spirits, and over all manner of diseases (Luke 9:1), and just before his ascension he said: "These signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink of any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." Mark 16:17, 18. Will any one claim that this language does not include believers in this age of the world? If not, why not? Is it not just as fitting now that the preaching of the gospel should be attended with miraculous power, as it was in earlier days? Was it not in the divinely established order that such power should attend the word spoken, as a confirmation of its truth? (Verse 20.) And is not such confirming evidence needed now as much as at any previous time? No one, we think, can maintain the position that to "heal the sick" is not just as much a part of the great gospel commission as to "preach the word." If divine power does not attend the preaching of the word, it is not the gospel; for the gospel is "the power of God." Rom. 1:16. And the power of God can just as easily be manifested in healing the sick as in any other way. Whether it is the conversion of a sinner, the healing of disease, the raising of the dead, or the creation of a world, it is all the power of God, and why should one manifestation of it be any more surprising than another?

We do not see to-day the signs which confirmed the word in the days of the apostles, because men are not now "full of faith," as they were in the days of Stephen and the apostles. How many who preach the gospel to-day would not be surprised if they received the power to work miracles? How many would in the course of their duties be bitten by a deadly serpent, or take into their systems some deadly poison without, when aware of the fact, expecting to receive any harm? And how can any one expect to receive such power so long as he does not see and realize that such power exists in the word of God, that it is actually to be given to "them that believe," and has not faith enough to save him from being surprised—perhaps greatly so—if he should get it? It needs no reasoning to show that God could not carry out his plans on that principle.

But the time is coming when the message that God is giving to the world will be attended with signs and miracles to confirm it; for the word of God so declares. 2 Timothy, 3rd chapter, begins with a reference to the last days, and enumerates some of the evil characteristics that the wicked of that time would display, and says (verse 8), "Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth." Jannes and Jambres were the magicians at the court of Pharaoh, and the manner in which they withstood Moses was by working—or attempting to work—the miracles which he performed. Miracles will attend and confirm the word of truth, and the Devil will also work miracles against the truth through those who are his servants, but the testimony is that "their folly shall be made manifest unto all men, as theirs also was." The power of God will be earnestly sought, and it will be obtained; and then will the truth advance again as it did when thousands were converted in a day. L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Christ's Visible Appearing.

"AND then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Matt. 24:30, 31.

These events occur in immediate connection with the shaking of the powers of heaven already considered. "Then," or at that time, the sign of the Son of man appears in heaven. This is not a "sign" that his coming is near, but the evidence of his actual presence. We read of his ascension:—

"And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight. And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts 1:9-11.

His second coming thus takes place in the same literal manner as his ascension. Then a cloud received him so that he was invisible after being caught up, and it bore him away from their view. He comes, then, upon a cloud. This cloud in the far distance, bright and glorious, is the first thing beheld—"the sign of the Son of man" in heaven—the emblem of his actual presence. Then he is fully revealed in all his majestic glory. Is his coming actual, visible, which all can behold? It will be as visible as his ascension; for it is "in like manner." They beheld him go up into the mid-heaven, when the cloud received him from their view. He had been talking to them in a public manner. All at once he goes up into the sky from their very presence. No one would for a moment doubt that they plainly saw him. So the record declares his coming again will be just as real, just as visible, and far more glorious: "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Matt. 24:27. Can we see a flash of lightning which lights up the whole firmament of heaven? Then most certainly we can see the glory of his personal advent.

"Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." Rev. 1:7. Said the Saviour to the high priest in his mockery of a trial: "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Matt. 26:64. Human language could not be made plainer than these statements. They demonstrate his actual, visible presence. It is no spiritual coming by the preaching of truth and doing people good that is here spoken of, but his glorious revelation to an astonished world. His second coming is as real as his first advent, but far more glorious. Then he appeared, the babe of Bethlehem, the carpenter of Nazareth, the prophet of Galilee, the crucified redeemer of mankind. Now he will come in the glory of his Father, with all the holy angels with him, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. He will "come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." The Lord will consume the wicked "with the spirit of his mouth," and destroy them "with the brightness of his coming." Then will his people say, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." But the wicked will seek to hide "themselves in the dens and rocks of the mountains." They will pray to the mountains and rocks, "Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" So visible, tangible, real, and supremely glorious will be the second coming of our Lord.

But let us note some interesting particulars given by other Bible writers of this coming:—

"For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. 4:16-18.

Most certainly this is the same event of which our Saviour spoke when he comes with great power and glory. The trump of God is referred to by both, also the gathering of the elect, the sending forth of his angels, and the salvation of his people. From Paul's testimony it is evident the Lord does not at that time come down to the earth itself, but remains "in the air," where the righteous dead who are then raised (1 Cor. 15:51-54), and the living righteous, are caught up to meet him. The angels are sent forth to gather every true child of God. The graves open, and the saints which slept, awake. The wicked dead are not then raised, but lie in their graves till one thousand years later (Rev. 20:4-6), when they are raised to receive their punishment. The living wicked are all slain at the coming of Christ. (See Rev. 19:11-21; Jer. 4:19-26; 25:17-33; Isa. 13:9-12; 24:1-20, and many other scriptures.) The earth becomes an utter desolation, broken down, and a chaotic mass, the same as it was when first created, in which condition it remains one thousand years, Satan being confined in it.

But the servants of God are caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and go with him to the New Jerusalem above, where mansions have been preparing for their occupancy. They go to heaven to appear before the throne of God. They dwell there one thousand years, sitting in judgment with Christ, while the records of the lives of the wicked are being considered, and their measure of punishment decreed to be inflicted after their resurrection at the end of the one thousand years, and the judgment upon the fallen angels. John 13:36-38; 14:1-3; Matt. 5:12; 1 Cor. 4:5; 6:2, 3; Ps. 149:5-9; Rev. 15:2; 4:1-6; 19:1. At the end of that period the New Jerusalem comes down upon the earth; the wicked who have been raised to receive their decreed punishment, with Satan at their head, seek to surround and capture the holy city. But fire comes down from heaven and consumes them. Then our earth becomes one vast lake of fire, is melted, re-created, and becomes the "new earth" in which the righteous will forever dwell. Thus all sin and unrepentant sinners are put down and destroyed forever, and a clean universe is peopled by holy, happy beings, who will reign in it forevermore. Rev. 20:4-14; 21; 22.

This brief digression, in which we have merely glanced at a few leading texts, has been made to give the reader some idea of the order of events as revealed in the Bible, from Christ's visible appearing to save his people, till the final "restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." In the minds of many there is great confusion relative to these things. The truth of God upon any given subject is to be obtained by comparing and considering all the Lord has said upon that subject. Then place will be given for every statement made, and a divine harmony will be produced. Without doing this we are in danger of receiving superficial, one-sided, and inconsistent views of Bible truth. G. I. B.

(Concluded next week.)

THE GERMAN WORK AT LARGE.

A LITTLE over ten years ago the German work was just beginning in the United States, while in Europe there were but two small churches, and the only ordained German minister labored chiefly among people of another language. Europe, with as many German-speaking people as the United States have inhabitants, was thus nearly wholly unprovided for in this direction, while there was no laborer among the millions of Germans in this country and the thousands in Australia, South America, etc. But during the last decade God has wrought quite a change. There are now some twenty-five German churches in Germany, Russia, Switzerland, and Rumania, and some keeping the Sabbath in Austria,—in all, over eight hundred Sabbath-keepers and some twenty-five workers, while twice this number are in the United States, besides a number in Australia, South America, etc. We feel grateful for this, yet on the other hand, how small it appears when we consider that at the time I left Germany last month, only one ordained minister remained in a field with the same population as the United States! I must openly confess, that under the circumstances I should have preferred to remain, especially as there were favorable openings for a half-dozen workers. The only thing that assured me in leaving, was that in some way I might with God's help, increase the interest of our brethren in America for the millions in Europe, the most of whom are entirely ignorant of the last message, while at the same time the Sunday issue is ripening just as fast and as apparently as in America.

Our steamer, the "Augusta Victoria" of the Hamburg line, brought us in less than eight days safely across the waters, and we cannot but recommend these steamers highly to our people. On the voyage I made the acquaintance of a German Reformed minister from Bohemia, who improved every opportunity to talk with me on Bible subjects, and he bought several of our standard books ere we parted. Watching the emigrants, I found many perusing the tracts and papers our ship missionaries had distributed among them, and they thankfully accepted more. We surely should continue this work, and not rest until we have the proper publications in all languages.

Since Aug. 1, I have spent one week in Pennsylvania, and one in Battle Creek. From there I made a short visit to the Ohio camp-meeting, in order to meet Elder Shultz, and the last ten days have been spent in Wisconsin and Minnesota. In all these places I improved the chance of making our brethren acquainted with the needs of our work in Europe, and the Lord has added his blessings. With many the interest in the foreign mission work has been deepened, and the tears mingled with gifts from the widow's mite to ten dollars, were the best evidences of true sympathy for those who suffer banishment and privation for Christ's sake, and for those who still sit in darkness. The rich reward will surely not be lacking, for not even the drink of water will be forgotten, when our Saviour comes to reward his own.

Aug. 6-8 I spent with the church at Allentown, Pa. I had the privilege of dedicating their neat house of worship. This church was raised up seven years ago by brother J. S. Shrock and the writer. One brother gave the lot, and he with others also did considerable of the work, while others donated freely, and considerable was received from outside friends. We believe that not only the house, but also some hearts, were fully consecrated to the service of the Master. Sunday night I spoke at the German tent at Myerstown, where brethren Shrock and Krum are laboring. Some have already taken a stand, who had been praying for more light. The German work in Pennsylvania has made some progress, still we fear that there is not the proper realization of what there is to be done as yet; for in Philadelphia and other cities so little is done to encourage young men to become fitted for laborers in the work. We hope that one brother will attend Union College from there.

Sabbath, Aug. 20, I spent with the church at Milwaukee, speaking to them twice in German and English. Here several German Bible workers would find a large field. Sunday we had two well attended meetings at the German tent in Watertown, where Elder F. Westphal and others are laboring. We are glad to see that a number of German workers are being developed in this State, where the German population almost predominates. Monday and Tuesday were good days for the church at Winona; the practice of giving first-day offerings was revived, and some twenty dollars were freely donated to the foreign work. The next two days were spent to good profit with the church at Mountain Lake, and we were glad to find that their numbers had grown under the work of Elder H. Graf.

Sunday, Aug. 21, we had four services in English and German at Good Thunder, about one hundred of our people having gathered here. The Lord blessed the word spoken, and $53.91 were given with a free heart. They have here the neatest meeting hall I have seen among us, and love and harmony seem to prevail.

Here, as also in other places, I find among our German members a number of promising young people, who might be educated for the work of their Master, and supply the great lack of German workers. Some have said, Why not raise up German workers in Europe? Some are being raised up; but the work is new, and there are many obstacles which those here can hardly realize. In the first place, the children of our own people are the most promising cases, and have the best opportunities; but where the work is as new as it is in Germany, they have no chance to develop, as they do here where the work is older. Our people in Germany are poorer and earn less, and we have no school as yet, even if they should wish to send any of their children. Then again, the boys have to enter the military service in their most promising years, unless they choose the other alternative and leave, as many do. America supplies England, Australia, Scandinavia, etc., with laborers, why not the large German field also? But our German brethren, and the men of responsibilities in the churches, instead of nourishing in the young the desire of entering this work and preparing for it, are very eager to start youth's classes in the English. Thus the children learn English in the day schools and English in the Sabbath-school, and is it to be wondered at if they have a dislike to the German? I know it is much easier to carry on everything, as much as possible, in one language, but the question is not always what is easiest in the short run, but what is the most profit-erous, and helpful in every reasonable way to them and to all men. Luke 6:27-30.

4. The relation of Christians to each other. This is the highest, closest, and dearest relationship of all. "Do good unto all men," says the apostle, "especially unto them who are of the household of faith." Gal. 6:10. This makes a distinction between those of the household of faith, and others, and lays upon us special obligations with reference to those who compose that household. "Love as brethren," says another apostle (1 Pet. 3:8), implying that their love is peculiar. And Christ says, "This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." John 15:12, 13. And since to love another as one loves himself is the highest kind of love, it would seem that the "neighbor" upon whom it is to be bestowed, must be confined to the last-named class. But would not this contradict the golden rule, and the parable of the Good Samaritan?—Not at all, for there is nothing in this to prevent our acting the part of a neighbor to all around us, while we are called upon to place in the same degree of regard with ourselves, only those who act the part of a neighbor toward us.

STRONG DELUSION.

THE work of the Devil is to deceive. From the very first, he has been busy in manufacturing spiritual deceptions and fastening them upon the religious beliefs of mankind, and his work will end in a climax of delusion that will be absolutely overpowering; and sweep all into its vortex whose feet are not planted upon an immovable foundation.

The second coming of Christ will be immediately preceded by the most marvelous manifestation of satanic deception that the world has ever seen; and the question is, who will be prepared for it and escape being ensnared by it? And if we think that we will escape it, what assurance have we that we are right in thinking so? What Satan and his evil hosts are preparing for the world—how they will manifest their power to deceive men—we do not know; but we know that he is to work with "all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish." 2 Thess. 2:9, 10. This is very strong language. It indicates that the Devil will have full scope given him to carry to the uttermost limit his work of deluding the inhabitants of the earth. The world will have ranged themselves more fully on his side than ever in the past, and will be wholly given over to him. He will have full control of the minds of the wicked, to work through them in whatever way he sees fit. Then will be seen things that were never seen before, signs and "lying wonders," given in support of deadly spiritual errors. Developments will appear which are now undreamed-of. We know of many of the delusions of Satan, of the unscriptural doctrines which have long prevailed in the religious world, but let no one think that a knowledge of these will be sufficient for the time that is coming. New forms of error will spring up, new doctrines will be taught, and everything that can confuse the mind and deceive the senses, will appear in support of these errors, giving them a force which no power of intellect can withstand. We shall not know what delusions the enemy of truth will bring until we see them, and happy will those be then who can recognize the true and the false.

The world is hastening on to the great crisis, when the test will come to all upon the point of the worship of God, or the worship of the "beast" and his image. Then will come the time when fire will be made to "come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men," and other miracles wrought for the purpose of deceiving those who dwell on the earth and causing them to receive the mark of the beast and yield to the decree that will be made to compel the conscience. It will be a time of delusion such as the world never saw before. The word of God and the testimony of the spirit of prophecy have spoken explicitly upon this point.

It is time now to remember the injunction of the apostle, "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." There is just one way to escape falling, and that is to have our feet firmly planted upon the everlasting foundation of the word of God. It is the word that will be the shield and buckler of the Christian in the time that is just before us. He must have that word constantly with him, and it will point out and enable him to detect error in whatever shape it appears. But he must do as the psalmist did who said, "Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee." It is not enough to have the word of God in the hand; the time will come when it will be taken out of our hands; and what will the individual do then who has not that word in his heart? No work is of more importance now than to hide God's word in our hearts.

L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Christ's Visible Appearing.

(Concluded.)

MANY suppose that when Christ appears in the clouds of heaven, the wicked dead will be raised and at once receive their punishment. The saints will remain up in the air—or somewhere else, they know not where—till the earth is purified by fire, and then they will at once proceed to inhabit it to all eternity. Such greatly circumscribe God's revealed plans. Their scheme makes no provision for the long period of the earth's utter desolation; for the fact clearly stated that one thousand years intervene between the resurrections of the righteous and the wicked. They have no place for participation of the righteous, sitting in judgment with Christ upon wicked men and angels,—no place for the coming down of the city of God, the raising of the wicked dead, their surrounding the holy city, the final scene of executing the judgment already determined upon them in the lake of fire upon the earth, in plain view of the saints of God, which the Scriptures positively state will occur. (See Ps. 37:34; 52:5, 6; 91:8; Isa. 33:10-20; Rev. 20:4-10.) But the view we have glanced at finds a proper place for each and every statement concerning these interesting and important particulars.

The Bible order of events as given by our Saviour and other inspired writers, is as follows, commencing about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem: 1. Great persecution and tribulation upon his people, lasting for more than a thousand years. 2. At its close a great earthquake. 3. Then most remarkable darkenings of the sun and moon. 4. Most wonderful star showers. 5. The shaking of the powers of heaven at the close of the seven last plagues. 6. Christ's visible, glorious appearing in the clouds of heaven, at which point all the righteous dead will be raised, and with the righteous living he caught up with him in the air, to go to the New Jerusalem above. 7. All the wicked are slain in the plagues and at Christ's coming. 8. The earth is again reduced to its chaotic condition, as when first brought into existence. 9. It remains so one thousand years, during which period Satan and his angels are confined in it to meditate upon their doom, and the ruin their sins have wrought. 10. During this same period the righteous are with Christ in the New Jerusalem above, sitting in judgment upon the wicked dead and the fallen angels. 11. At the end of that period, Christ, with the holy city, the angels, and the righteous, come down upon the earth, where a place is prepared for the city. Zech. 14:4. The wicked are raised from the dead. Satan deceives them, making them believe they can capture it. 12. They all come up around it, when fire comes down from God and devours them. Then our earth becomes a vast lake of fire, in which Satan and his angels—and their allies, the wicked—receive their final punishment. 13. From this melted earth comes forth a re-created earth, glorious and beautiful, which the righteous, with Christ their King, will ever inherit,—the New Jerusalem its capital city,—and to all eternity they will enjoy the life that never ends.

The coming of Christ at his second advent, though a most glorious event, to which his people are to look for "comfort," joy, and the beginning of their eternal inheritance, is but a leading feature of the process of the full development of the restitution of all things. Christ's first advent was the great pivotal point in the scheme of salvation from sin and death. His second is another in bringing about the same grand consummation. It will all be completed in the six thousand years of human history.

All these events are to be literally accomplished. His first advent was a real event, as all admit. Why not his second? His miracles, teaching, temptation, crucifixion, resurrection, were all literal. When asked by his disciples of the events to occur and the signs of his coming again, he did not deceive them by fable, parables, or figures of speech; he gave a description of real events that were to occur. Were not the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of its people real events? Were not the terrible persecutions, torture, and death of the elect real also? Did not the famines, pestilences, wars, and earthquakes actually occur? Were there not real dark days, astonishing multitudes, alarming them with terror and dismay? Was not the moon made for the time being the blackness of darkness itself? Did not the stars fall, multitudes and countless millions of them? So every candid person must admit. Then will not his coming itself be just as literal as all the events he declared would precede it? Who can question it? Yes, he will come in bright glory. Every eye shall see him. His position in mid heaven, in blazing light, confounding in splendor the brightest sun, attended with innumerable hosts of shining angels, will perhaps be maintained, till the revolving earth shall bring him into full view to the inhabitants of every land, every clime, every island, and every spot on our globe. The glorified righteous raised from their dusty beds, or if alive, changed in a moment or the twinkling of an eye at the sounding of the last trumpet, shall be borne away by the angels, to the glorious presence of the Saviour they have served and longed to see. Not one humble child of God will be missing in that day. All will be remembered by that loving Saviour whose eyes of mercy have ever followed them. And what a company will that be! They have all come out of "great tribulation." Their robes have been washed in the blood of the Lamb. Some have died by being roasted at the stake, tortured to death in gloomy dungeons, starved and chilled in damp, filthy holes in stench and rottenness. Some have been smoked to death in caves, cast over precipices, torn by wild beasts, and their lives made as wretched as the inventions of men or devils could inflict.

But now their morning of triumph has dawned. That Saviour never forgets the loss of a drop of their blood, a single pain, sorrow, or tear they have shed for his dear sake. None of them will be overlooked. All shall share in that glorious reward. Not so with the wicked. Terrors seize them in that awful presence. Their sins, pride, lust, ambition; their hatred of the good, their indifference to Christ, their neglect of the needy,—all rise before them like a cloud of blackness, sinking their souls in horror and gloom. They seek to flee in terror to the covert of mountains and rocks, and would gladly be crushed from view of that awful presence.

None will question then the literal advent. Nothing ever seen can for a moment compare with it. It is the day of all days, the grandest moment ever seen. The fury of the cyclone, the blackness of the most dreadful storm, the wildest fury of the ocean tempest, the fearful shaking of earth's crust in the heaving earthquake, the flaming summit and trembling throes of Sinai's awful grandeur, the burning of the cities of the plain, the breaking up of the fountains of the great deep,—none of these can compare with the supernal glory of the coming of Christ in judgment, as described in these scriptures of truth.

When we think of the darkness and blindness of Bible expositors who apply this glorious scene to destruction of the single city of Jerusalem, eighteen centuries ago, we are lost in wonder and amazement. Think of it, dear reader! "They shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." This was the coming of a heathen, Roman general, on horseback at the head of a lot of soldiers!! Titus, "the Son of man"!! "In the clouds of heaven!"—ah, what were they? The "power and great glory,"—what was that, according to this learned (?) exposition? "And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet." This must have been sending out Roman soldiers with horns or a bugle, perhaps! "And they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." But alas, for this view, none of Christ's "elect" were at that time within sixty miles of that army. All of them had fled long before from the doomed city. "And then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn." But only the Romans and Jews were there to mourn, and surely the Romans did not mourn when they succeeded in their plans and took the city.

Never, perhaps, were seen more ridiculous, childish expositions of Scripture than such as these, applying these glorious words to the capture of that one city. Yet great names in Universalist, Unitarian, and popular theology have had their eyes so blinded by the mists of spiritualizing methods of interpretation as to put forth to the world such positions. Even Dr. Adam Clarke, the great Methodist commentator, applies the whole of Matthew 24 to the destruction of Jerusalem. Multitudes do the same, especially when seeking to head off Adventism. Indeed, as the truth is preached concerning the wonderful fulfillment of the signs of our Lord's approach, such efforts are more and more common. But the truth has nothing to fear from such efforts. We have reached the last days. The evidences become more and more convincing, as we carefully examine them. Dear reader, may this truth make us all more serious, more faithful, and more devoted to our Lord, who is soon to appear.

PRAISE.

In the 107th psalm, the writer recounts the mercies of God to his people, the special providences which had been manifested in their deliverances on land and sea are mentioned, and as the goodness of the Lord in thus caring for his children passed in review before his mind, he exclaimed, "O, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" God has manifested his goodness to all mankind, but the greater portion of mankind do not appreciate these blessings, and do not recognize them as the gifts of God. For this reason they do not praise him, and it often happens that those who have been signally blessed of God, and at the time recognized the blessing as the gift of God, afterward have allowed this vivid sense of God's care for them to be lost from their hearts, and thus God was robbed of the praise that rightly belonged to him.

God's goodness to the "children of men" has indeed been wonderful, and no people have greater reason to know and realize it, than those who live at the present time. The goodness of God to his people in past ages is just as true to-day as it was when that goodness was experienced. The salvation of Noah and his family at the time of the flood, the deliverance of the children of Israel from bondage, their passage through the sea, their march through the desert by the guiding light of the pillar of cloud and the pillar of fire, and their final triumphant entrance into the land of promise, are as true now as they were when they occurred, and call upon us for gratitude to God as truly as this was required of the direct recipients of these favors. They were the people of God then, and Christ was leading them through all their experiences, and teaching them to trust and love him. As believers in Jesus Christ, we are their spiritual successors. We should lament at their want of faith and their consequent numerous failures, and should rejoice in every exhibition of faith they manifested, and at every victory they gained by so doing. They are our examples, and we may easily see in their unbelief our own unbelief, and as we have the benefit of all their experiences, the examples of faith manifested by them should inspire faith in us, that we may realize God's goodness and give to him the glory due unto his name. We, then, can praise God for his goodness to all men,—to the race, and for the special providences and marvelous deliverances he has wrought for his people, in all the ages of the past. As we look back and see what God has done for his people, the temporal blessings he has bestowed upon them, the light he has shed upon their pathway, the especial tokens of his care they have received, the grace he has given them to withstand temptation, and to do the work he has allotted them, and the glorious hope he has set before them, which faith grasps and makes real to us even now, we may well join in the psalmist's thrice repeated exclamation, "O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works unto the children of men!"

It is certain that men do not praise the Lord enough. We read in the Bible that "praise is comely," and that "whoso offereth praise glorifieth God." The work of Christ on earth was to glorify the Father, and near the close of his work he said: "I have glorified thee on the earth. I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." To his perfect life we should look, that we may know how to "walk as he walked," that we may also glorify God "in our bodies and spirits which are God's." The way Jesus glorified the Father is expressed in the words, "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." His life was not one of idle contemplation, but it was full of labor, not labor for self, but for others' good. It was given to him to manifest to men the true character of God. In him dwelleth "all the fullness of the Godhead bodily." We may look at Jesus as he appeared on earth and see the character of our Father in heaven. Jesus, as he looked in tender sympathy upon the sin-laden, the bodily suffering, and distressed people of earth, is a perfect illustration of the feelings toward them of the "Father who seeth in secret." His work was to make men realize this. In doing this he glorified God. Gethsemane and Calvary are radiant with the glory there rendered to Him who "so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." How, then, can we better glorify God than by manifesting in our lives the same spirit. As the Father sent the Son into the world, so the Son sent his disciples into the world. As he represented the Father, so his disciples are to represent him. As surely as we dishonor him by refusing to be his servants, or by doing his work in a careless way, without love, and without heart, so surely we honor him when we take up the duties he has made incumbent upon us in love and faith, anxious to do the work he has given us to do, and looking constantly to him for that help and strength without which our best efforts would be useless.

If at any particular time in the history of the work of the Lord, God has been especially glorified, it has been because at that time there were those who with this Spirit took hold of the Master's work in faith, and with self beneath their feet, carried it resolutely and fearlessly forward to the salvation of souls, taking no glory to themselves, but yielding it all to God in grateful acknowledgment of his power, by which alone the work had been done. Such a work was done by the apostles, when they had been so entirely emptied of self that they cared nothing for personal preferment, and had but one controlling desire,—to fulfill the divine commission of their Lord to "preach the gospel to every creature," and to be his witnesses "in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." Paul was actuated by this desire to glorify God, when, looking forward to the bonds and afflictions which he knew awaited him, he exclaimed, "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God." Acts 20:24. To glorify Christ by testifying of his free grace was the object of his life. With the hope of helping others to see and accept this grace, he labored, and the thought that by his death Christ might be magnified as well as by his life (Phil. 1:20) made even death lose its terrors for him.

There have been many others in whom Christ has been revealed. Luther, standing boldly in the defense of the Scriptures to the imminent risk of his own life, that men should not receive the honor and glory due to Christ in the plan of salvation, and the great work of reformation which followed his efforts, is a noble example of honoring Christ, the results of which are seen unto the present time. And now that we have reached the closing years of time when the coming of the Master to reckon with his servants and to reward them according to their works, is just before us, with what spirit should we labor for the salvation of those who are in darkness? Should we not see the last remain of self being put away, and the desire to glorify Christ and him alone characterizing all those who take part in the solemn work of the message? Should not there be such a surrendering of all to God, that he will not fear to trust us with his Spirit as we have not yet seen it manifested, and pentecostal seasons of refreshing result therefrom? That is the way it looks to us, and we believe our hopes will be realized. Those who have carefully read the reports of our ministers and canvassers during the past season, must surely have noticed that God has been blessing the efforts of our laborers as he has not recently blessed them. There is a return to the spirit which characterized the early days of our work, and the direct result is that many are receiving the truth in the love of it. We do not believe there will be any cessation of this spiritual refreshing until the work is done. The beginning of the movement, of which our work is the successor, and of which it is a part, was the giving of the proclamation, "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come." Rev. 14:6. That message, joined by the two succeeding messages, is going to all the world. It is pointing out the danger of honoring that power which was to "think to change times and laws," and it is calling upon all to fear God and give glory to him by refusing the commandments of men, and accepting in their place the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." That this work is now nearing its completion, should give us great joy. God's praise should be in our hearts and upon our lips from this time until, upon the sea of glass, with the sweet accompaniment of the harps of God, we join in the "song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb."

THE MAINE CAMP-MEETING.

This meeting was held at Auburn, Me., Aug. 25 to Sept. 5. The location was a very favorable one, the most accessible of any to the larger number of our people in the State. It was also so near the cities of Auburn and Lewiston that it was very convenient for any who wished to attend the meeting.

This was our first visit to Maine. We have often desired to enjoy the privilege of meeting the brethren and sisters in this Conference, but the opportunity had never presented itself. We appreciated the privilege, and while we have always had a deep interest in the cause in Maine, this interest has been increased by the better acquaintance gained with the work and workers in this State.

The camp was composed of about sixty tents, while about three hundred persons were encamped on the grounds. Quite a number of our brethren attended from the city, and others secured rooms in houses near by. The meeting was the largest ever held in the State. The brethren were also unanimous in saying that it was the best they had ever enjoyed. The laborers present were Elders R. C. Porter, G. W. Caviness, G. E. Fifield, and the writer, besides the regular laborers in the Conference.

The meeting held over two Sabbaths, which gave an excellent opportunity for bringing up the different interests of the work, such as home and foreign missionary work, canvassing, and other practical subjects which are so important to our brethren everywhere. Much interest was manifested in these different phases of the work by all present, and we have no doubt that our brethren in the State, after getting a better understanding of the needs of the work, and the way in which they can assist in it, will take a still deeper interest in the different lines.

We found that few had been taking the Home Missionary. This had deprived them of much information that would have been of great benefit to them. But after their attention was called to the matter, we learned that about one hundred subscriptions were taken for this paper on the grounds. This is just an indication of how readily the brethren and sisters took hold of the different subjects presented to them.

We would say right here that our people everywhere would receive great benefit from reading the Home Missionary. Those who do not have it are losing much valuable information about the work direct concession to the churches. By that act Congress surrendered to the church, and now stands ready to do the church's bidding. The principle was laid down and acted upon that it was not wise statesmanship to go contrary to the religious sentiment of the country, and the utterances of leading church-men since that time show that they regard the action of Congress as a virtual promise to the church that their bidding would now be respected at Washington. Whatever the church can agree on so as unitedly to demand from Congress, that she can get. We see in this something vastly more than a mere "refusal of the government to spend the money collected from the people to forward certain opportunities for pleasure, of which the majority of tax-payers [!] did not approve."

The Watch Tower thinks that if a person has the liberty to worship as he pleases on the seventh day, he cannot claim that his conscience is interfered with by a law compelling him to observe the first day. This is an argument we have often seen advanced by advocates of the first-day Sabbath. Do such people think that seventh-day observers lose their consciences on the first day of the week, so that they have none to be interfered with? Does an observer of the seventh day have a conscience only on that day? or does he have his conscience through the entire week, Sunday included? We claim that our conscientious convictions continue through the entire seven days, and can be just as much interfered with on one day as on another. We believe on Sunday, just as much as on any other day, that the first day of the week ought not to be observed as the Sabbath. We do not confine our worship of God to one day of the week; and to be left free to worship him as our conscience dictates, we must be left free on all seven days of the week. And we demand the same freedom for every other person. Sunday-law sophists take notice.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Other Signs Mentioned by Our Lord.

Thus far in this series we have traced the signs and events as Jesus gave them, mainly in chronological order, from the time he spoke this prophecy till he brings to view his glorious coming in power and majesty to save his people.

But there are many other things in it which should not fail to be noticed, which are of great importance, and that must receive consideration if we would have the full benefit of this great prophecy. Among these to which he refers, we should especially notice the religious condition of the masses just before his coming, the prevalence of miracle-working false prophets and Christs, the rejection of the doctrine of his personal advent near, by the mass of his professed followers, the prevalence of false views of his coming, the work of true believers proclaiming it, their experiences and trials, the warnings and cautions Christ gives them, and other signs and wonders mentioned by our Lord, showing when the last generation is reached.

It might seem to the reader that these should have been mentioned before the personal advent of the Saviour was considered in a previous article. But our Lord himself in the discourse given in Matthew 24, follows through the regular order, giving the signs of his coming at length, and the events in connection with it, also a clear statement of his personal appearing in the clouds of heaven, and then adds special instruction to the last generation, with parables illustrating important points, closing with the final destruction of sin and sinners, and the restitution of all things at the end of the one thousand years, during which his people reign with him in heaven above, after which our earth becomes the abode of Christ and his people to all eternity. In following the order designated, it is believed that the subject can, on the whole, be made clearer to bring in these particulars between the giving of the signs and his second appearing in the clouds of heaven.

According to the evidences from our Saviour's prophecy hitherto presented in this series, we are now living long since the great signs which Jesus said should herald his coming, have been given. The great tribulation is past. The great earthquake of 1755 came as foretold, slaying its myriads. The sun has been darkened. The moon appeared as blood. The stars of heaven fell indeed as a fig-tree casts its green figs when shaken of a mighty wind. No plainer fulfillment of this prophecy so far could be given; we must be near the shaking of the powers of heaven and the glorious appearing of our Lord.

Does our Saviour in his discourse teach that any would believe his words, act out their faith, and expect him and watch for his coming when these signs had been given? Does he teach that all would so believe him as to be prepared when he should come? or does he teach there would be two classes, one surely expecting him, and many others rejecting the light concerning his appearing? What have been the facts during the time intervening between the giving of these signs and the present?

Since sin entered our world, there have always been two classes whenever God has given great light, or any great crisis in his work was imminent. It was so at the flood. It was so when Israel was called out of Egypt. It was so at Christ's first advent. It will be so at the second advent. When God gives light, it is for a purpose, and he who knows the end from the beginning, and to whom the future is as clear as the past, never brings great light and truth to the people without having some receive it. His word does not return to him void, but it always accomplishes its purpose.

Was it to be so when his second coming should be proclaimed? "Ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." 1 Thess. 5:4. "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [margin, Revised Version, he] is near, even at the door." Matt. 24:33. His disciples then living at the time when these signs are fulfilled, are commanded to believe his words. And why should not all who profess to be his followers believe this part of his teaching the same as other portions?

Luke, in giving the words of our Lord, thus records them, after speaking of the signs in the sun, moon, and the stars: "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh;" that is, when the sun was darkened. Even then the people of God were to be greatly cheered that the long night of sin was soon to close. But he adds: "So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

Note the positiveness of this language. "These things" are all the signs he has just been mentioning, the darkening of the sun, moon, and falling of the stars especially. They were to be certain his coming was very near. Are we to suppose when that time was reached, no one would pay any attention to their remarkable fulfillment? Will none be found to heed Christ's words? He commands them further: "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." He commands them: "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares." Luke 21:28, 31, 36, 34.

These words clearly imply that there will be those looking for his coming when he appears, those who heed the signs he gives, and watch for that great day. We cannot possibly watch for that of which we have no expectation. Our Lord further says: "But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Matt. 24:37-39.

The flood is used in many instances in the Bible as an illustration of the last great day. If anything is made clear by it as an illustration, it is the fact that there will then be two classes, those expecting, and those not expecting that event; while the masses will not believe it, as they did not believe it then. But some will believe. It will be as in Noah's time. While multitudes did not believe, and were swept away, Noah and his family believed, and were safely housed in the ark. He was a preacher of righteousness, he warned the world, and acted out his faith, and was saved by so doing. Then certainly Christ plainly declares a body of believers will proclaim a warning of his coming, believe it is near, and sound forth the message all through the earth. "Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing. . . . But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder [margin, off], and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Matt. 24:45-51.

Here the two classes of servants are plainly portrayed. One gives meat in due season, i. e., food which is needed for that particular juncture, that which is really required by the circumstances which exist. What kind of spiritual food do the believers need when that great day is near and hasteth greatly? Is it not that which will make them aware of the time in which they live, the nearness of their Lord's return, the necessary preparation for it, the dangers around them, and also the danger of being overcharged with the cares of life, following the example of the careless, unbelieving antediluvians, whose minds were wholly engrossed with worldly things, and thus putting off in the distance the coming of that great day? That this is so, the course of the "evil servant" makes plain. The course of the "faithful and wise servant," and that of the "evil servant," are in direct contrast. The latter says in his heart, "My lord delayeth his coming"—does not come so soon as many had expected. He therefore manifests a harsh spirit, and becomes worldly, choosing for companions those who are drunken with the cares and pleasures of this life. This evil course is in consequence of being possessed by the sentiment, "My lord delayeth his coming." In short, while he puts off the coming of the lord, "the faithful and wise servant," who is approbated by the lord, fully believes it is near, and diligently teaches this great truth to those who will hear him, believing and acting upon his faith. In the last days, then, this will be the attitude that will be acceptable to God.

And how could it be otherwise? Can we suppose for a moment that that greatest, most solemn, most momentous of all days, when the destiny of all men will be decided both for time and eternity; when Christ will come in his own glory and that of the Father, attended by every heavenly messenger who has ministered before the throne of God; when the 6,000 years of probation will close forever; when the wicked will be destroyed; when the righteous receive immortality and eternal life forevermore,—can we suppose that nobody in particular will be interested in it?

Can the true people of God, who love the Lord Jesus as the chiefest among ten thousand and the one altogether lovely, their dearest friend, their Saviour and only hope for salvation from death, be indifferent as to his coming and the bestowal of eternal life? To suppose such to be the case would be the height of folly. That a cold, formal, world-loving church might feel like putting far from their minds all thought of the day when this present world should be forever destroyed, might be possible; but those who love their Lord with all the heart, will never cherish such a sentiment.

Our Saviour then plainly teaches that when these signs are given, he will have a people on the earth who will believe his words and fully expect him soon to appear in the clouds of heaven, while multitudes will give no credence to this great truth, but imitate the world destroyed by the flood, and perish like them.

Our Saviour's words, therefore, demonstrate the development of a body of believers in his soon coming, when these important "signs" are fulfilled. The object of giving these "signs" was to bring into existence such a class. The whole purpose of our Saviour's discourse was the development of such a movement to warn the world of its coming doom, that all might be saved from ruin who would receive the warning. His purpose in giving it was of immense importance, and we cannot overlook it or treat it with indifference except at our peril. In all the great crises of the past, warnings have been given by a merciful God, and those who have heeded such warnings have been greatly blessed and benefited by so doing. So we may expect that in this most important event the world has ever seen or ever will see, especial blessings will accrue to those who accept the truths our Saviour so solemnly declares. We will next briefly notice how remarkably these intimations of our Saviour have been historically fulfilled, and how the solemn message of warning has been doing its important work in the earth from the time of the great star shower of 1833, till the present, and what we may expect in the immediate future. (To be continued.)

IS ORGANIZATION OF GOD?

It was Pope who said: "Order is heaven's first law," but it was God who smote Uzzah because David did not seek him "after the due order." 1 Chron. 15:13. When God brought Israel into the wilderness of Sinai, the first fourteen months were spent in organizing and disciplining the 600,000 who came out of Egypt, that they might move through the wilderness in perfect order. Eleven days more only brought them to Kadesh-barnea (Deut. 1:2) when, had they but trusted God at the time the ten spies brought back a discouraging report, they would have gone over and taken the land which God had promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Numbers 14; Deut. 1:2.

But there are some things connected with this arrangement in the wilderness and organization for the marching of the children of Israel, that should never be forgotten. First, the order established by God was the most perfect that could be imagined, and embraced all Israel in one general organization, while their individuality was preserved. It located each tribe around the sanctuary; it selected families to perform certain offices, and the slightest deviation from the order here established was in many instances punishable with death. Num. 4:17-20; 1 Sam. 6:12-20. Second, this order not only made selection of individuals and located them and appointed them their work, but all Israel were to acknowledge it. Num. 8:18-20; 18:6. Third, it was so minute that it extended to the form of worship, even to the sounding of the trumpet (Num. 10:1-10), and everything connected with the journeyings of Israel in the wilderness. This was not simply for their benefit in the wilderness, for it was but eleven days after they had been thus disciplined until they reached the borders of the promised land; consequently this discipline was for their benefit after they reached the land of Canaan. Fourth, this order in worship was further developed and applied to the service of God in the days of David. (See 1 Chron. 6:31-33; 23:24-32; 2 Chron. 8:14.)

"God is a God of order. Everything connected with heaven is in perfect order; subjection and perfect discipline mark the movements of the angelic host. Success can only attend order and harmonious action. God requires order and system in his work now no less than in the days of Israel. All who are working for him are to labor intelligently, not in a careless, hap-hazard manner. He would have his work done with faith and exactness, that he may place the seal of his approval upon it."—"Patriarchs and Prophets."

If the original plan of God had been carried out by his people, God himself would have been the instructor to the heads of families, and the parents would have taught their children and their grandchildren (Deut. 4:5-10); and thus from the earliest dawn of life, a mold would have been given to the character in harmony with the statutes, judgments, and commandments of God by family instruction. And had this been the case, there would have been no more necessity for the prophets' schools established by Samuel, than for the establishment of the itinerant ministry to teach from "the book of the law of the Lord" "throughout all the cities of Judah," accompanied by the princes who also taught (2 Chron. 17:7-9), which possibly bore some similarity to the institutes of the nineteenth century.

No one who has ever carefully studied this order connected with God's people anciently as soon as they were brought into the wilderness, can fail to be impressed with the fact that the nearer relation we sustain to God, the more perfect will be the order of our worship and a recognition of God's agencies in the faithful performance of that which he has committed to his people to do. It will also be noticed that it was only their having to do with sin and Satan—the only disorganized elements in the universe of God—that brought forth new developments of organization designed more closely to relate mankind to the order of heaven. It is said by Josephus that Abraham visited the Babylonians, and argued the existence of a supreme God by the perfect order and harmony that exists among the planets; and those who have watched the fowls of the heaven, even the wild geese, as they journey southward in the autumn of the year, cannot fail to recognize that their Creator planted in them an instinct of order. Even the roughest stone, as well as the most precious mineral, has its arrangement and order, and thus bears the stamp of its Creator.

There was no one thing that could impress the minds of ancient Israel more than that God was a God of order; and the true believer who worshiped God in spirit and in truth, could see in every ceremony performed in the Jewish ritual something more far reaching than the outward ceremony of order; but in learning these lessons of the spirituality of the law, it would have been the height of folly to discard the form which impressed the lesson so forcibly.

In the life and teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ we have every principle of righteousness; also the same lessons of order taught by the law are taught by Christ; for he was the concentration of all perfection, both of the law and of the prophets. Every act of his life contained as great a meaning as was contained in every ceremony in the law of Moses. Even "the napkin that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself," contains a lesson which he who has great love for Christ cannot fail to appreciate; for in the minutest acts of his life there are practical lessons of salvation that may be woven into the lives of his people. And he who fails to see this, fails to appreciate an infinite Saviour, in whom dwelleth "all the fullness of the Godhead bodily."

The great apostle to the Gentiles writes to the Corinthians, "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints." And he concludes the chapter by saying, "Let all things be done decently and in order." 1 Cor. 14:33, 40. To the Colossians he writes, "For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ. As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him." Col. 2:5, 6. The receiving of Christ by faith established in them principles of order, which the apostle joyed in beholding.

No greater mistake can be made than to think that because we are led by the Spirit of the Lord, we should discard order and system in his worship and his work. But it may be said, "We want no form but that which is brought out and developed by Christ and the disciples." No person well informed and of a sound Christian experience would ever conclude thus; for it would be as absurd a conclusion as to say that because Christ by his mighty power fed the five thousand men, besides women and children, in the wilderness with "five barley loaves and two small fishes," therefore, we should never again earn bread by the sweat of our brow; or because he healed the sick by his mighty power, we should never apply rational remedies for the preservation and recovery of health; or because the time is short, and we are to visit the islands of the sea, conclude that we do not need a vessel, because Peter walked on the water, and had we faith, we can do the same; or we should not patronize a railway train because Philip was caught away by the Spirit of God.

The principle of every righteous act and the perfection of the same was in Jesus Christ; but to draw out these principles and apply them, was the work to be done by his church, under the guidance of his holy Spirit; but all of this development would be in harmony with the principles taught in Christ's life. There were no publishing associations in the days of the apostles, such as we now have; there were no canvassers' institutes held; we read of no health institutions. They did not need them where Christ's personal presence was; but the circumstances under which the people of God have been and are placed in the nineteenth century, require them, and they have been brought into existence by the instruction of the Spirit of God, as much as was the healing of the sick when the Saviour was on the earth.

The holy Spirit was promised as an instructor to God's people. "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things." John 14:26. "The office work of the Spirit of God is to qualify men to become teachers. The holy Spirit might be given to all men to teach them, but the Lord does not work in that way. 'Ye are my witnesses,' saith the Lord. The Lord works through human agencies. God sends men and women to instruct and educate others, and to preach to the world the tidings of the gospel. Not until the work of our great High Priest is done in the heavenly sanctuary, will our work be done. The work of teaching will go on, the care of the sick will rest upon us, and institutions will be needed for the extension of the knowledge of the glorious gospel of God and our Lord Jesus Christ, until a people shall be found without spot or wrinkle or any such thing, standing blameless before heaven, and prepared for the great day of the Lord."—Late Testimony.

(Concluded next week.)

FROM AUSTRALIA.

It is a pleasure familiar to all public speakers, to speak to interested audiences, and a writer feels something of the same inspiration in penning words for the perusal of those who he knows are deeply interested in his topic. I experience this feeling each time I essay to communicate with our dear Review, though often oppressed with a sense of the meager details I have to furnish, for notwithstanding we are always making some progress in some direction, four weeks is a very short period in these brief days of midwinter.

I suppose this will seem strange to our people at home at this season of the year; for we have been reading in the telegrams of the almost insufferable heat experienced in the United States, and how ninety people died in New York of sunstroke last Friday, while the mercury marked 107° in the shade. We have had a mild winter, though the weather was quite rough during July. The thermometer has scarcely varied five degrees either way from 53° above zero for a month.

The last boat brought us brother and sister Rosseau. After remaining in Sydney five or six days, they came on to Melbourne in company with brother and sister Starr, who thus finished a six months' tour in Tasmania, New Zealand, and Sydney. They spent about a fortnight in Paramatta, near Sydney, assisting brethren Steed and Hare to close up their tent work. The results were a church of twenty-one members, with several others to be added very soon. The people who have embraced the truth are spoken of as being a very worthy class, who will honor the cause and be an assistance to the same. Efforts are being made to build a meeting-house, with fair prospects of success.

Brother Rosseau and wife seem favorably impressed with the country and prospects, and have settled down to the work before them with a good purpose to carry it forward. The hotel, or Coffee Palace, which we had in view for some time as a place for our school, was at last withdrawn by the owners. But other quite suitable buildings very centrally located, were secured at a much more favorable rental. These consist of a double house, containing twenty-three rooms, several of them of large size. The place is in the midst of park lands, very open, yet near the center of the city, and presents an excellent opportunity for prosecuting work of the various lines of missionary labor, should there be time for such.

Brethren White, Starr, and Daniells are assisting in the work of furnishing and fitting up the house, and it is expected that the term will open Aug. 24. Just what the attendance will be is not known, but we expect it will be small, possibly about twenty-of all States for expressions of opinion on the question of opening the World's Fair on Sunday. These are but sample instances. And as the combat deepens, they are likely to become more and more numerous.

Do not plead the excuse that you cannot write anything for publication, that such work is not in your line, etc. It is in your line, and in the proper line of work of every person who knows the truth, to give his light to others; and no better opportunity can be had than through the papers that are circulated everywhere among their thousands of readers. It requires no great ability as a writer, no gift of eloquence or power of rhetoric, to answer the ignorant and absurd utterances that are now so frequently made—generally from the orthodox pulpit—regarding the Sabbath, and the various issues that pertain to it, especially Sunday-closing of the World's Fair. What it does require is a knowledge of the truth, an ability to tell what you know, and a fair knowledge of spelling, punctuation, and the use of capitals. The first, every Seventh-day Adventist is supposed to have; and what excuse can any one plead in this age of enlightenment, this land of cheap text-books and free common schools, for not possessing the others? If any adult Seventh-day Adventist is lacking in these respects, he must have a peculiar idea of what constitutes his duty as a Christian.

It is the duty of every Christian to be able to give a reason to every man that asketh of the hope that is in him. (See 1 Pet. 3:15.) He should be able to do this in an intelligent and convincing manner. No Sabbath-keeper in this age of the world, unless he can do this, will be prepared for the experience that is before him; for has not the testimony from God expressly stated that Seventh-day Adventists would in the near future be called before assemblies and men of intellect and education to answer in defense of their faith? How do you know that this experience will not be yours? And this was spoken to our people to impress upon them the importance of becoming students of God's word; for although God designs to speak through his followers upon such occasions, so that they need not take thought of that which they shall say, he is to do this by calling to remembrance in their minds that which they have already learned. His Spirit will indicate to them the proper choice that they are to make from the stock of knowledge that they have, not impart to them knowledge that they never possessed.

Therefore we may urge upon our people that they become prepared to speak at any time in defense of the truth, and that they search out and improve opportunities of speaking through the columns of the press. This is one of the best mediums through which we can do missionary work. It is to many minds the one avenue which prejudice has not closed. The combat is growing deeper, the agitation more intense; and the truth will have none too many representatives in the great controversy, if every one who believes it, stands ready to raise his voice in its defense. OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

The Warning Message of the Last Days.

PROPHECY is history in advance. History is prophecy fulfilled. It is wonderful how the predictions of prophecy are interlocked with the facts of divine providence. When God foretells great events to occur in which human agency acts a part, we always find the agents ready and prepared when the events occur. So it was when the great signs foretold by our Lord were hung out in the heavens to alarm, and for a season, daze the people of our earth, proclaiming to all its inhabitants that the last days had come.

God had agents all prepared by long study of these prophecies and a full preparation of heart, to enter at once upon the work assigned them. For quite a period many eminent men in this country and in the Old World, had been deeply interested in the study of the prophecies.

If any will take the trouble carefully to study the writings of Luther and Bengel in Germany, Irving in Scotland, and Wesley in England, they will find that these writings contain views founded on the prophecies, that in this period of the world the coming of the Lord may be expected. During the last century the prophecies were explained, and great light shed upon them by many eminent men.

But what is far more remarkable and definite, as having an important bearing on this question, is the existence, rise, and progress of the great advent movement of the last half century, first proclaimed by William Miller in this country. He was a man of marked ability and excellent character; he was modest and upright, a well-read historian, one who had served his country as a captain in the war of 1812; and while in comfortable circumstances, his mind was led to the study of the prophecies, and he became deeply interested in them. He became satisfied that we were not only in the last days, but that the close of the great prophetic period of 2300 days of Dan. 8:14 was to be expected in 1843-44. Profoundly convinced that the grandest events foretold in the Bible were imminent, and that a careless world, lying in wickedness and pleasure ought to be warned of these truths, and pressed by the Spirit of God to enter upon this work of sounding the alarm, but feeling modest and doubtful of his own ability to do such a solemn work, he at last began to preach the message of warning in 1833, the very year when that grand sign of the falling stars occurred. Such was the power of conviction attending his preaching, that it was but a short time before more calls than he could fill came in from many directions.

Believers soon began to multiply, and other laborers arose to assist in proclaiming this great truth. J. V. Himes, a Christian minister of Boston, embraced the doctrine and began to publish the Advent Herald; and by means of the press, it was thus disseminated far and wide. Laborers and papers multiplied; believers increased, till within ten or eleven years, there were 50,000 Adventists in America alone. Books, tracts, and papers, were largely printed, and sent on ships to every missionary station on the face of the globe.

We present a few extracts, showing the extent of this work in 1833-1844, by those who acted a prominent part in it. J. Litch, in his lecture on Matthew 24, published in the Advent Herald of Nov. 23, 1850, says:—

"Joseph Wolfe has visited and proclaimed the gospel of the kingdom in the four quarters of the globe, to Protestants, Catholics, Mohammedans, Jews, and pagans. The great American movement on this subject, and the diffusion of information with regard to it within the last ten years, is too well known to need extended remarks in this place. Neither labor nor sacrifice was regarded in the wide and rapid extension of the good news of the kingdom, as far as the English language could make it known. It was sent to the four quarters of the globe and to the islands of the sea, upon the wings of the winds."

E. R. Pinney, in his Exposition of Matthew 24, published in 1848, says:—

"As early as 1842, second advent publications had been sent to every missionary station in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America both sides of the Rocky Mountains. We find this doctrine in Tartary about twenty-five years ago, and the time for the coming of Christ to be in 1844. This fact is obtained from an Irish missionary in Tartary, to whom the question was put by a Tartar priest, when Christ would come the second time. And he made answer that he knew nothing at all about it. The Tartar priest expressed great surprise at such an answer from a missionary who had come to teach them the doctrines of the Bible, and remarked that 'he thought everybody might know that who had a Bible.' The Tartar priest then gave his views, stating that Christ, he thought, would come about 1844. The missionary wrote home a statement of the facts, which was published in the Irish Magazine in 1821. The commanders of our vessels and the sailors tell us they touch at no point where they find this proclamation has not preceded them, and frequent inquiries respecting it are made of them."

The Signs of the Times for Feb. 14, 1844, says:—

"A brother of the captain of a vessel now in England, writes his friends that his vessel lay at Newport, in Wales, forty days, on account of storms, during which time a continual concourse of individuals thronged him, to inquire about the coming of the Lord, having heard that he was an Adventist. Among these were ministers and laymen who received the truth gladly, and embraced it with all their hearts."

According to F. G. Brown, a prominent Adventist laborer, speaking of Elder R. Hutchinson and of his Voice of Elijah, says:—

"He has forwarded them to the Canadas, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, New Foundland, England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, Germany, Constantinople, Rome," etc., etc. One thousand five hundred copies were sent to Europe every fortnight for five months."

Some three hundred ministers in America proclaimed the advent doctrine at that period, and it is said hundreds more in the Old World did the same. The advent proclamation went forth with mighty power, and stirred the world at that time as few other movements have ever done, till the time passed in 1844. All classes of people were moved by it. Hundreds of skeptics that no other doctrine could reach, were convinced of the inspiration of the Bible by the clear fulfillments of prophecy as explained by the ministers in the gospel field. Most remarkable cases of authentic instances are on record with the names of the persons, dates, etc., vouched for by many witnesses, of children being moved upon in a miraculous manner to proclaim the coming of the Lord in countries where liberty to preach this doctrine was denied, and persons of mature age would have been arrested. Several instances of this kind have been vouched for in Sweden, Germany, and other countries to the writer's personal knowledge. Large numbers came to hear them, and were astonished and deeply affected by what they saw and heard. If ever a movement gave evidence of being blessed by the Spirit of God, this one did.

We now raise a point of deep interest: Did those who were leading out in this movement claim to be fulfilling prophecy in proclaiming the coming of the Lord as they did? Does the Bible present predictions of such a work to be done in the last days? Does it emphasize and make of vast importance such a work? Does it teach that the last days will be characterized by a special warning message, as was the world before the flood, the people at the destruction of Jerusalem and Nineveh, and other calamities in which the interests of God's people were greatly affected? These are important questions. Says Joel, "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand." Joel 2:1. "The day of the Lord" embraces the second advent of Christ. 1 Thess. 4:16, 17; 5:1-4. Blowing the trumpet always implies a warning of danger. It is a signal for preparation for a great crisis. Says our Saviour: "But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Noah warned the world, being a preacher of righteousness. Jonah warned Nineveh of its coming doom. So our Lord teaches it will be in the last days. John the Baptist announced Christ's first advent. Jeremiah pleaded with the people, and plainly predicted the destruction of Jerusalem. These and other instances must be familiar to the reader. Warning those in danger of ruin has always been God's plan. It is alone consistent with his infinite love and mercy.

What special message did Adventists in 1843-44, claim to be fulfilling, which is yet considered by them the last great religious movement to be proclaimed before Christ comes? The threefold warning message of Rev. 14:6-14 is second to none in importance revealed to us in the Scriptures. There is no escaping the conclusion that this is a last-day message. It is really one great movement made up of three leading subjects, yet so combined, connected, and dovetailed together that they cannot be really separated. To take either out would go far to destroy the whole. G. I. B.

IS ORGANIZATION OF GOD?

(Concluded.)

WE as a people did not follow cunningly devised fables when we left spiritual Egypt some fifty years ago, and expected to enter Canaan at the end of the 2300 days, which terminated in 1844. It is true that the Lord did not come, the Scriptures did not say he would come; but we were brought to the great day of investigative judgment. All was accomplished that the Scriptures said would be accomplished at that time, and the disappointment was no more than the disappointment to the early disciples, when He who they believed would deliver Israel was taken by wicked hands and slain.

Had the people of God moved forward from that time, as God would have had them, they would have entered heaven long before this, as surely as Israel would have entered Canaan when they reached Kadesh-barnea, had they not listened to the evil report of the ten spies. Had this been the case, there would have been no schools, as we now have them, no health institutions, as we now have them, no organizations to carry on the different phases of the work as they now exist; but by his providence and his holy Spirit, God has in this way taught his people lessons by experience, that they would not learn directly from his hand without murmuring and complaining. Those who read these lines, who had an experience in the early history of this work, know very well the battle that was fought over organization, not only church organization, but the organization of the Publishing Association. Articles were written in the REVIEW AND HERALD, saying that it was altogether unnecessary to have any legal corporate bodies to hold the institutions now located at Battle Creek. The Scriptures gave no authority for any such move, and even the name "Seventh-day Adventist" was outside of the Bible. At each of these advance steps, the only parallel to the course pursued by some, was the course of Israel in their sin of presumption, after God said: "Your carcasses shall fall in the wilderness," "and your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years."

It was the earnest pleading of Elder James White, backed up by the testimony of the Spirit of God, with long-continued sacrifices known only to God, that brought about that organization that exists to-day, as well as the organization of the health institutions, of which the Bible in particular says nothing. Sabbath-school organizations for the benefit of the children in our churches came into existence, simply because the children had not received and did not receive the instruction which they should from their parents; but experience has proved these organizations to be a great success in accomplishing the purpose of God in the earth. To unite individual interests, these organizations should not only be local, but they should be of a nature that these local organizations would blend in one common interest. This has been the character of all scriptural organizations which have existed for the benefit of the people of God; and this principle has been indorsed by the Spirit of God from the beginning of this work.

"Now in the gathering time, when God has set his hand to gather his people, efforts to spread the truth will have the designed effect, and all should be zealous and united in the work. I saw that a paper was needed, and all should feel interested in it." (From a testimony given in 1850.)

Thus the Spirit of God, in harmony with sound sense and the necessities which grew out of circumstances in the nineteenth century, instructed God's people in regard to the publishing of the first paper, of which nothing in particular is said in the gospel. And yet, "all should feel interested in it." We do read that the gospel shall be preached in all the world for a witness, and then the end will come. The particular agency of the printing-press is not mentioned; for God deals with his people, and leads them as men endowed with a degree of the intelligence which he has imparted. Therefore to abolish these agencies because they are not particularly mentioned in the Scriptures, would be fanaticism. Any organized agencies which contribute to the establishment of God's truth in the earth, are as much under the direction of his Spirit as any plans of which we read in the Bible. In a testimony of April 6, 1892, we read:—

"How much more is needed, how much wise, well-planned efforts to send the truth by publications and the living preacher. Many, we are happy to say, are doing much in opening new fields, broadening the work in every direction."

Counseling together has been the advice of the Spirit of God for years. There never was a period fraught with greater danger than now. There never was a time when men who are sincere and devoted to the interests of the work of God are in such danger of being thrown off the track by Satan, even while they are earnestly engaged in seeking more faith, and in exercising it for others. Unless they keep their eyes upon Christ, and draw from his life every practical duty therein taught, they will be led into extremes, both in precept and action. The enemy is on the watch to lead individuals to an exhibition of this very phase of fanaticism.

God will never abolish these various agencies that he has brought into existence for the accomplishment of his purposes in the earth. This is not God's plan. He has brought into existence certain organizations, and has placed men in responsible positions in connection with these organizations for the accomplishment of certain works; and every agency is to be quickened, that the great work may be accomplished, and we must work with an intensity that we have never felt before. No man can leave his post of duty without betraying sacred trusts, without endangering his own soul and the salvation of others. Yet it would be a great mistake to trust in organizations to save us; the power and excellency are all in our Lord Jesus Christ.

We need organizations to instruct the youth in our churches. We need organizations that will contribute toward sending the truth into foreign lands; and let none think that the time has come to go beyond these organizations and arrangements which God has sanctioned by his holy Spirit.

"When the Lord shall bid us lay off the armor and make no further effort to establish schools [including Sabbath-schools], to build institutions for the care of the sick, for the shelter of the orphans, the homeless, and for the comfort of the worn-out ministers, it will be time to fold our hands and let the Lord close up the work; but now is our opportunity to show our zeal for God, our love for humanity."

We are having to do with the world, with the disorganizing element made by sin. We are in a time when Satan is stirring every agency within his power to thwart and destroy God's work, and God forbid that we as a people should lend our influence in any way to open avenues for Satan to come in, by encouraging the work of Satan in teaching or practice, in destroying agencies which God has established.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

SINCE my last letter to the REVIEW, we have had the pleasure of seeing our Australian Bible school opened and well started upon its career. The opening day was Aug. 24, when quite a large company of friends gathered, and participated in appropriate exercises led by Elder Daniells. They consisted mainly of short addresses by sister White, Elders White, Starr, Rousseau, and the writer. As stated before, the building used consists of two houses, or rather, one double house. The room in which we convened was about 35 x 20 feet, fitted with a platform and organ, and seated with chairs. This room is formed by opening folding doors. In the other house the same rooms are used for reception and dining-rooms. Besides these, on the ground floor there are two kitchens, two laundries, and a class room 30 x 18 feet, built for theatrical use by a former tenant. In the second story in front there are two large rooms 24 x 18 feet, which are utilized for study-rooms. Besides these general rooms there are bath-rooms and sleeping apartments for thirty persons. The attendance at the opening was twenty-five students of all classes, just about the number that we had been led to anticipate. A few others are contemplating joining the school during this term. We have good reason to expect that the next term, to be held near the beginning of the year and with sufficient notice, will be more favorable for an attendance than the present one. The school is especially appreciated by those who have had a few months' experience in the work, and now see their needs more distinctly than before. The most of those in attendance are of this class.

Elder Starr has been earnestly invited to engage in a course of labor for the church in Melbourne, in connection with his Bible work in the school. We have reason to believe that this will be productive of good. There is here, as elsewhere, a tendency to relapse into indifference, even though there is the most urgent need for activity. The church needs help in this direction, and also in the line of practical instruction in work and doctrine. Besides, there are a goodly number of those around us who have become interested to learn about the truth, and even with the very little work that has been done, some are continually accepting it. Several have begun to observe the Sabbath in Melbourne within the last few weeks.

Brethren Steed and Hare at Paramatta, near Sydney, are still holding their interest. After seventeen weeks in a tent they retired to a hall. Brother Starr was with them and organized a church of twenty-two members, about a month ago. There is now a membership of thirty-six, and several more to be admitted soon. Brother Baker has just finished a successful visit to the churches in Tasmania, and entered the school, where he will, while assisting in the instruction, avail himself of the opportunity to pursue some studies.

The opening of the school will for a time affect the work in the field to some extent. There are no ministers there now except those at Paramatta, though it is probable that brother Daniells will spend some of his time among the churches. But those canvassers who are at work seem to be doing very well, in spite of the prevailing hard times. And there are silent influences at work almost everywhere that are drawing people toward the truth of God. A letter just received from a lady in an interior town states that she had purchased a copy of "Great Controversy," but for some time was deterred from reading it, by the advice of her pastor, who warned her that the book was a dangerous one. Another of our canvassers called upon her and quieted her fears, so that she read the book, loved it, learned to love the truth, and is praying for the way to open for her to walk fully therein. She subscribed for the Bible Echo, and induced her neighbor to do so, and is now working to spread the truth.

We watch with the deepest interest the progress of events in America, and realize that all over the world they are tending in the same direction. The troublous times into which we have fallen when nature, society, and politics seem shaken to their foundations, cause all men to feel that we are on the eve of some great event. The Christian Commonwealth, a leading London religious paper, says:—

"If wars, rumors of wars, volcanic eruptions, avalanches, earthquakes, and general upheaval in the moral, political, religious, and physical realms are indications of the near approach of a new era, then there can be little doubt that we are not very far from the fulfillment of some startling prophecies."

He who has hope only in this life, certainly has not a very assuring prospect for the future; but those who have their eyes upon the fast fulfilling prophecies and the reward which lies beyond these scenes of turmoil, may with calmness await the issue.

I have just received a letter from Dr. Martha A. Sheldon, in charge of the Deaconess' Home at Muttara, India, a training school for missionary workers, from which I take the liberty to extract the following:—

"Your valuable and esteemed paper [the Bible Echo] was sent me by some Baptist friends whom I entertained at the Home. They were missionaries to India from Australia. In our Deaconess' Home we have a large circle of readers, and your paper is most acceptable. After reading it here, I send it out to some of our native Christians who read English. It is a handsome, clearly printed, clean thought, inspiring paper. Whether it would be easy to obtain subscribers in India, I know not. There is a painful lack of good literature in many homes. I should think that it would be good missionary work to try to circulate your paper in India; and I, for one, should be most happy to forward your efforts."

"We have here a training school for workers, and a boarding school with thirty-five pupils, girls, zenana and medical missionary work. So we are all pretty busy."

"Thanking you for your interest in our work and for your generous offer to send us some reading-matter, which would be gratefully received, I remain,—

"Yours in the common warfare."

Thus does the hand of providence appear to be opening the doors for our workers, even before we are ready. I cannot help thinking how exactly our young medical students and nurses are adapted to step in and assist in such a noble and philanthropic work. And again, how vast is the work before us.

The sun appears to be once more approaching these southern latitudes, and as the dampness of winter gives place to the genial warmth of spring, it is gratifying to be able to report that sister White's health shows signs of improvement. Still it is not satisfactory, but we all anticipate the time when she will be able to labor for the people; and upon their part there is a general anxiety that the time may quickly come.

MAN'S DAY AND GOD'S DAY.

THE Executive Committee of the national celebration of "Columbus day," Oct. 21, has addressed an open letter to the ministers of America, requesting co-operation in its observance, suggesting that Oct. 16, the Sunday preceding "Columbus day," be observed as "Columbian Sunday." We have no fault to find with this suggestion, but refer to it as an illustration of the inherent difference between the day man has chosen and ordained to be a Sabbath, and the day which God has set apart as his own, and which he calls "my holy day." Isa. 58:13. Sunday—the man-made Sabbath—can become "Columbus Sunday" or anything that man, its originator, may choose to make it; but the seventh day—the Sabbath which God made—can never be anything else than "the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." That day must always be observed with reference to God alone; but the theme of thought and discourse for Sunday may be anything, from Columbus and his discovery to that of the duties of municipal office holders. Between the two there is all the difference in the world.

L. A. S.

the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left," but by the might and power of the civil law. Thus ministers, leaving their exalted calling to preach the gospel, spend their nights skulking through the streets of our cities, going into questionable places—not to present the gospel, and beseech men and women to be reconciled to God, but to secure evidence for their arrest and imprisonment, and then they regale their churches on Sunday with the disgusting details of their work. This they consider to be gospel work and the way to bring about a reign of righteousness in the earth! Such ministers show by their actions that their dependence is in an arm of flesh, and that the gospel is an unknown thing to them. We cannot change their methods, but we can cling to the gospel, even the "everlasting gospel," which changes not, which is as powerful now as it ever was, and which in the especial form of the "gospel of the kingdom" is now being proclaimed to the world "as a witness to all nations." In this gospel we rejoice, and in its power we triumph over the evils of human nature. "Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

EASTERN MEETINGS.

THE New England Conference was held at South Lancaster, Mass., Oct. 4-11. The attendance was large, and the interest good. New England has not held any camp-meeting the past season, so this was the time of a general gathering from all parts of the Conference. There were also present Elder J. B. Goodrich from Maine, Elder S. H. Lane from New York, and Elder H. E. Robinson from the Atlantic Conference. These brethren were present in behalf of the school interests in the district, and their attendance added much to the interest of the occasion.

The meeting had been in progress several days on our arrival, Friday, Oct. 7. The business proceedings passed off with the greatest harmony. We noted with interest the spirit of courage and confidence that seemed to be possessed by all present. The encouraging outlook for the South Lancaster Academy was a source of much rejoicing. One year ago it was decided to invite the other Conferences in Dist. No. 1, to share the indebtedness and responsibility of the Academy with the New England Conference, and to make it more of a district school than it had been in the past. This idea was received with favor. All the Conferences in the district have taken hold with a good will, and as a result, the future prospects for the school are very encouraging indeed. The attendance this year is large, and the faith and courage of its friends were never stronger.

The Lord gave much freedom in the preaching, which was very practical and calculated to instruct in the things of God, and to open the understanding more fully to the importance of the time in which we are living and the things that are soon to come upon the earth. All seemed to be greatly profited by the consideration of these themes. We never saw the brethren in New England of better courage in the Lord than at this time. One very interesting feature of the meeting was the presence of several from different places, who, mostly through reading, had recently come to the faith. May the Lord continue to bless the work in the New England Conference.

On Wednesday morning, Oct. 12, in company with Elder R. C. Porter, we boarded the steamer "Cumberland," of the International Line, for St. John, New Brunswick; thence we went by rail to Moncton, New Brunswick, the place appointed for a general meeting for the province. Elders H. W. Cottrell and R. S. Webber, who are laboring in the Maritime Provinces, were both there. During the past season they have been conducting a tent-meeting on Prince Edward Island. They had an excellent hearing, and some good souls have taken hold of the truth of God.

While the attendance at the meeting at Moncton was not large, there being only a little more than a hundred Sabbath-keepers in the province, still we had representatives from the different companies, and we were very favorably impressed with the appearance of all who attended the meeting. This was our first visit to this province, and our stay was very limited; but I am sure we shall now have a better understanding of the work there, and feel a still deeper interest in its progress.

On account of railroad trains not running Sunday night, we had to cut our visit short one day; but Elder Porter remained to continue the meetings two days longer. From our observation, these provinces seem to be an excellent field for labor. While the people may not decide so quickly as they do in some other places, we are sure that when they do move out, they will do so understandingly and with a fixed purpose to be faithful. If the laborers live near to God and hold up Christ in their preaching, and all do their duty faithfully, God will be with them, and his cause will prosper in their field.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

This Gospel of the Kingdom.

"AND this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Matt. 24:14.

The preaching of this "gospel of the kingdom," then, to the ends of the earth, is itself a mighty sign of the end. "Then shall the end come." When the message is thus proclaimed; i. e., at that time (which is the meaning of the word "then" and of the Greek term, as well), "the end" "shall come." What is "the end," of which he is speaking? This term is used at least four times in this discourse. In every instance it has reference to the question asked by his disciples, "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Christ's coming and the end of the world occur at the same time. These times really embrace the same events. It is the end of the world, the oikoumenē, habitable earth, world, or by metonymy, the inhabitants of the earth.—Greenfield.

Some would have it the end of the age, though this is not the term used. But in that case it would be the gospel, or Christian, age, which would bring the close of probation, or what is really the same thing as the other. In short, when "this gospel of the kingdom" is fully preached in the sense our Saviour intended by that expression, to all the world for a witness or testimony to them, probation will end; there will be no longer a mediator between God and the sinner; this present world as now inhabited will cease to be; Christ will come in his glory, and forever close up human affairs as now constituted, gather his people together in one, and utterly destroy sinners from off the earth. The language is definite, clear, direct, and emphatic. The end will come at the time, then, whenever "this gospel of the kingdom" has gone over the whole globe, and been preached to all the world.

The language and connection and parallel scriptures utterly forbid us to suppose the preaching of it will convert all the world; for the Saviour plainly tells us in this discourse that when that "end" does come, it will be as it was in Noah's time, a multitude will wail and perish; "the tribes of the earth" will "mourn," the mass of mankind will be corrupt, like the carcass which the vulture swoops down upon to devour, and the evil servant will be cut off and have his place with "weeping and gnashing of teeth." Verses 28, 30, 38, 51. The preaching of "this gospel of the kingdom" then fails, wonderfully fails, to convert everybody, and bring a millennium of glory here upon earth with all saved and happy. The great masses are lost, and cry for rocks and mountains to fall upon them and hide them from the face of Him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath comes when "the end" is reached. Rev. 6:16, 17.

Why, then, is it so important that "this gospel of the kingdom" should be preached to all the world just before the end comes?—Because it is preached "for a witness." (Greek, marturion, literally a testimony, so translated in many versions, and so the word is generally rendered in the common version.) When the great day of God's wrath comes, it will be such a day of anguish and horror as the world has never seen. It will affect all men, in every nation and tribe on our globe. All will be interested; all will be either saved or lost. That great day will bring an experience far different from ordinary life, sickness, and death, surrounded by friends, with gradual loss of sensibility and consciousness. It will be a day of utter ruin, hopeless despair, anguish of soul, remorse, and woes without number to all with no hope in Christ.

It would be inconsistent with the character of a merciful God, a being of justice, love, and pity, to bring such evils upon those who never had a warning of them, and no opportunity to accept Christ. Hence, "this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in the whole world [margin, inhabited earth], for a testimony unto all the nations; and then shall the end come." Revised Version. None will be able then to rise up amid the horrors of that day of doom, and say they had no chance to know of this dire calamity, this fearful ruin. On the contrary, they will know full well that they were warned of these dangers, and scoffed at the warning, and counted those who preached it as cranks, simpletons, credulous fanatics, and wholly unworthy of credit. They would not believe the "testimony" they bore; and now, alas, they find it true. This will add to their sense of guilt, and fill their souls with anguish.

The preaching of "this gospel of the kingdom" to the whole world as a "testimony" or "witness" to the nations is a matter of vast importance, which perhaps none of us have fully comprehended. In every legal court where important matters are decided, the testimony of the witnesses presents the evidence which condemns or acquits. The testimony is the principal thing upon which all important results must turn. The ten commandments, or the law of God, were called the "testimony." Ex. 25:16. Hence, the tables of stone and the ark in which they were placed, were often called respectively, "the tables" and the "ark of the testimony." Why were these commandments so called?—Because their purity, their truthfulness, their inherent value, their exalted character, strongly testified that none but God could be their author, and they bore witness to his deep love for the race, and gave the strongest evidence of his desire for their prosperity and eternal good. To all right-thinking people they bear the marks of divinity.

So the proclamation of "this gospel of the kingdom" to all the world in the last days, is in the highest degree an evidence of the Saviour's love for the race and his desire to save them from the terrible day of wrath about to burst upon the world. It will leave a wicked world wholly without excuse. All right-thinking people will be compelled by the facts to admit that the Lord could now do no more for the race. When by his providence and the efforts of his faithful servants through whom he has wrought, and whom he has impressed, upheld, acknowledged, and inspired, "this gospel of the kingdom" has overcome the great obstacles in the way, and gone through the whole earth presenting its burden of hope, joy, and eternal salvation to all, both rich and poor, free and bond, ignorant and intelligent, offering them pardon and everlasting bliss on the honorable and easy terms of the glad tidings of great joy, what more could the Lord of glory do for them, consistently with the heavenly plan? This testimony is the weightiest possible evidence of his goodness and desire to save them. All who reject it will be without excuse. How natural, then, that as soon as this evidence is given to the whole world, then "the end shall come" at once! For these reasons "this gospel of the kingdom" is preached to all nations for a "testimony" in the last days.

But what is "this gospel of the kingdom" which is so important? Is it the same gospel, with no change, no addition, or variation, which the apostles preached to the Waldenses, the reformers, and the good people in all ages? It is certainly a last-day proclamation; for as soon as it is preached in all the world, "then" "the end" comes. Will the preaching just before Christ comes the second time to save his people, destroy the wicked, give life eternal, immortality, and everlasting bliss to the saved, be precisely the same as that given centuries before these great events were to occur? If so, why did Christ give this remarkable discourse? Why did he so fully answer the disciples' question? Why did he foretell what great and wonderful signs should just precede his second advent, proving its especial nearness? Why does he tell us that the evil servants in that day would be declaring, "My Lord delayeth his coming," and the good servant be preaching the opposite?

These facts not only render it very probable, but demonstrate the absolute certainty that our Saviour expected and intended that the last-day message would contain an emphatic warning of his soon appearing.

Progress of the Cause.

"He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."—Ps. 126:6.

STRIVE VALIANTLY.

BY W. R. PATTERSON.
(Unita, Tex.)

STRIVE valiantly for what is true,
And heaven will thy cause defend:
Though the friends of truth be weak and few,
Her cause shall triumph in the end.

Strive valiantly for what is right;
For error's ranks at last shall fall;
Though now they're boastful of their might,
The truth shall triumph o'er them all.

Strive earnestly for what is pure,
All else will perish by and by;
What else can future bliss insure,
And peace to all eternity?

Bow not the knee, though sceptered wrong
Demands such homage paid by man,
Though her ranks seem weak, ere long
The cause of truth shall lead the van.

Be not afraid of error's host;
For thou ere long wilt see the day
When her boastful ranks shall melt as frost
Before the burning Sun, away.

ACROSS THE ATLANTIC.

SINCE my last report, which was written from Rio Janeiro, I have not only crossed the Atlantic, but made quite a long journey northward. I left Rio Janeiro, Sept. 14, and after a pleasant voyage of twenty days, landed at Plymouth, Eng. On Oct. 3 our steamer touched at the Cape Verde Islands for coal, but there was a rigid quarantine enforced against all vessels coming from Brazilian ports, so no one was able to land or come on board the ship. We only made three other stops, at Lisbon, Vigo, and Pauillac. I have now been in England about a week, and have enjoyed the association with brethren Robinson, Waggoner, Morrison, and others very much. After having been separated for a year from our brethren of experience, it seemed good to meet with these laborers, and have the benefit of their counsel. We have tried to make some plans for the book business in South America, and the London branch of the Pacific Press will do all in its power to assist and encourage the brethren in that field. I sail from Liverpool on the 15th for West Africa, from which place I will report later. L. C. CHADWICK.

NEBRASKA.

CURTIS.—I met with the company at this place, Sabbath and Sunday, Oct. 8, 9, and held quarterly meeting. Thirteen united with the church. Some of these had been baptized at the time of the camp-meeting, held here in August. One was baptized on Sunday afternoon. The influence of the meetings which have been held here within the last year or two, is wide-spread. People are rising up in the adjoining communities, and are inquiring about the truth, and some are embracing it. This is very encouraging to the little company. I think that the secret of the whole thing is, that the brethren are not asleep in the missionary work.

The meeting to celebrate the ordinances was exceptionally interesting and profitable. All took part. One person was present who was not of our faith. He was very much affected, and said he thought that he ought to give his heart to God. I expect that ere long he will unite with us.

Brethren Harr and J. T. Wakeham are laboring at Stockville and vicinity. They report interest. A sister of the Curtis company reports an interest at Wellfleet, where they are anxious for a minister to come. Already a small class meets on the Sabbath to study the Sabbath-school lessons.

Take it on the whole, the work in this section of the district looks encouraging. I feel to say, "Courage in the Lord." L. A. HOOPES.

MONTANA.

MILLCREEK, CHICO, AND LIVINGSTON.—I have spent most of the past quarter laboring in the vicinity of these places. I came to Millcreek for the purpose of helping the brethren and sisters already in the truth, and if possible to bring out some others who had been interested by meetings which I had previously held. We have had some very precious meetings, and all seem to be getting a better hold upon God. Three others have also been added to our number, and still others are interested. I have held some meetings at Fridley with an increasing interest. My wife has been with me and rendered much assistance in the Bible work. The Lord is going out before us and preparing the way.

We were with the Livingston church for quarterly meeting. We held a two days' meeting, and the brethren from Chico and Millcreek attended. I was also with this church about a week before the meeting. A prayer-meeting was held each evening during the week, and we experienced much of God's presence and power. "Surely it is time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon us."

This quarterly meeting was one of the best I ever attended. The spirit of union and love prevailed, and the Lord drew very near. Over ten dollars were collected for first-day offerings, and pledges to the amount of one dollar a week were also taken. A club of twenty Signs is taken by the Livingston church, and they go forth to their work the coming quarter with new courage and zeal.

We thank God for his abundant grace, and more still for his willingness to bestow it when we seek him with all the heart. E. R. WILLIAMS.

ILLINOIS.

COLETA.—Our meetings, which have now been in progress four weeks, still continue with a good interest. As a result thus far, seven have decided to keep the Sabbath, six of whom are heads of families, and others are deciding to obey God. Our courage in the Lord is good. The local paper has noticed us kindly, and the people are friendly. The faithful attendance of our brethren, though some of them lived at a distance, has helped our work greatly. Pray for us. L. D. SANTEE.

WOODBURN AND COLETA.—After Elder J. W. Bagby and I closed our tent-meeting at Kane, I spent several days with the Woodburn church. Though their members are few, the Lord came near to bless, and all felt encouraged. From here I attended our two camp-meetings at Ottawa and Olney. These were seasons of great spiritual refreshing, as all can testify who attended. From the southern meeting I came to Springfield, and spent several days in locating here. My permanent address is 125 W. Monroe St., Springfield, Ill.

I am now at Coleta, Whiteside Co., assisting brethren L. D. Santee and D. N. Loughborough in tent-meeting. Thus far we have been blessed with good weather, and by means of a large stove, keep the tent quite comfortable. Several have begun the observance of the Sabbath, and others are deeply interested. This is an old battle ground. Elder J. N. Loughborough held a discussion here over a quarter of a century ago. As a result of the meetings held then, a number embraced the truth. We are grateful to God for his many rich blessings. We hope all will remember the work here in their prayers. GEO. B. THOMPSON.

VERMONT.

BORDOVILLE, BERKSHIRE, AND EAST RICHFORD.—On returning from our good camp-meeting, I spent Sabbath and Sunday morning with the Bordoville church, in company with Elder William Covert. Two precious youths were baptized and united with the church.

Sunday afternoon we drove ten miles to Berkshire, where we held meetings for one week. As the result of the meetings, brother and sister E. J. Miller joined the Bordoville church, and were baptized. We then visited the church at East Richford, where we held meetings for two weeks. Brother Covert's labors were appreciated. An elder and deacon were ordained, and two of the youth were baptized and united with the church. I then returned to Bordoville, where I am at this writing. My courage is good. H. W. PIERCE.

Oct. 11.

BERKSHIRE AND EAST RICHFORD.—When I reported last, I was laboring in connection with Elder Pierce, at Berkshire Center. Seven meetings in all were held at that place. One interested brother and sister who had asked for meetings to be held at this place, fully identified themselves with us, and became members of the Bordoville church. They went over to East Richford, where we next held meetings after leaving Berkshire, and were baptized. Nineteen meetings were held at East Richford. Two were added to the church by baptism during the meetings. An elder and deacon were elected and ordained, as there were no ordained officers in the church, and the ordinances were celebrated. We helped what we could in the Sabbath-school work the three Sabbaths that we were with them. On these Sabbaths quite a number of brethren and sisters who lived in adjoining neighborhoods came in, and the result was that we had good-sized congregations. A part of the members of this church belong to the Quebec Conference.

It had been suggested by the Vermont and Quebec Conferences that a joint canvassers' institute be held at East Richford during the coming winter. The friends at East Richford offer their hearty cooperation, and offered bed room for about fifty persons, free of charge, and other substantial inducements, which testify of their earnestness in seeing the work go forward.

It has seldom been my privilege to hold a series of meetings with a better upward tendency than was noticeable at these meetings. One sister in a wheel-chair attended every service but one, and regretted to have them close. May the friends continue with as great a degree of courage as when we left them. Elder Pierce was with me part of the time at East Richford. He did the baptizing, also assisted in the speaking, and did much in teaching the youth to sing. WM. COVERT.

OHIO.

YELLOW SPRINGS.—We are engaged in the most active work in the tract and missionary branch of the cause that this place has ever been known to experience, and the Lord has come near and blessed us beyond measure. We are sending out a great deal of literature, writing missionary letters, etc. When we find an opportunity to make a visit for the purpose of holding a Bible reading or talking upon some special subject of our faith, in which the individual is interested, we arrange some night convenient for the family to have several of our brethren and sisters call, and participate with them in the reading. It is led by one who is chosen to conduct it, these arrangements all being made at our missionary meetings. We find that the openings are presenting themselves much faster than we can properly attend to them. We endeavor to lead the parties out step by step into the truth.

Last Sunday two sisters followed their Lord's example, and were buried in baptism. They arose from the watery grave shouting praises to his name. It was one of the most solemn occasions I have ever witnessed. There are two more who will soon have advanced far enough to be admitted into the church. The Lord is doing a work here for us that is truly wonderful.

Our aged brother, William Cottrell, was here and gave us a few discourses, and that occasion will long be remembered. He was wonderfully blessed in his old age in giving us such precious truths from the Lord at this point in the message and our work. We are very hopeful in the results of the labor the dear Saviour is giving us to do here. Let every church put forth a strong effort, and may God give the increase, is my prayer.

OKLAHOMA AND INDIAN TERRITORIES.

By recommendation and appointment of the General Conference, I have now entered upon my duties as territorial canvassing agent for this field. This is the first organized effort to scatter the printed message in these Territories. The cause here is young, the country is new, and we have to overcome all the difficulties and inconveniences following these conditions. But the Lord has a people here, and he has already manifested his presence and power by abundantly blessing the ministerial effort put forth the present year.

The camp-meeting just closed at Edmund was a season of refreshing long to be remembered in this field, and we believe it marks the beginning of a great work in this part of the Master's vineyard. We had the privilege of attending the large State camp-meeting in Michigan, and enjoying the great blessings so abundantly bestowed upon it; and while our numbers here were very small comparatively, the Spirit and power of God were felt in no less a degree.

From a membership of about one hundred English-speaking people, there are eight or ten who will engage in the canvassing work within a few weeks; and with God's blessing will be successful in carrying the light of the third angel's message to those who have left their homes and friends in the States, with the hope of improving their condition here. May the Lord grant that through our efforts many of these pioneers may be induced to seek a home in a better land than this, where dug-outs and windowless cabins will be exchanged for mansions of exquisite beauty, and where privation, poverty, and want will be exchanged for the bounties of our Father's house.

This Territory was thrown open to settlement three years ago last April, and since that time a steady stream of immigrants has been pouring into it from all parts of the West, until it has become quite thickly populated with a hardy, energetic, and enterprising people. Those in the north best for the interests of his cause, and the good of any whom it might concern, and consequently for the glory of his name, for him to work in the manner indicated, then we might expect, according to the promise, he would manifest his power in behalf of his people. And such has been the case. All along through the gospel age, when people have been in a condition such that God could consistently work for them, and the circumstances have made it desirable that such work should be accomplished, these very signs have been manifested. The word of the Lord has not failed.

"ACQUAINT NOW THYSELF WITH HIM."

THESE are the words of a text of Scripture familiar to all students of the sacred word, inviting and exhorting us to become acquainted with God. And in immediate connection is set before us the result of such acquaintance, in the words, "and be at peace."

Who would not desire an opportunity to become acquainted with so exalted a Being? Who would not feel honored by such an invitation, from one so much higher than himself? Yet how few seem inclined to avail themselves of the opportunity.

To become acquainted with earthly superiors is usually a matter of great difficulty. Access to them is difficult, and few of them are willing to come down to the social level of ordinary people. They desire to be acquainted only with persons of equal or superior rank with themselves. And when all these difficulties have been overcome, there remains frequently but an empty honor as the reward of the efforts that have been put forth. The benefit derived from an acquaintance with one like ourselves is always something uncertain, and very sure to be more or less mixed with that which is a positive detriment.

Not so with that acquaintance to which we are invited in the words of the text. To that the way is always open, and He who gives the invitation does not withdraw it when we fail to please him. Though so far above us, he is anxious that we should know him; and so desirous was he of this that at an infinite cost he himself removed the one great obstacle that stood in the way of fallen man, and is ready to meet him in his very lowest estate. Only man himself can interpose an obstacle which effectually bars his way to the good which God has invited him to obtain.

No road of infinite length, no impassable gulf, no unattainable height, separates us from the One with whom we are thus invited to commune. "Say not in thine heart," is the language of the righteousness of faith, "who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above), or, who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ from the dead) but what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." Rom. 10:6-9. By faith we have access to the grace of God (Rom. 5:2) and find him "not far from every one of us." Acts 17:27. When we draw nigh to him, he also draws nigh to us (James 4:8), and when the door of the heart is opened, he never fails to enter in and make it his abode.

Nor are we separated from him by any considerations of our own unworthiness and insignificance in our low and fallen estate. "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." Isa. 57:15. No guarded fortress of a czar, no palace halls, where the wealth and splendor of royalty overawes the person of humbler rank, no throne, surrounded by the haughty favorites of earthly fortune, must be encountered ere we can find access to the great Being who invites our acquaintance. He brings himself to us, and lifts us to the high plane of communion with him, which we could never attain by our own efforts.

We get acquainted with God through the revelation of himself to us. This revelation is found in his word. In that word is the power of God and the wisdom of God. In it is Christ himself; for "in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." John 1:1, 14. Hence, to become acquainted with God is to study his word and receive it into our hearts. Thus Christ is taken in, and dwelling in our hearts will continually reveal himself to us, and the acquaintance will be formed with Him whom to know aright is everlasting life.

The benefits derived from such acquaintance are infinitely greater than can be gained from any earthly source. By it we gain access to all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, which are hid in Christ. Col. 2:3. This wisdom and knowledge is not of the kind that benefits only the intellect, but is intensely practical in its nature; for "the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy." James 3:17. It takes hold of the character, and shapes it after the pattern of divinity. It shows us that which is perfect, in contrast with the earthly and human, which is imperfect. It throws the bright light of truth upon the pathway into eternity, revealing all the by-ways which lead aside from the straight path of righteousness and peace. It reveals to us "wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption," and enables us to make them our own. 1 Cor. 1:30. In short, it does for us all that God can do for us in this present state, to elevate, instruct, and strengthen us in the Christian life. And this acquaintance is not anything of a distant and formal nature, but is close and personal, so that we have fellowship with Him who has shown toward us such marvelous condescension. 1 John 1:7.

But aside from all these considerations, acquaintance with God is a necessity because we are going to meet him. Can any one expect to meet with confidence the Creator of heaven and earth, coming in all his terrible majesty to execute his high decrees, without having any acquaintance with him? Who would not wish, if possible, to have some knowledge of his own standing with him, upon which he may confidently rest? In the sight of that majestic countenance before which the earth trembles and the mountains flee away, who will not desire the ability to look up with the assuring thought, I am acquainted with him and he with me, and we are friends?

Who can expect to enter heaven feeling himself a stranger to the One who is its chief attraction? Who can expect to sing the "song of Moses and of the Lamb" before he has learned anything about it? He who expects to begin an acquaintance with his Creator in the world to come, will find himself among the company who "know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess. 1:8), and to whom the latter will profess, "I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." Matt. 7:23. "Acquaint now thyself with him," and for all time "be at peace."

L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

THAT "this gospel of the kingdom" is the last edition of gospel light, the last form in which the glad tidings of great joy will be given to the world, must be evident from many considerations. The expression occurs nowhere else in the Bible in exactly this form. Let us note a few of the different translations of this passage:—

"These glad tidings of the kingdom will be published in the whole habitable, for a testimony to all the nations."—The Diaglott.

"And this good tidings of the reign shall be published throughout all the world for the information of all nations."—Mc Knight and Campbell's Version.

"And this announcement of the kingdom shall be published in all the world for a testimony to all nations; and then will come the consummation."—The Syriac Version.

"Then shall come the consummation."—Catholic Version.

"And there shall be proclaimed these glad tidings of the kingdom in all the habitable earth for a testimony to all the nations."—Englishman's Greek New Testament, Interlinear Translation.

For brevity we leave off the last clause of the verse in several instances where it agrees with our common version. We submit to the reader the statement that in every instance, in our common version, as well as all these others, the thought as expressed by our Saviour clearly implies that he had in view the ushering in of the kingdom of God. The glad announcement to all the nations of our world was the final triumph of the gospel, united with the immediate and complete establishment of the kingdom of God so long foretold. This proclamation is Christ's last "testimony" to the nations of the world. It is emphatically a last-day message. It is a message of joy to the people of God alone. The world and the worldly professor will not love it. This proclamation contains not only the gospel in the general sense of salvation from sin by Christ's death on the cross, but coupled with it the glorious announcement of his personal reign at hand. This is presented as a source of great joy to his people.

As Luke records Christ's words, when the signs of his coming should have been given: "Know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand?" (Luke 21:31) so when the message of warning is preached, founded upon these signs, it must surely embrace this knowledge of the immediate commencement of his reign. Such a message could not have been truthfully preached before the fulfillment of the signs of his coming. The great commission given to the apostles and all of Christ's ministers in past ages did not say, "Go ye into all the world, and preach 'this gospel of the kingdom' to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Mark 16:15, 16. But it was the gospel alone that all Christ's servants were to preach. All who would believe on Christ, repent of their sins, and obey his word could and would be saved by it ultimately, though some might lie in their graves for centuries. But when the signs should be fulfilled, "the kingdom of God is nigh at hand," they were to "know" this. His servants at that time would not only preach the gospel still,—the same gospel his servants had always preached,—but would join with it the glorious theme, "He cometh." The kingdom is about to be ushered in. The long reign of sin and Satan is almost ended. The mourning, the wailing, the sorrow, the toil, and sacrifice, soon cease forever. Our King appeareth. The world must be warned of it.

That kingdom has been a matter of hope for long ages. Abraham looked for its capital. "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." He was a pilgrim and stranger on earth. But he looked for a "city" and a "better country," a "heavenly," even a "world" redeemed, of which he was "an heir." Heb. 11:10-16; Rom. 4:13. All the patriarchs looked for it also. David beheld his promised "seed" sitting at the Father's right hand. In the fullness of times, he would ask of the Father an inheritance which had been purchased by his own blood. "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." No wonder, in view of this fact, that the psalmist should give good counsel to the kings and judges of the earth, when this final message of love should be proclaimed as a "testimony" to them. "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little." Ps. 2:8, 9, 12.

Daniel beheld the very moment when this transaction in God's holy temple on high should occur, just as probation was about closing, and the final decision of the grand assize was being reached, who were saved and who were lost. "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Then he comes crowned "King of kings and Lord of lords," and takes possession. "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Dan. 7:13, 14, 27; Rev. 19:11-16. This must embrace the whole earth.

Isaiah beheld the same kingdom: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever." Isa. 9:6, 7.

And when Gabriel announced the birth of Jesus to Mary, he said: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Jesus has never yet had the throne of his father David. David's kingdom and throne were never in heaven, but upon this earth. When God through Ezekiel the prophet, addressed Zedekiah, the last wicked descendant of David who ever occupied his throne, he plainly told him that throne should never more be occupied till the rightful heir—the true "seed" of David—came to receive it: "And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem, and take off the crown: . . . exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it: and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him." Ezek. 21:25-27.

The Medes and Persians, Grecians and Romans managed that throne to suit themselves, after Babylon received it at Zedekiah's fall. It has never yet been occupied by the rightful heir; but it will be received, occupied, established, and endure forevermore, when that "stone" smites the image of iron, brass, silver, and gold, grinding it to powder. That stone represents our Lord Jesus Christ. "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed." Dan. 2:44, 45. For the establishment of that immortal kingdom of glory we are now looking. It is the same as that one our Saviour calls "this gospel of the kingdom." A message of its nearness goes to all the world, when the signs are fulfilled. We are then to "know" it is "nigh at hand." That kingdom has never yet been ushered in, and cannot be till Christ comes in his glory.

A RESOLUTION, AND WHAT IT AMOUNTS TO.

At the recent Pan-Presbyterian Council held in Toronto, the council expressed its satisfaction with the action of the United States Congress in closing the World's Fair on Sunday, by the following resolution, which was offered by Dr. Kerr of Glasgow:—

"This council declares its admiration of the recent action of the Congress of the United States in favor of closing the gates of the Columbian Exposition on the Lord's day; expresses the ardent hope that there shall be no reversal of this action, and as a council holding the consensus of the Reformed churches, specially rejoices in the decision, as it illustrates the great scriptural doctrine of the binding obligation of the Lord's day on all peoples, and prepares the way for other action and reforms which would recognize the supremacy of the Lord Jesus Christ over nations, and promote civil and religious prosperity of all communities."

The most noticeable thing about the above resolution is the expression that what Congress has already done "prepares the way for other action and reforms which would recognize the supremacy of the Lord Jesus Christ over nations, and promote civil and religious prosperity of all communities."

As far as the statement that this action of Congress "prepares the way for other action," etc., we have no doubt the resolution tells the truth,—a truth too that is fraught with the most disastrous results to the nation. To legislate in regard to religious duties always has had for men a strange fascination. The history of Rome since the days of Constantine, and the history of the various kingdoms into which western Rome was divided, amply proves the strength of this tendency to recognize the "supremacy of the Lord Jesus Christ," which has invariably been done by recognizing some church or religious body as representing Christ on the earth, and then shaping the laws so as to make it exceedingly uncomfortable, to say the least, for those who could not agree with them in matters of faith and practice. Acts of Parliament against Nonconformists in England, and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in France, were considered by the blind rulers of these countries as steps which would "promote civil and religious prosperity of all communities." It is now known that they were wicked attempts to coerce men in their relations to God, and that evil and only evil came from it. And as sure as similar causes produce similar results, this unwarranted action of the United States Congress in the matter of Sunday legislation, amounting as it does to downright governmental interference in religious things, which this resolution upholds and commends, is as wicked and flagrant a wrong upon the people as were those to which we have referred. The enemies of religious liberty have promptly stepped upon this vantage ground, so recklessly granted them by Congress, and are actively preparing for greater conquests. And, if, as Senator Hawley said: "It is not wise statesmanship" to resist the demands of the churches, and as other leaders of this religio-political movement declare that they can have in the way of religious laws whatever they are a mind to ask for, what is there that these self-constituted judges and censors of religious opinion want, however abominable and oppressive, that they will not seek to gain?

Does any one say that these are good men, and that therefore they will do nothing wrong, it is sufficient to answer that Annas and Caiaphas were considered good men. Saul of Tarsus was one of these good men. When filled with religious zeal for the religion of his fathers, which he saw was in imminent danger of overthrow, he "breathed forth threatening and slaughter," and "persecuted unto the death" those who had departed from what he was sure was right. The persecutions which have disgraced the history of nearly every branch of the Christian church, have been perpetrated by "good men,"—popes, cardinals, bishops, and elders,—men who spent much time in prayer, and in various religious exercises. Is not human nature the same now as in past generations? Are good men better now than good men of the past have been? We have no reason to believe that they are. As long as the test of goodness is to belong to the church, to preach, pray, exhort, and to be filled with a burning zeal to propagate a certain line of opinions, leaving out the gentleness and meekness of Christ, "who, when he was reviled, reviled not again," so long will good men persecute. Thousands of professed Christians have an abounding zeal to propagate Christianity, but they are strangers to the spirit of Christianity. If the thousands of ministers of religion who are seeking for the help of the law to propagate Christianity, could exchange their Saul of Tarsus spirit for the spirit of Paul the apostle, a great and true reform might spring into life on every hand.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

THE Australian colonies in general, and Melbourne in particular, are learning by sad experience the truthfulness of that scripture which says that "the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows."

Three or four years ago the spirit of speculation ran very high, and there seemed to the unthoughtful observer no limit to the possibilities for wealth. Immense fortunes sprang up hypothecated upon a fictitious value of property, and this value was increased at pleasure. Men were raised out of the ranks of toil, and placed upon the list of wealthy men. Fortune seemed to smile on everybody, and thousands fell down at her shrine. There were numerous banks started, and very many more numerous speculative enterprises, syndicates, and combinations, into which the best men of the country entered and to which they gave their names. Private and public fortunes shot up like bean stalks. But there came a change, the storm of adversity arose, and the poor, withering growth of a day, looking about for some support, found none, and soon fell groveling to the ground. There was but little real financial strength, and that depended largely upon the precarious business of mining. Agriculture was but feebly developed; the land was in the hands of a few, and over it roved immense herds of cattle and sheep.

The country is now reaping the sad fruits of its rashness, and they are sad indeed. Every branch of business is nearly paralyzed; there is no confidence in any undertaking. As a consequence, many thousands of men are out of employment, and the suffering among the poor is intense. Drinking and smoking are very universal habits, and of course must be maintained whether there is any bread or not. The result is that charities are taxed to their utmost, and the good and evil are alike affected. The suffering is not confined to the poor classes, by any means; for there is a terrible downfall of those whose names have been written high. Men with several titles before their names, and a long string of letters after them, are now floundering in the morass of financial ruin. The ex-lord mayor of Melbourne is bankrupt, with a large deficiency. The Victorian agent-general at London has been recalled to explain his connection with disreputable financiering, and he acknowledges that if the calls upon him were enforced, he would have to go through the bankruptcy court. The ex-speaker of the Lower House of Parliament has very ignominiously failed. The bank of which he was managing director came to grief, and it now turns out that it was wrecked by loaning money recklessly to speculative companies in which he was interested. Associated with him were a large number of our prominent men, and the people placed the most implicit confidence in their integrity, so that their ruin involves hundreds of heretofore prosperous families. There is strong talk of criminal prosecution being instituted against them. More than half a score of Melbourne's prominent business men, heretofore honored and respected, now see daylight through prison-bars; while scores of clerks and managers, encouraged by the bad example, and drinking in the spirit of covetousness have been led to embezzle, steal, and gamble, and some of them already suffer the punishment of their crimes, while new crimes are continually being brought to light.

As a national result, the public credit is suffering, and at present indications of improvement are not apparent. We have in these things an illustration of the real nature of covetousness, and a revelation of the cause of its being classed by inspiration with the foulest and most revolting sins. Covetousness is mammon worship, it is idolatry, it is a grievous sin against God, and it leads man to transgress every principle of equity toward his fellow-men.

Steps are being taken by the present government to improve matters by retrenchment, increase of taxation, and encouragement in the different branches of agriculture. Irrigation on the Californian system is being largely introduced and encouraged by the authorities, so that after a time a better state of things may be expected.

We are glad to say that so far this extraordinary state of things has affected our work as slightly as it could be expected that it would. Our commercial printing has largely fallen off; but the selling of our books and the subscriptions to our papers have kept up remarkably well, and people seem more willing to listen to the truth than they were. But they all have their significance in fulfilling the signs of the times. The laboring classes complain of the oppression, and are becoming discontented and uneasy, and although the strikes have not been attended with any sanguinary consequences, still the laboring conflicts are bitter, and talk of violence is frequently indulged in.

The Christian Endeavor movement has already been established in this country, and has received an impetus by the visit of Dr. Clark, president of the association in America. Conventions are now being held in different cities, and there is strong ground for believing that this movement will form an element in the religio-political party which is rapidly forming.

The Australian Bible school, under the charge of brethren Rosseau and Starr, is progressing very satisfactorily. The attendance is small, but the best of feeling prevails, and the Spirit of God seems to be attending the work, and we confidently expect that succeeding terms will be much more largely attended. It is thought best to continue the school for another year in the same premises.

Sister White has removed with a portion of her family to Adelaide, for a short period. She is so far but slightly improved in health, though hopes are entertained that the recent change will prove beneficial.

and never held but one religious meeting on that day that we know anything about, and then devoted the remainder of even that day, and every other first day, to secular uses.

Such, in brief, are the comparative claims of the Sabbath and first day in the New Testament. If any reader doubts that the testimony is all in favor of the seventh day, and that alone, let him "SEARCH AND SEE."

267.—POLYGAMY.

Did God sanction polygamy in the old dispensation? If not, how is 2 Sam. 12:8 to be explained? A. T. H.

Answer.—There is no sanction of polygamy in this text. It is not a verdict upon the right or wrong of the transaction referred to, but only a record of how God had favored David in giving him the kingdom. The statements about the wives of Saul being given to him, etc., signified no more than that the household of Saul had passed completely into the power of David, and hence was a sign that the possession of the kingdom had passed entirely over to him; for it was a law of the succession that the household of the preceding king passed into the possession of the following one. And when this was done, it was understood that the kingdom was wholly transferred to the new occupant of the throne. So the household of Saul, including his wives and servants and all that he had, was given into the hands of David, as the then rightful king.

268.—THE SABBATH IN GREEK.

A methodist minister in this place affirms that in every instance in the Greek the Sabbath and the first day are the same; that all Greek lexicons define Sabbath as meaning the first day. Is this correct? J. L. T.

Ans.—So far from being true, there is not one word of truth in it. The word "Sabbath" as used in the Greek, refers first and most frequently to the seventh day of the week, the Sabbath of the Bible (Matt. 12:8, etc.); secondly, to the ceremonial or yearly sabbaths of the Jews (Col. 2:16); and, thirdly, to the period between two Sabbaths, that is, the whole week. Matt. 28:1; Luke 18:12, etc. (See the tract called "A Greek Falsehood," published at this Office.)

CHRISTIAN COURAGE.

COURAGE is as necessary to success in the Christian life as in any less spiritual undertaking, and in nothing is it more certain to be productive of great results.

The maxim that applies so often in worldly matters, "Be sure you are right, and then go ahead," may well be remembered and put in practice by the Christian, with an emphasis on the concluding words. Many fail to reap the results that they might from the knowledge which they possess, simply because they have not the courage to "go ahead." In the last day, the "fearful" are found no better off than the unbelievers and murderers. Rev. 21:8.

Courage, in the spiritual sense, is synonymous with faith. Faith is belief in the word and power of God, the Omnipotent; hence where faith is, there can be no fear. With the eye of faith the individual sees God doing the work, and therefore feels no doubt over the result.

The Christian pathway is beset with difficulties, and it is the purpose of the Devil to magnify these into what will seem to be insuperable obstacles. He will always make the imaginary difficulties much greater than the real ones. He magnifies the difficulties, but carefully hides the blessings. He wants every one to think that the Christian life is a hard, toilsome, and gloomy one. He constantly aims to hide the individual view from the One who is able to do all things, and the sight of whom gives confidence and strength, and to impress him with the thought of the hard things he must do to obtain eternal life.

But there are no conditions under which apparent obstacles will more readily yield to a bold forward movement than those which invest the pathway to immortality. Seen through the gloomy haze which the prince of darkness delights to cast around it, this pathway appears filled with the shadows of mountains and the vague outlines of spectral shapes that stand to bar the traveler's progress,—things which the dark magician has used all his art to conjure up, and place before the doubtful eye of the faint-hearted candidate for the life to come. There is the denial of self, the loss of wealth or position, the adverse opinion of the public, the loss of earthly friendships, the sacrifices that must be made, and hardships endured, all clothed with the semblance of reality, and wearing their darkest aspect, to deter the timid from venturing onward in response to the divine call. And very many allow these dark specters to impress their minds with fears and doubts, until they halt in the way, and then drift slowly and surely backward. But when with the firm tread of faith they march boldly up to the obstacles, the mountain shrinks to a mole hill, and the shapes which seemed so formidable vanish into the empty realms from whence they came, leaving the pilgrim surprised at his own fearfulness and distrust. The obstacles he does encounter are rarely found to be those which he anticipated, and moving out in faith, he meets no difficulty without also finding the means by which to surmount it.

With God's word beneath us and his power within us, we can march boldly up to what seem the most gigantic obstacles, in the fullest confidence that they will give way before us, if not disappear altogether. Where there is an irresistible power, there can be no immovable obstacle; and where faith is, there is irresistible power. This is the time for every Christian to bear in mind the words of the apostle to the Hebrews (Heb. 10:38, 39), "Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul." L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

WHAT might have occurred had the Jews at his first advent joyfully received him as the long looked-for heir to David's throne, we may be only able to surmise. But they then were like the great mass of professed disciples now,—worldly, proud, covetous, selfish, bigoted, stubborn, and unbelieving. They would not have the humble Nazarene to reign over them. "He came unto his own, and his own received him not." John 1:11. During the "seventy weeks" (i. e., 490 years cut-off or allotted to the Jewish people, which commenced at the "going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," 457 before Christ, and necessarily terminated 34 years after Christ. Dan. 9:24-27; Ezra 7:11-28. For date of same, see margin of last scripture.), the Jews had certain privileges. They were reckoned as the peculiar people. The preaching of the gospel was confined to them. Not a sermon did Christ or the apostles ever preach to the Gentiles till after that date. Not till after they had rejected Christ and his glorious message of love, did the Lord reject them as a people, and place them on the same basis as the Gentile nations. It is most reasonable, and we think scriptural, to conclude that if they had joyfully welcomed him as the true Messiah, he would still have continued to honor them as a people with peculiar privileges, and would have made them conspicuous and honored as messengers of light and mercy to the Gentiles; Canaan and Jerusalem would have been the most exalted of all lands, and the Gentile nations would indeed have flowed unto them. Christ was born king of the Jews. Matt. 2:2.

When Pilate asked Jesus if he was a king, Jesus answered: "To this end was I born; and for this cause came I into the world." John 18:37. He offered himself to the Jewish people as such. When he first began to preach to the Jews, he said: "Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." "At hand" signifies "near by," or "draweth nigh." The Greek word enggizo is so rendered more than by any other definition. It is sometimes rendered "approacheth," and quite often "at hand." The Diaglott renders this passage: "Reform, for the Royal Majesty of the heavens has approached." Christ at this stage of his labors went through all Galilee "preaching the gospel of the kingdom." He presented himself to the Jewish nation as the heir to David's throne and as their king. Here was the heir, here the capital city, here the territory, here the temple and the law of the kingdom, and here the people. But the subjects would not accept him to reign over them. They wanted a different kind of ruler. Yet he said to them: "But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you." Matt. 12:28. And when he appointed the seventy to go forth and preach, he told them to "heal the sick that are therein, and say unto them, the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." Luke 10:9. He even told the Pharisees, when they demanded of him when the kingdom of God should come, "The kingdom of God is among you." Luke 17:21, margin. This is in harmony with the words of John the Baptist: "But there standeth one among you, whom ye know not, . . . whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose." John 1:26. So near did the kingdom of God come to the Jewish people. Yet it was never in that full sense set up. They hated him, and would not have him to rule over them. And when Pilate placed the inscription over Jesus: "The King of the Jews," when he crucified him, it troubled the Jews exceedingly, and they stoutly remonstrated with Pilate, and sought to make him change it. But it was doubtless the divine mind that that statement should stand so recorded. John 19:19-22. As the Saviour distinctly taught in a remarkable parable just before his death, the Jewish people, as a nation, took the position, "We will not have this man to reign over us." Luke 19:11-15.

These considerations clearly indicate Christ's design to be a special blessing to the Jewish people, and to have been accepted of them as their king. What would have occurred had they done so, is not revealed, and we may not surmise what would have followed had they done so. But their rejection of him caused their ruin as a nation, though individually they had the same privileges of salvation as every one else; and no more. The offer of the kingdom was then made to another people—the Gentiles. In one of his last discourses, the matter was set before them so they understood it. Under the form of a parable of a vineyard let out to husbandmen, he speaks of the Jewish nation. The owner of the vineyard sent his servants at various times to receive the fruits due him, but they invariably abused or killed them. At last he sent his only son, saying, "They will reverence my son." But they said: "This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance." And they "cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him." In conclusion, Christ says to them, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Matt. 21:33-45. Jesus himself taught that "salvation is of the Jews." John 4:22. And it was not till after the Jewish people had fully rejected Christ, the teaching of his apostles, and the expiration of these seventy weeks in A. D. 34, that the work of God went among the Gentiles. Then, indeed, Paul and others said: "So we turn to the Gentiles." They will hear the gospel, and they did. Gentiles then could accept God and be saved, by uniting with his chosen people. Jews can be saved now through Christ by the same rules that the Gentiles can. Yet those peculiar privileges of the Jewish nation would no doubt have been greatly increased had they accepted Christ as their king. But the kingdom of David or the kingdom of glory was not set up when Christ was upon earth, and has not been yet. That God has had a divine arrangement for saving men, called a kingdom, in an accommodated sense, a kingdom of grace, of which there is a "throne of grace," we cannot doubt. Heb. 4:16. The word "kingdom" does not always refer to the same thing. The connection must decide its meaning.

But the everlasting kingdom of glory is to be put in power at the close of earthly rule, at the coming of our Saviour the second time. We have abundance of evidence to show this. It was future at Christ's death, future at his ascension, future when James wrote his epistle A. D. 60 (Acts 1:6, 7; James 2:5), and future yet. Our Saviour and the apostles never intimated that "this gospel of the kingdom" was preached by them after the Jews rejected Christ, in the apostolic age. But our Savour, when giving in his great prophecy the signs of his near approach, then forcibly declares, It shall be preached in all the world for a testimony, and then shall the consummation come. Then the glorious kingdom long foretold by patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, will be due in all its glorious reality.

We are not to suppose for a moment that had the Jewish nation received Christ with great joy as the heir to David's throne, the kingdom of glory foretold by Daniel and other prophets would then have appeared, and immortality and eternal life been then bestowed. This could not have been; for many predictions in God's word could not have been thus fulfilled. The promises to Abraham, the father of that people, required that the Gentiles should be made to share in these blessings also. "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Gen. 22:18. This promise required the proclamation of the gospel to all the nations of the earth, which would have taken time. There were long prophetic periods foretold before Christ came, that must also have had a fulfillment. It may be impossible for us to tell how all these could have been fulfilled, had the Jews accepted Christ, but we must ever remember that God is not confined in his working by any stereotyped ways. He is infinite in resources, and could arrange his providences in a thousand methods unknown to us. Had they received the gospel in the true spirit of it, they would undoubtedly have been used as the special agents of their King to enlighten the benighted nations of the world, and have been greatly honored. Indeed, as it was, all the heralds of the cross, for a time, were Jews. There was no Gentile apostle set apart by Christ. Paul, the great apostle to the Gentiles, was a Jew, of pure descent.

What arrangement Christ would have made, had "his own" "received him," we are not permitted to know, because it is not revealed. But that he did offer himself as king to the Jews, the scriptures quoted, and many others, plainly imply. Even the exact point of time, foretold by Zachariah hundreds of years beforehand, when he should present himself to the nation as such, seems plainly apparent: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." Zech. 9:9. This was fulfilled to the minutest particular when Christ rode into Jerusalem a few days before he was crucified. The "king" presented himself to the nation as the prophet foretold. A "multitude" of his disciples, the poor, the halt, lame, blind, sick, deaf, lepers, and others whom he had healed in body and soul, met him and shouted for joy, as the prophet declared. But the nation, the rulers, the men of leading influence, the vast majority, were not there. They rejected him. It greatly disturbed them to hear these shouts of joy. As they could not stop these joyous shouts, they sought to have Jesus rebuke his disciples. Mark the reply: "I tell you that, if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out."

Everything was done on Jesus' part that could be done, to offer himself to that nation, but they would not have him to reign over them. When that decisive point was reached, and they rejected him, the agony of grief which rent the loving heart of the Son of God is indescribable. He saw the result of this terrible decision. Ruin must surely follow the rejection of such great light. He beheld their enemies utterly destroying their glorious city, the death of myriads, the woe, carnage, long years of oppression, and the blindness and darkness of ages. How he longed to save them! Why was this?—"Because thou knewest not the times of thy visitation." Their King came to his own, and was rejected. His visit to the world was not appreciated by those to whom he offered himself. Hence the Father must destroy those wicked husbands, and give the vineyard to others. Luke 19:39-44; 20:16. Since that he has gone to a "far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." That return, according to his own great prophecy, is now nigh, even at the door. "This gospel of the kingdom" is the final warning to the world and a luke-warm church, which much resembles the Jewish church when he came the first time. When this closing message has been proclaimed to all the world, "then shall the end come."

G. I. B.

CONCERNING COMMENTARIES.

It is a very common practice for writers on biblical subjects to quote frequently from the commentators. We are all liable to do this, and we often do it with considerable satisfaction. If in defense of any doctrine, one is able to say that "all Protestant commentators agree in saying," etc., etc., it is often supposed to be almost, if not quite, as good authority as the Bible itself. We are liable to quote the commentators much as the Catholic Church quotes the "Fathers," and upon many subjects one is about as near the truth as the other.

It is well to consult a commentary to learn what a man's opinion is, and to examine the grounds upon which that opinion is based; but if that opinion is not in harmony with the Scripture, if it is an attempt to disprove or make of less force any fact or truth that is plainly stated in the word of God, it is not worth the paper upon which it is printed. When it is only a matter of inference or opinion, one man's inference or opinion, generally speaking, is as good as another man's. Commentators are not inspired, and after all they may say, the Scripture itself is the last court of appeal upon the matters of which they treat, and in harmony with it every disputed and vexed question must be decided. A commentator's agreement with a plain text of Scripture does not add any force to it, nor does his disagreement take away one iota of strength. Commentaries enable the student of the Bible to study Bible subjects from the standpoint of different minds; then with the Scripture before him, to which alone loyalty is due, he can arrive at a satisfactory, and probably truthful, decision upon the question upon which he is seeking for light. And if in such investigation, the commentator is at variance with the apparent and plain meaning of the Scripture, man's opinion, including our own, must give way, that the voice of God may be heard. Thus when a noted commentator, describing the baptism of the eunuch by the evangelist Philip, says that "while Philip was instructing him, and he professing his faith in Christ, he probably plunged himself under the water," we should believe the Scripture instead of the commentator, and the Scripture says, "And they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him." Acts 8:38.

Again: when John says in the Revelation, "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day," it is of no account whatever that many commentators add, "the first day of the week," or "the Christian Sabbath, which is the first day of the week;" for the Bible sanctions no such idea, and the opinions of ten thousand commentators will not change the word of God, or make it of none effect. The one grand and God-inspired declaration, covering all time and all the future of eternity, that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," cannot be changed in meaning, or made void by a multitude of adverse commentators, whose comments are not according to the "oracles of God." "Let God be true, but every man a liar," is a Scripture rule which will apply to commentators as well as to every person who exalts himself against the knowledge of Christ.

Besides doctrinal topics, there are many other subjects introduced in the Bible,—some fully, and others only casually, such as the customs, habits, and religions of the different nations, and a variety of things concerning which a good commentary is an invaluable assistant, and should therefore not be despised. In short, the commentary is all right if it is not allowed to take the place of the book which has called it forth, and about which it is written. Many persons read the commentary because they are too indolent to study the Bible, and the result is that to that person the Bible is secondary, and the uninspired and fallible commentary is of chief importance. That thousands have done, and are now doing, this very thing, is one of the chief reasons why they are so slow to accept the words of the Bible itself. With many persons the Bible and some favorite commentary are inseparably joined together, and they do not know where to draw the dividing line between them. A quaint writer referring to the large number of "Lives of Christ" which are now selling, said that it "was probable that none of them were any improvement on those written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John!" If all will see the idea couched in this pithy sentence, and remember it, it will help them to preserve in their minds the proper relation which the commentary sustains to the Bible.

Progress of the Cause.

"He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." —Ps. 126:6.

CHRIST OUR KING OF GLORY.

BY N. W. VINCENT.

(Stoer, Kans.)

We yield our all to thee,—
Our life, our joy, our God!
Grant us thy Spirit, make us free,
O wash us in thy blood.

O make us pure in heart,
In thought and motive true;
Thy light, thy blessed truth impart,
Our souls with love imbue.

May we by thee be led,
As strangers here we roam;
In thy own footprints may we tread,
And hasten toward our home.

Thy love thou well hast shown,
Thy sovereign, boundless grace!
O King of Glory, take thy throne,
We long to see thy face.

When thou shalt come in power
Thy enemies to slay;
When storms of thy just vengeance lower
In the approaching day;—

When God's great trump shall sound,
Thy voice then may we hear,
And rise immortal from the ground
Before thee to appear.

In New Jerusalem
A thousand years to reign,
To know the love, the joy of them
Who once endured such pain.

Thy glory then we'll see,
Thy faithfulness adore!
Earth's mysteries then solved will be,
That were so dark before.

O feast of perfect love!
O mansions of delight!
Though now unseen, ye wait above,
Ye soon will bless our sight.

HELSINGFORS, FINLAND.

[The following extract from Elder O. Johnson's report will no doubt be read with interest by the readers of the REVIEW:—J. G. MATTESON.]

Helsingfors is situated very beautifully by the Gulf of Finland. It is surrounded by water on three sides, with the fort of Sveaborg in the front. This city was founded in 1850 by Gustaf Wasa. It became the capital of Finland in 1819. It is a fine city, containing 56,000 inhabitants of several different nationalities. Besides Finlanders, we find many Russians, Germans, Swedes, and Poles. The language of all of these nations is used every day. All officers and teachers in the State must be able to understand and speak both the Finnish and Swedish languages. The Russian emperor is the grand-duke of Finland. Besides this, the country is governed by a senate. The senate meets once in three years, but it has no power to make laws and arrange the government, without the sanction of the emperor. He has absolute power, and the life and property of his subjects are in a certain sense in his hands. The political, religious, and social position of the people, is, therefore, to a great extent, dependent on the love and sympathy of the emperor for his subjects. Lately he has manifested great love for his suffering people in Finland.

The Finlanders are generally diligent and contented, but they are much given to the use of liquor and tobacco. It is not uncommon to find a man and his wife, both lying drunk on the floor, side by side, while their small, half-naked children take care of themselves. Lack of work and drunkenness causes great misery and suffering among the poorer classes. Even now (the first of September) many people are without work, and many suffer. The rye this year is of a poor quality. It is still in the field, and it is raining every day. This makes poor prospects for the farmers. The spring crop is hurt by the frost in many places, and the potatoes, the chief article of food for the poor, are small, and have in many places begun to decay. Thus the people can expect nothing but suffering and want; yet we hear no complaint. They are already hardened in poverty and distress. The Finlanders have this great advantage over many others—they very seldom complain.

The darkness in temporal things is great, yet the spiritual darkness is still greater. With a few exceptions, they are full of prejudice, and afraid

"he" does not refer to the gods, but to the apparition of verse 12.

271.—SHOW MY PEOPLE THEIR SINS. ISA. 58:1.

In this text the prophet says, "Show my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins." Who are meant by the words "my people" and "the house of Jacob?" Are they one and the same class? J. F. A.

Ans.—These words are doubtless a double form of expression, to denote the true church, and the exhortation seems to be given with reference to some particular time. The remainder of the chapter, and especially the closing verses, which bring to view a great Sabbath reform, would seem to apply particularly to the last days. The prophecy therefore answers well to the Laodicean message of Revelation 3, which is a warning of the same nature, and which applies to the present time.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

No preaching of the gospel without the "glad tidings of the reign," the crown, the glory, and the consummation, can be a fulfillment of our Saviour's prediction. Hence it is the special closing message, the last great warning to the world, announcing the second coming of Christ, that our Saviour intended when he spoke this prediction. So the preaching of the gospel as proclaimed in ages past, alone cannot be what Christ meant by "this gospel of the kingdom." The glad tidings of salvation through Christ's death have been indeed a glorious gospel—the only hope of the world through past ages. But there is an added glory in the certainty that eternal life is about to take the place of mortal life, and joys that never end, the sorrows and trials of this world of sin, and the kingdom under the whole heaven, be put in power in place of the wicked powers of earth. The glad announcement of this glorious reign is the final proclamation of probation. This is comprehended in the threefold message of warning in Rev. 14:6-14. It can be no other. That message comprehends God's special work for the last days.

The age we live in is most remarkable for light upon the Scriptures and the prevalence of missionary operations among the nations of the world. Nothing has been seen like it since the apostolic age. These facts themselves are a sign of the nearness of the end. Dan. 12:4. The Bible is translated into more than two hundred different languages, so divine truth can be obtained by nearly all the nations of the earth. Missionary stations are scattered among the nations, here and there, in many parts of the world. Even into the earth's darkest corners the light of the gospel is entering. Yet up to the present time it cannot be truthfully said that this gospel of the kingdom has been preached in all the world for a testimony to all these nations.

1. As a certain evidence of this fact, the "end" has not yet come. Our Saviour said it would come when this is preached.

2. As we have shown, the gospel alone, without the announcement of the coming of the King in glory, cannot be a fulfillment of our Lord's prediction.

3. In all past ages, previous to the fulfillment of the great signs in the sun, moon, and stars, such an announcement could not be truthfully made. Neither has there been any time during those ages when even the gospel as ordinarily understood, has been preached in all the world to all nations as a "testimony."

4. Neither have the missionaries of our own times preached the gospel to a sufficient extent to fulfill this prediction. There are nations yet which have never had the labors of a single missionary, and many nations numbering many millions, where the numbers of missionaries are wholly inadequate to preach the gospel sufficiently to be a "witness," or a "testimony," to such nations.

5. Neither have these missionaries given "the good tidings of the reign," nor preached Christ's coming and the setting up of the kingdom of God, in the sense of Christ's prediction. It is a fact that more or less of the missionaries believe in Christ's soon coming, but many believe in the world's conversion first. And the object of societies in sending them to the heathen has, in many instances, been to bring about the temporal millennium. Such surely are not preaching the gospel of the kingdom.

6. Neither did the advent believers of 1840-44 fulfill this prediction completely. They felt the force of the prophecy we are considering, and sought to do their utmost in that direction. They sent papers and publications to various missionary stations. Sailors carried the glorious doctrine with them on their voyages. But who for a moment can believe that the 400,000,000 of China or the 300,000,000 of India and southern Asia, to say nothing of the vast multitudes of Africa, and other places, ever had this message given them as a witness or testimony in that short period? Missionary stations were far less extensive then than now. And yet they are far from being sufficiently extensive to accomplish such a work, even if there was a disposition to do it. And what renders the argument positive, is the fact that the "end" did not come then.

7. And lastly, but still more important than any of these considerations, the last-day message had not become complete, was not fully developed in 1844. It is as we have seen, a last-day message containing a threefold announcement; each particular of which is of immense importance to the world, and all of which must be embraced in "this gospel of the kingdom" to be proclaimed in all the world, as the last testimony to mankind. The advent believers in 1840-44 made the first feature prominent. The call to "fear God, and give glory to him" was presented in power. The close of the prophetic periods in 1844 was declared in deep solemnity, stirring the world mightily as far as they heard it. The hour of his judgment was announced, but they themselves at that time had little knowledge of the nature and true work of that judgment. That was left to be more fully developed, as greater light dawned upon their work. Just a few months previous to the close of prophetic time, in the autumn of 1844, the second feature of the message was announced—the fall of mystic Babylon—the consequences of rejecting light concerning the coming of Christ near. But that was merely the beginning of the great process, developed to a vastly greater extent since that, and still developing more and more conspicuously, till already the churches are assuming much the attitude of the church of Constantine's period, when Church and State united. While there are a few zealous Christians, compared with the great bulk of Protestant churches, who believe and teach the Lord's coming is near, the great majority of these churches not only have no interest in that doctrine, but bitterly oppose it. They are cold, formal, world-loving, and all kinds of sins are connected with these churches. As Paul declared, they have become "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away." 2 Tim. 3:1-5. The last-day proclamation must include a warning of these things, so deeply affecting the welfare of the world. The great body of professed Christianity in the last days is a spiritually dead mass, allied to the world, courting the civil power, and ready to persecute the believers in Christ's coming.

Again: the closing warning must include a loud cry against the great Catholic apostasy and its imitator, the Protestant image, in the last days. This most solemn threatening in all the Bible against "the beast" (the papal power), and the image made to resemble it by Protestants, must form a part of the last solemn message before it could be completely given. The work of God's people in conforming their practice to God's law as a whole—the Sabbath of the Lord included—cannot be ignored in "this gospel of the kingdom." It is a work predicted in many scriptures to be accomplished in the last days. Thus the three most important features brought to view in this grand warning message for the last days, must all have a place. All three are necessary, and must be given.

That proclamation is already going forth to many portions of the earth. It is now being given in many of the most important languages of the world. Its sound has already gone to many of the most important nations of the earth. America, Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australasia, are all hearing more or less of the truths of the closing message. Its sound has reached farther, and probably impressed more people than did the proclamation of 1843-44. Printing matter has been distributed far more widely. Many more agencies are enlisted, and their organization is more thoroughly perfected than then, and yet it is far from complete. Publishing houses, organized Conferences, earnest laborers, agents for circulating our reading-matter, etc., etc., are doing an important work in America, Great Britain, Scandinavia, Germany, France, and other European countries, and in Australia, New Zealand, and the islands of the ocean; while ship missionaries are working among the vessels which go to all lands, and agents are distributing reading-matter in many of the most important marts of commerce on the globe. A great and wonderful work has already been done. And the immediate future promises to see vastly more done; for the agencies are already in active operation, which have had to be created in the recent past.

The work is rapidly attaining an immense volume. The inquirer may say, "Do you think, then, that this message must go to every people and nation on the globe?" Most certainly, we reply. If that be so, must it not be a long time before the Lord will come?—That conclusion by no means follows. The progress already made, with the constantly increasing volume of the work, would in a few years, by methods and agencies already in use, grow to amazing proportions. But let the Lord work in the last days as he did in the apostolic age, and what should we not see? Humble Galileans spoke in a score of different languages, as the needs of the cause required; the sick were healed, and mighty works wrought wherever the servants of God went forth to labor. Why should not God work in connection with the proclamation of Christ's coming in glory, as well as at his coming as the babe of Bethlehem and the crucified Saviour?

The Bible plainly teaches a "latter rain" of the Spirit, as well as the "former rain" at the first advent. And every consideration would lead us to expect such an outpouring of the Spirit in the closing work of the gospel. Let that everywhere characterize the labor of God's servants, and a great work could be consummated in a short time, indeed. There are great blessings connected with the closing message of probation, and the preaching of the glad announcement of the reign of our Lord. We should expect them without doubt. Christ has said it should be preached in all the world for a testimony. Then the end will come. He has told us the truth. This unmistakably refers to the proclamation of the great threefold message of warning now going to the world, founded on the signs Christ gave of his near approach, and warning the world of the peculiar perils of the last days. These perils are upon us; yea, rapidly thickening all around us. The world must know of them. The burden of making the people acquainted with these great facts rests upon those who believe them. It is a burden which cannot be laid aside, and it is one which will be performed; for Christ has said so.

Every evidence of the work extending should fill our hearts with courage to do more. Every hindrance must be surmounted. Nothing can stop the onward progress of the work. It is the only one which explains the facts of the past Advent movement, the only logical, consistent platform for the consistent believer in Christ's soon coming to stand upon. "This gospel of the kingdom" is rapidly going to all the nations. The end must therefore be near.

JERUSALEM, SAMARIA, AND SODOM.

THE notion that mankind is to be granted another probation after this life, is one that is making insidious advances into the various so-called evangelical churches. The old landmarks which were erected by Christ, prophets, and apostles are now being rudely removed. The judgment is robbed of its most startling features; for it decides nothing finally; and the coming of Christ is looked upon as an event that may occur, and only a few persons know anything of it, or as a fact of news that may be telegraphed as an important item for the daily press! The grand events which the Bible describes

A Marvelous Manifestation of Satanic Power; a Last-day Sign.

"For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." Matt. 24:24. Where do these words of Christ apply? Do they apply in ages long past?—They cannot.

In earlier chapters it was shown that after Christ's ascension, false pretenders did appear among the Jews, claiming to be the long-promised Messiah. These were evidently referred to in verse 5: "For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many." Mr. Buck and other authors mention by name some twenty-four or more of these. They were all Jews, and sought to deceive the Jews who rejected Jesus. They professed to be the fulfillment of the prophetic predictions concerning the first advent of the Messiah, all of them denying Jesus' claims to the messiahship. The fact is apparent that there are two sets of these false Christs. The true has its counterfeits.

There would be none of these, were there nothing genuine to counterfeit. When the gospel of Christ went forth in power to the world, Satan, ever busy to thwart and injure the work of God, fulfilled this prediction of Christ by inciting men to pretend to be the Messiah the Jews had looked for so long. They fought to establish their claims, and as a result, multitudes were ruined, and many slain, in consequence of accepting them. In the reign of Adrian, about 131 A. D., under the pretended Christ, Bar-Cocheba, a vile robber, some 600,000 were slain, according to the best authors. But it was not said of these Jewish false Christs that they should "show great signs and wonders" to deceive, but of a class which should arise in the last days.

When Christ's second coming is near, the same work of counterfeiting should appear in another place, and of a far more dangerous character. How do we know but these false Christs which "show great signs and wonders," are those which commenced to manifest themselves soon after Christ's ascension? We are forced to a contrary conclusion by the connection in which this text is found, and by the statements made. Their coming is placed after the "great tribulation," which we have heretofore proved to close about a century since. The 1260 years allotted to the tribulation closed in 1798, and by the shortening of the tribulation "for the elect's sake," it preceded the close of the days a little. "Then," says Christ, "if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect. Behold, I have told you before. Wherefore, if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert; go not forth: behold, he is in the secret chambers; believe it not. For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Verses 23-27.

One leading thought of these texts of Scripture is this: a little previous to the actual appearing of Christ at his second advent, there will be a great effort, or series of efforts, rather, to confuse people's minds in regard to the nature of his coming. Among these efforts, one very prominent one will be the work of evil spirits, counterfeiting Christ's work, and teaching doctrines utterly subversive of the religion which he taught, and a strange, marvelous, and wonderful display of Satanic power, which will finally be carried to such an astonishing degree that it will utterly deceive all but the elect of God, or those who are saved by Christ when he comes. All the rest will be deceived to their ruin. "Great signs and wonders" will be shown. If it were possible, even the "elect" of God would be deceived. But this will be impossible, because the elect are such as are true and faithful, thoroughly conversant with God's word, fully warned of the perils of the last days, humble, earnest, devoted Christians, "who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." 1 Pet. 1:5. Such it is impossible to deceive, for the simple reason that they live up to the conditions upon which Christ offers salvation. Hence his word is pledged to save them by his grace and coming, and his word can never fail. All others will be deceived and lost.

The great effort of Satan, then, a little before Christ comes, is to lead away the minds of mankind from that event, by a variety of devices: "Lo here;" "lo there;" "behold he is in the desert;" "behold he is in the secret chambers;" "behold his power is manifest in the mighty signs and wonders displayed: this is his second advent." There are a variety of agents who engage in this work of diverting attention from the real and grandly important event of the last generation. Though all these cries tend to one and the same object,—keeping from the people's view the most glorious event this world ever has beheld or ever will behold—the coming of the Lord in his glory,—they will be discordant, contradictory voices; though all wrong, all will be used by the great enemy to accomplish one object. Our Saviour's command is to believe none of them. His coming is to be in no secret, retired, spiritualized manner, but public, startling, grand, beyond anything ever beheld, visible to all men living on our globe. More visible, brilliant, and dazzling than the sheet of brightest lightning which illuminates the whole visible heaven, to every one on the earth. This is his descriptive reply to all these "lo here's," and "lo there's." They are all false. In this chapter we shall have space for only one of these last-day counterfeits and deceptions, noticing others later. It is proper at this point to notice parallel scriptures which speak of this predicted movement of Satanic power in the last days, the work of false Christs and prophets.

"Bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples. And I will wait for the Lord, that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for him. Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel from the Lord of hosts, which dwelleth in Mount Zion. And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits and unto the wizards, that chirp and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? on behalf of the living should they seek unto the dead? To the law and to the testimony! if they speak not according to this word, surely there is no morning for them. And they shall pass through it, hardly bestead and hungry: and it shall come to pass that, when they shall be hungry, they shall fret themselves, and curse by their king and by their God, and turn their faces upward: and they shall look unto the earth, and behold, distress and darkness, the gloom of anguish; and into thick darkness they shall be driven away." Isa. 8:16-22, Revised Version. This is a remarkable scripture. None can fail to locate it who have ever studied their Bibles and the doctrine of Christ's soon coming, with the clear light of the great message of the last days.

"Bind up the testimony," "seal the law among my disciples." This is the only text of the Old Testament where the word "disciples" occurs. It applies therefore to this dispensation. "The testimony" undoubtedly is God's law of the ten commandments. It is so-called many times. It is to be bound up, a necessary inference, therefore, that it has been separated, or a portion of it removed. The "seal" is once more to be applied to the law among Christ's true disciples. This is the last work of the true church, under the last solemn message: "Here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." Rev. 14:12. "Here is the patience of the saints." When is this?—When the prophet says some "will wait for the Lord," and "look for him." This clearly refers to the time when the Lord is near, and a class are looking for his soon return. At such a time there will be many with "familiar spirits," "wizards" that "chirp and mutter" and seek to "the dead" for knowledge.

Right here the people are referred to God's great standard of right, as the detector of spurious spiritual agencies. "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light [margin, no morning] in them." Perpetual night, the blackness of despair, and eternal ruin are the portion of all whose lives do not harmonize with that standard. How plain is this evidence that a great reform is to be proclaimed in the last days, of which the law of God is to be a prominent feature. This is a leading element of the last message of warning to go to the world. That law has been tampered with by the man of sin, Daniel's little horn, who thought to change that law, and exalted himself above God by seeking to change it, and claiming to have succeeded (Dan. 7:25; 2 Thess. 2:3, 4) by placing the Sunday in the place of God's holy Sabbath, and calling on mankind to obey him instead of God. The last work, then, of the true church, will place in their practice God's Sabbath in its rightful position, and spurn the interloper from pagan and papal sources.

The prophet agrees with our Saviour in here predicting a great work of counterfeit miracles, connected with familiar spirits—spirits supposed to be of the dead, coming back to communicate with the living and impart their wisdom. But the inference is plain that such will not harmonize with "the law and the testimony," and are therefore to be rejected. There is no morning of glory for such. They are driven to darkness at last.

St. Paul refers to the same subject: "In the last days perilous times shall come." He gives a terrible catalogue of eighteen sins which should specially characterize the last days. We have only to look about us to see them everywhere. He then introduces the subject we are considering, "Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth: men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith. But they shall proceed no further: for their folly shall be manifest unto all men, as theirs also was." 2 Tim. 3:1-9. Jannes and Jambres were evidently the two magicians in Pharaoh's court, who wrought miracles by the agency of Satanic influence, to counterfeit and thwart the work of Moses, whom God commissioned to perform mighty works at an important crisis in ages past. These magicians by their enchantments appeared to perform the same miracles that Moses did in opposition to the work of God for that time. But at last their folly was shown; the plagues afflicting them, they soon disappeared from view, after terrible calamities had come upon the people for refusing to obey God. Ex. 7:11, 22; 8:7, 18, 19; 9:11.

The apostle says it will be so in the last days. "So" means in like manner. Then there will be a class in the last days that will work miracles to deceive, and to oppose the work of God, hinder the message he has sent to warn the people, and cause the ruin of multitudes. But they will perish miserably, as did those in ancient times. A most important truth, greatly needed to be understood in our time, is the fact that there are two mighty spiritual miracle-working, supernatural powers in our world, which are opposed to each other. If the Bible makes anything plain, it does this great fact.

Paul also says, "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." 1 Tim. 4:1. The most obvious meaning of "latter times" is the last days of this dispensation. The apostle could not make the fact more emphatic by human language than he has that "seducing spirits and doctrines of devils" will prevail in the last days. God's Spirit "expressly" declares it as a fact of vast importance, and many will give up the true faith to receive the teaching of these spirits. He also brings the same fact before us in 2 Thess. 2:9. After telling the Thessalonian church that the Lord's coming would not take place in their day, but that a great apostasy must first occur in the church, and "the man of sin"—the papacy—must first be developed, who would exalt "himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped," he then locates the time when the brightness of Christ's coming would be seen. "Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send [i.e., permit to be sent] them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." 2 Thess. 2:9-12.

Just before Christ's coming, then, Satan is to work "with all power, and signs, and lying wonders." Such a work will transcend anything ever exhibited by this great adversary of Christ, in any past age. He has been always specially busy in every great religious crisis during the past ages. He deceived the masses before the flood. At the exode he performed many wonderful works counterfeiting the work of God. When Christ came, he sought to deceive Christ himself in the temptation in the wilderness, placing him on the pinnacle of the temple and seeking to bribe him from the self-denying pathway of suffering and death, by offering him all the kingdoms of the world, if he would only recognize his Satanic Majesty as a superior. Multitudes possessed with demons were scattered through those countries. Sorcerers sought to hinder the gospel. But Satan's greatest deceptions are reserved for the last great struggle in the time of the end. Six thousand years' experience in deception qualify him for special proficiency in ruining the human family. "All deceivableness of unrighteousness" is certainly the very acme of all deception—something so dangerous that none, as Christ says, but the very elect can escape it. This work is already in our world, molding public opinion, and making millions of votaries. It is a wonderful last-day sign.

DID ABRAHAM KEEP THE SABBATH?

A WRITER in the Sunday-school Times, in an article upon the "Rest Day," attempts to show that Abraham did not keep the Sabbath. He thinks he finds a reason in that they led a pastoral life, caring for their flocks; and having abundance of leisure every day, they did not need a weekly day of rest. Thus he says:—

"The description of Abraham's faithfulness in his house makes no mention of his enjoining the day of rest on his family. This omission has been found puzzling, but it is perfectly explicable. Until the exodus, the elect seed had not attained to that social development which fitted them to exhibit the divine image in labor and in rest. From the days of Abel they had had but one occupation—the keeping of sheep, an employment designed to fit them for understanding and sympathizing with God's care of his people. But the shepherd's life is not one which alternates between strenuous work and earned repose. Its duties must be much the same on one day as on another. It has abundance of leisure on every day. So the Sabbath could not come to the front until a more advanced industrial condition was reached."

If the above supposition is correct, that the Sabbath arises from "social development" rather than from the command of God to commemorate the creation of the heavens and the earth and the spiritual needs of mankind, of course it follows that where the same social conditions are not realized, then there is no necessity for a Sabbath; or in other words, the Sabbath need not be observed where there is not enough "strenuous labor" to make one feel the need of an "earned repose." If this is true, then all those whose labors are not very arduous have no necessity for the Sabbath! The number of those who upon such grounds have no need of the Sabbath, is very great. There are many thousands of shepherds now, probably far more than there were in the days of Abraham. Nor is it at all probable that the majority of men attended sheep in the days of Abraham. The number of producers and consumers must then, as now, have balanced each other by the natural law of supply and demand. To assume, as this writer does, that the Sabbath was only given to the "elect seed," is to assume that God did not provide for one of the greatest wants of the majority of the human family.

But how does the writer know that Abraham did not keep the Sabbath?—Because there is no record of his "enjoining the day of rest on his family." This looks like drawing a very great conclusion from an exceedingly attenuated premise. He did not enjoin the Sabbath upon his family. How do you know?—It is not so recorded. Very well; now we are prepared to ask a few questions upon some other points. Is there any record that Abraham enjoined upon his family the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal"?—There is no such record. Where is it recorded of Abraham that he enjoined upon his family the commandment, "Thou shalt not commit adultery"?—It cannot be found. Do the recorded acts of Abraham specifically mention that he commanded his family in regard to honoring parents, coveting, murder, etc.?—They do not. What, then, shall we conclude was the patriarch's custom upon these vital points of morality and virtue? If we should adopt the method of reasoning of this writer in the Times, we should conclude that this silence was "perfectly explicable," on the ground that they "had not attained to that social development which fitted them to exhibit the divine image" in these things! We are not going to take such a position, for the simple reason that there would be no soundness in it; and yet it is just as sound as the one advanced by this writer in reference to the Sabbath.

There is one general statement made about Abraham in the Scriptures, which has in it a great depth of meaning. God said to Abraham: "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed: because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws." Gen. 26:4, 5. And again he said of him: "For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord." Gen. 18:19. It therefore appears that in the days of Abraham God had stated commandments and laws, and when we consider the fact that the Sabbath was sanctified or appointed at the close of creation week, there is certainly as much evidence that the appointed day of rest was one of the "commandments" which Abraham kept, as there is that the command not to worship images was kept by him. This is further strengthened by the fact that after the deliverance of Abraham's descendants from bondage, and before the law of the Sabbath was formally proclaimed on Mount Sinai, those who went out to gather manna upon the rest day were rebuked of God in the following words: "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?" Ex. 16:28. In this rebuke to Abraham's descendants for what they did not do, almost exactly similar terms are used to tell what their father Abraham did do. From the concurrent testimony of these scriptures, it is therefore easier specifically to prove that Abraham kept the Sabbath than it is to show that he kept any other one of the ten commandments, unless it be the commandment which says, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me;" and this commandment embraces all the other ten, the fourth as well as the rest, so that one cannot truly keep the first without keeping all the rest, and any violation of the fourth commandment would also be a breach of this first commandment.

But what was the real object of the Sabbath? Upon this point the greatest mistake of all is made; for upon a misapprehension of the object of the Sabbath, the fallacious reasoning we have been considering is based. Physical rest is the sum total of the idea which this writer seems to find in the Sabbath rest. Upon this idea his argument of "strenuous work" followed by "earned repose," is based. Physical rest, however, far from being the object of the weekly rest, is merely an incidental in Sabbath observance. An "earned repose" upon the Sabbath may not have in it any of the elements of true Sabbath-keeping. Some people read the fourth commandment very carelessly. This is about the way they render it: "Remember the Sabbath day and keep from working; for in six days you will get very tired with your strenuous work, and you will be in great need of an earned repose!" Nothing could be more false or contrary to the true meaning and object of Sabbath-keeping. The reason given for the Sabbath in the commandment which enjoins it, is very specific in its statement of the reason underlying the commandment, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it." Ex. 20:11. Here is the reason, and it is very plainly stated. Not a word about "strenuous work," or anything like it, not a hint of "earned repose," nothing about its being particularly applicable when "a more advanced industrial condition was reached;" but the commandment is based upon the grand facts recorded in Genesis 1 and 2, that in "six days the Lord made heaven and earth."

The Sabbath is the memorial of the creation of the heavens and the earth. It was sanctified or set apart,—appointed for man before he had sinned,—and when the prospect before him was not one of arduous work, but of a life of delightful occupation and possession of the earth, over which, at God's command, he was to have dominion. The facts of creation and man's need of a commemorative institution to keep before him a reminder of God as the Creator, and consequently as the one to whom he owed allegiance, were just as true at the close of the first week of time, and during the patriarchal age, as they were at any subsequent time of the earth's history, and no social development could make the necessity any greater. To keep the Sabbath simply as a day of relaxation from toil, for the recuperation of the bodily powers, is not keeping it at all; and he who does not keep it for the reasons specified in the commandment, that he may give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name, ceasing from the common avocations of life, that he may better consider the work of God's hands and yield to him becoming reverence as the Creator and upholder of all things, does not fulfill the Sabbath commandment, no matter how hard he has labored, nor how much he enjoys his repose. The Sabbath was given to mankind before sin had entered his fair domain. When sin had entered there, and the majority of the sons of men were forgetting their Creator, and were turning to the worship of the heavenly bodies,—turning from the Creator to that which he had created,—how necessary was the Sabbath to preserve in their minds the Creator of the heavens and the earth.

The patriarch Abraham was one who remembered God and separated himself from his father's house, who were idolaters, that he might be faithful to God. And as we have shown that the keeping of the Sabbath was the divinely appointed barrier against idolatry, since it was a weekly reminder of the creation, we are therefore confident that the "father of the faithful" was a consistent observer of the Sabbath of the Lord.

King Herod was a very wicked man when he killed the apostle James and tried to put Peter to death; but it was when in the pride of his wicked heart, he made an oration before the people, that the angel of the Lord smote him, "because he gave not God the glory." His case furnishes a strong commentary on the sinfulness of pride.

As the time draws near when we expect to go upon a journey for pleasure or worldly profit, we begin to make preparation for it. But how many professedly expect in a short time to go on the greatest and most eventful journey that could be imagined,—that from earth to the abode of God,—and yet are making no particular preparation in view of it. Possibly they expect to make preparation all at once, when they cannot possibly put it off any longer; but they will discover when too late, that it cannot be done that way.

that God has for him is done, and his earthly warfare has been accomplished. Until this time he will be continually learning of God's will toward him, finding new work to do, and meeting new trials of his faith.

Without experience there can be no progress. As in any other school, the first lessons must be learned before succeeding steps can be taken. Experience means the learning of lessons in the school of Christ. The experience of one day, one month, one year, should be based upon that of the preceding one. If faith grows no stronger, it can grasp nothing in addition to what it already holds; it can teach no new lessons beyond what have already been learned. With no additional faith, there is no additional experience. The one cannot be separated from the other.

Experience is needed in time of trial. It is then a source of knowledge and encouragement. The Christian can then "call to remembrance the former days," where he proved God by believing his word, and found him faithful thereto, a God of infinite grace and mercy and strength. Trials which might formerly have been too great for him, tests which might have been too severe, he can then endure, because of the strength gained by former experience. Having been in trials before, he knows better what to do himself and what God is willing to do for him.

The people of God in this age are to meet with trials and tests of faith as great as any that have been experienced in former times, if not greater. They are even to pass through the perilous and trying scenes of the close of earthly history,—through the ordeal of the time of trouble and the fearful delusions of Satan's great final effort for the destruction of the race; and what will they do at such a time without a solid Christian experience? Can the qualities of mind and soul which will be needed then be expected to appear all developed in a moment, because they are called for by the circumstances? Evidently, they cannot. The untried recruit does not become the veteran soldier in a day. He cannot be assigned to the veteran's position without an experience which has tested him and developed in him a fitness for the place. And who would be so venturesome as to meet the trials and Satanic deceptions of the days to come, by which, if it were possible, he will deceive the very elect, without that confidence in God that comes from oft repeated proofs of his grace and power, and that knowledge of his will which only an acquaintance with him can give? He who does will surely realize his loss in the trying times that are before us.

The Bible abounds in the incidents which make up the experiences of the worthies of ancient times; and these were written for our admonition and benefit. There is perhaps no more valuable one for our consideration than that of Jacob on the night before his meeting with Esau. He began that night in great fear and trouble, and found himself ere long engaged in what seemed a struggle for his life. But he did not give up in despair, and when he realized the real nature of his conflict, he was equally earnest in seeking the divine blessing. Through the long night of darkness and distress he clung to life and to hope by the single hold of his faith. It was a night in which he lived by faith and that alone. But when the morning came, he was able to say, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved." What a source of strength and comfort this was to him, as he went forward to his meeting with Esau. This is the experience that is needed by the Christian as he pursues his journey along his difficult and dangerous pathway here. He should pass through many places upon which he can look back and say, "I have seen God face to face." Having this experience, his pathway will indeed be as the shining light, that shineth brighter and brighter, unto the perfect day.

We gain experience by proving God, and we prove him by believing his promises. As we step out upon these in faith, one by one, we are brought into closer relation with God, and learn more of his nature and what he is able to do for us. As trials are encountered, the Christian finds that "tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience, hope." And in the darkest hours before us, this hope and faith, gained by the victories of the past, will sustain the Christian until the dawn which brings to him deliverance.

Now is the time to gain an experience that will prepare us for victory in the time of trial and trouble that is before us.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

ONLY one more important testimony on this subject will be noticed. The revelator, in describing the seven last plagues, the last terrible judgments which will at the close of probation sweep multitudes to ruin, presents the work of these false spirits. "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon [paganism], and out of the mouth of the beast [the leopard beast of Revelation 13—the papal power], and out of the mouth of the false prophet [that portion of Protestantism which rejects the truth of God for the last days, and joins with the civil power in persecuting God's people]. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. Behold, I come as a thief." Rev. 16:13-15.

The work of these "spirits of devils" performing miracles to deceive, is something requiring time. They could not thus affect the great religious systems of the world in a moment. Years would elapse during which in various guises they were attracting the attention of multitudes all over the earth. This would be necessary in order that their influence might become sufficiently potent to effect such great results. Their true nature will not be discerned, else there were no deception. Their work will be made so to resemble the popular conception of God's work, that the great mass will fully believe it to be that. It will have a strong religious cast or cloak. The world will be made to believe it is the work of God indeed. It will hide itself under popular religious theories thought to be glorious truths. In this way it will deceive all who have not a love for the truth of God and fully believe his word.

All these testimonies—and others as well—clearly point to the same great fact of which our Saviour speaks, when he says false Christs and false prophets shall show great signs and wonders, and deceive all but the very elect. Let the reader notice that every one of these scriptures locates this remarkable work in the last days, just before our Lord appears. This work of the Satanic spirits, then, is a most prominent last-day sign.

Have its preliminary workings been witnessed in our time? It is a remarkable fact that in the year 1848, just a few years after the great Advent proclamation so stirred the people, such a revival of ancient necromancy, sorcery, witchcraft, and demoniacal possession made its debut into our modern world. It commenced in the little village of Hydesville, N. Y., near the city of Rochester, and hence was called the "Rochester knockings," from its first manifestation by raps in the room. Several daughters of the Fox family were the first "mediums," as these occult workers were designated. It soon began to be seen in various phases besides the rappings, such as table-tipping, writing, speaking, clairvoyant mediums, etc. Numberless investigations have been held. In vast numbers of instances, even when held by most learned and scientific men, investigators have become fully convinced of the presence of supernatural power, and with this conviction have accepted the so-called spiritual philosophy.

Founded on one of the most popular religious dogmas of this age, that of the natural immortality of the soul, and claiming to be from the spirits of the departed dead returned to commune with and instruct relatives and friends, and teach a set of very liberal (?) views of the future state, Spiritualism has made rapid progress in the forty years of its modern history. There are many millions of its believers who openly espouse its cause, with a far greater number of millions who accept the basis or platform upon which it is founded,—the intelligent consciousness of departed spirits, and their willingness to communicate with those still in material form on earth. Vast numbers who would not for a moment identify themselves with out and out Spiritualists, are yet drinking in the seductive doctrines of this wonderful delusion, and only waiting the time when the great master spirit who marshals the hosts of fallen angels, shall think it wise more fully to counterfeit the appearances of our departed friends; or God's restraining power be withdrawn.

Founded on Satan's first great lie to mother Eve in Eden, when tempting her to partake of the forbidden fruit: "Ye shall not surely die," and squarely contradicting the plain statement of inspiration: "The dead know not anything" (Gen. 3:4; Eccl. 9:5), it is peculiarly calculated to deceive the great masses of our world's inhabitants who believe in the conscious existence of the dead. What could be more agreeable than this possibility, yea, the certain knowledge, which Spiritualists so boldly and stoutly claim to demonstrate, that we can hold communion with our departed relatives and friends? Already vast numbers believe, yea, are very certain that they have actually seen and shaken hands with dead friends, who appeared before them as in life, whose voices were familiar, gazing into their eyes, referring to incidents known only to the person and supposed spirit, and conversing freely of things entirely unknown to any persons present save themselves.

It is a striking fact that the great majority who enter upon an investigation of the phenomena of modern Spiritism, come out of it strong believers. And when we consider the nature of this new force as revealed in Scripture, the fact that there have been numerous cases of fraud, cheating, and deception practiced by its mediums, proves nothing against the supernatural character of many well-authenticated demonstrations of its marvelous, wonder-working power. Satan is the father of lies. Deception is his constant weapon, his masterpiece in working. "All deceivableness of unrighteousness," is just what the Scripture declares will characterize his last-day working. "He deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do." Such a power works as naturally through deception as by any other means. Deception in any form is perfectly consistent with his character.

In its earlier manifestations the Satanic character of this movement was very apparent. Its leading advocates denied the existence of a personal God, denied Christ, the Bible's inspiration, the value of the atonement, the existence of sin, a future judgment, the authority of God's law, teaching that it was better to break than to keep it. They denied the sacredness of the marriage relation, and gave the freest license to every lust and carnal desire. These bold avowals were doubtless necessary at first, that the true nature of this astounding work might be manifest, and that the honest might be able to know its true character. God could not permit such a marvelous work to appear in the guise of righteousness and purity at first, lest the truly honest and conscientious should be led astray and ruined. Hence its blasphemous nature was made apparent for years in its early history.

But every student who has been scrutinizing the doings of this mysterious force, has discerned a great change in later years. It now presents itself with an appearance more respectable. It has its congregations; its lecturers are becoming "ministers," who often attach "Rev." to their names. In short, it is covering itself with a religious garb—the wolf with the sheep's coat. In this way it is reaching a far more respectable class of people, even those who seem to be religious.

Already it is going to the kings and great men of the earth; kings, queens, judges of courts, generals and officers of the army, senators, representatives, governors, and vast numbers connected with government have accepted its teachings. It numbers many millions. So widely scattered are its adherents, and so connected with other societies, and in many cases those who cherish its teachings are so fearful of public opinion and of the gossip of tongues, that it is utterly impossible to ascertain its numbers. But year by year they are increasing more and more. Of late years it is doing a more silent work, and many are forgetting its earlier blasphemies and notorious character, and becoming hopeful that it has reformed. But just as sure as the inspired word declares that Satan transforms himself "into an angel of light," and will deceive by "great signs and wonders" all but "the very elect," in the last days (2 Cor. 11:14; Matt. 24:24), just so sure is he certain to appear in his last great deception in a religious garb, to deceive the great masses of mankind to their eternal ruin.

When the time shall come, as it undoubtedly will, that "the spirits of devils working miracles" shall appear in human form, personating our dead friends, speaking of past experiences known to us alone, claiming our sympathy, and appearing as our guardian spirits, vast multitudes believing in the immortality of the soul will be swept into this last-day delusion, as the foaming torrent sweeps along the light objects it encounters. The world is just in the condition for such a deception to succeed. It would come as a part of that "progress" which is now so fashionable and taking. The statements of Scripture have little force to change popular belief in our time. That which is popular, which pleases the masses, is the thing which succeeds. The favorite sentiment in these days is this: "There is nothing that succeeds like success." Whatever falls in with public sentiment, captures the masses. Few believe the Saviour's declaration: "Wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat," while the way that leads to life is narrow, and "few there be that find it." It is but a "little flock" which will be gathered at last, compared with the multitude who are lost. Matt. 7:13; Luke 12:32.

SHALL WE HAVE A PAPAL LEGATE AT WASHINGTON?

It will be remembered by the readers of the REVIEW that the Roman Catholic Church has a regularly accredited commissioner to the World's Fair. All the other commissioners represent either the States of the American Union, or foreign States, and as such are representatives of secular power. The papal commissioner represents either secular and civil power or spiritual power. If he claims to represent civil power of the pope, then the directors of the World's Fair have recognized what the powers of Europe have refused to recognize, and what was actually taken away from the pope by the king of Italy. On the other hand, if the papal commissioner represents only spiritual power, then the directors of the Fair have recognized the spiritual power of the pope.

If spiritual powers are to be recognized, and have a commissioner at the Fair, then Mohammedanism, Buddhism, and the various divisions of Christianity also have a right to a commissioner, and space for a religious exhibit. Indeed, we see that the Methodists are moving toward having a Methodist exhibition, but whether they will appoint a commissioner or not, remains to be seen. If they do, they will simply be moving in a parallel line with Rome. Rome, however, has not yet secured all she wants in this country, and encouraged by the readiness with which a papal commissioner was received at the World's Fair, she desires to go a step further and have an accredited legate or nuncio at Washington! It is now stated in the papers that that is one of the questions which was submitted to the conclave of archbishops at their late meetings in New York City. Thus a leading cleric said to a New York reporter:—

"I notice that the newspapers have neglected to state one of the topics to be discussed by the conference; viz., the advisability of placing at Washington a duly accredited representative of the Vatican.

"For many years American statesmen have disagreed upon the question of this government recognizing the authority of a papal nuncio. It has been held that if the President should receive as one of his diplomatic family a representative of the pope, such action might be construed as a recognition of the pope's claim to temporal sovereignty. . . . I believe that no international complication can possibly grow out of such action."

A representative of the Roman Catholic Church at the capital of this nation would indeed be a strange thing, and would mark a new and aggressive era in the history of Romanism in this country. A papal legate at Washington naturally follows a papal commissioner at the Fair. The reasons that are adduced for one, may with equal assurance be urged for the other.

The "cleric" quoted above thought there could be no serious objection to a papal nuncio at Washington. He seems to have the idea that the objections that would be raised in this country against a papal legate at Washington, would be on the ground that it would be a recognition of the temporal power of the pope. We think that in this he has not correctly interpreted the feelings of the Protestants of the United States. Protestants in the United States do not care much about the temporal power of the pope in Italy. They are willing to let the pope and the king of Italy settle that question between themselves. The establishment of the temporal power of the pope in any one of or all the countries of Europe, and the recognition of it by our government, would not cause the Protestants of this country to feel the alarm that they would feel to have a man at Washington, representing the mighty spiritual power of the pope as exercised upon the millions of Catholics of this country. The whole power and influence of all the Catholics of the United States, strengthened by the support of all the Catholics in the world, and directed by the most cunning and unscrupulous men, could in this case at once be brought to bear upon the government, to influence its legislation, and to do whatever that church in her secret conclaves shall recommend to be done. And if the Catholic Church imagines that the Protestants of this country will look tamely on while they are intrenching themselves at the seat of this government, they are greatly mistaken. We believe that an attempt to establish a papal representative at Washington would stir the Protestants of this country to a degree never before seen. We also believe that if this Jesuitical plan shall succeed, the large Protestant denominations, like the Methodists, will not rest until they also have a representative at Washington. Thus the country will be turned into two great hostile religious camps, and even political parties may be arranged upon religious, instead of upon political, grounds.

The United States Supreme Court having decided that this is a Christian nation, the different leading bodies which claim to represent the Christianity of this country, are growing anxious to know what church or churches are to be recognized as Christian, and are to be taken under the support and protection of the government. It may therefore be expected that the government will be besieged by representatives of those churches who claim that they represent true Christianity, and will seek from the government a recognition of their claims.

The events of the last few years have made two things certain: (1) The Catholic Church is determined to control the United States; and, (2) the great Protestant denominations are just as eager to get the control of the government as the Catholics are. Of course both parties are laboring in the interests of moral reforms (?) and the betterment of the world by some system of law that shall compel people to perform certain religious observances. These two parties may not agree upon all points, but the Protestants appear to be more anxious to enforce the papal Sunday than even the Catholics themselves. Upon this they are now nearly united, only differing as to the strictness with which the day should be observed. Thus step by step the prophecies relating to our time and to this country are fulfilling. Who among us are heeding the instruction, "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch"? Mark 13:37.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

WE are living in the time of which the prophet wrote: "Many shall run to and fro." And though this may not be restricted to those who travel to increase knowledge, still it is very evident that inter-communication and the universal commingling of men is one of the most effective circumstances now at work, quickening the minds of men, and leading out to new fields of knowledge in every line. Seventh-day Adventists seem destined to do their share of this work of dissemination in the last days. The commission given to us many years ago directs our work to "every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people." I sometimes wonder at the narrowness of my vision twenty-five years ago, when I expected the work of the Lord to wind up, when as yet the message of warning and of preparation had not been heard outside of the northern States, and but faintly in them. Now the conviction is fastening itself upon my mind that at present I come as far short of comprehending the future as I then did of seeing what I now see. So far, at every advance step the work has broadened before us, and still the unreached horizon extends afar on every hand.

One thing should encourage us very much, and that is that wherever we have gone so far, the Spirit of God has pioneered the way, and prepared hearts for the reception of the truth. To me it seems evident that we need to exercise more faith in God, even trusting in him to open the way, and provide means that to us appear altogether unavailable.

These reflections will hardly be deemed "sketches of travel," though they introduce one of the reasons why these long journeys are necessary. That will be a blessed day when such journeys are no longer necessary; when they shall no more teach every man his brother, saying, "Know the Lord," when the dangers and discomforts of travel upon onerous missions give place to happy visits with kindred spirits in every part of the universe, where there is no more separation, no death, no unhappy contingencies to mingle with our experiences abroad. Under the present conditions, travel has but little or nothing to make it desirable.

My leave-taking from Melbourne was rendered as pleasant as possible by the kind love and interest of many friends. A meeting was held the previous evening, and after suitable remarks by brethren White, Starr, and the writer, prayers were offered in behalf of the mission upon which I was about to enter. On Monday eve, Oct. 10, I took train for Adelaide, there overtaking the ship. I had one day at that place, and spent it very pleasantly at the temporary home of sister White, and in company with brother A. G. Daniels. It was gratifying to see a manifest improvement in sister White's condition of health, though she was still quite infirm. But we have faith that she will yet be able to accomplish her work in these colonies. As we bowed around the family altar, we felt that the Lord drew very near, and graciously heard our prayers.

At noon on the 12th of October, I embarked on the steamship "Massilia" for the first stage of my journey to Colombo, on the island of Ceylon, which lies at the southern extremity of India, distant from Melbourne nearly five thousand miles. The voyage from Adelaide occupies two weeks, and lies through the Southern and Indian oceans. The sea has been much of the way reasonably tranquil, and the discomforts small. From Colombo I shall go preferably to Calcutta, if we are in time for the boat; but that being doubtful, it is probable I shall enter India at Bombay, and proceed to Calcutta by rail.

The monotony of the sea voyage has been rendered more disagreeable by the prevailing folly and sensuous pleasures sought by most of the passengers. The daily program is to surfeit, play cards, smoke, drink, bet on the ship's run, and "kill time" with the most foolish reading and conversation. With what unspeakable gratitude do we realize, in such a time, that our citizenship is in heaven, and we draw near to God with a depth of affection we have not before known.

Much assistance in the preparation for my visit to India has been given by brother D. Lacey of Hobart, who was fifteen years in that country in government service. From him I received letters to persons of prominence, both in civil and mission service. Also for fellow-passengers I have several people who live in different parts of the country. From them much valuable information has been obtained, which when verified by observation, will be given to the REVIEW.

My journey, as I have planned, leads me through northern India during November, through Egypt and Palestine in December, in Italy the early part of January, and after brief calls at Basel, Paris, and London, to reach Battle Creek in time for the general meetings.

few months, which will greatly increase the efficiency of the institution. We noted with interest the large number attending the temperance and training class. If this important line of work received the recognition that it deserves, many more would be giving it attention than now are. How much we need the true missionary spirit!

Nov. 23 we started for the East by way of Portland and Walla Walla. At Portland we spoke at the canvassers' institute, which was in progress at that time, being conducted by brother F. L. Mead. Sabbath, Nov. 26, was spent at Milton, and the following day we went to Walla Walla. Here we met Professor Prescott, who will remain until after the school opens. We are now on our way again, expecting to reach Battle Creek the 3rd inst.

PETITIONERS AND PETITIONS.

THE claim was made in Congress by Senator Hawley, and re-affirmed by representatives of the Church party in whose interests he was working, that forty million of the people of the United States were petitioning Congress for Sunday-closing of the World's Fair. Afterward the Christian Statesman quoted and indorsed a statement from Senator Pettigrew that one fourth of all the signatures on the petitions sent in to Congress were from Pennsylvania. This apparent discrepancy the Statesman now undertakes to adjust by saying that "petitions and signatures are not synonymous." This statement shows just where the fraud in connection with the petitions for Sunday-closing comes in. One signature is alleged to stand for more than one (a great many more, it may be) petitioner. The signature of one minister is counted for those of his entire church. The signature of Cardinal Gibbons attached to his letter favoring religious legislation, a few years since, was in the same way made to represent the whole Catholic membership in the United States. It ought not to be necessary to tell any fair-minded person that such a method of obtaining and counting petitioners is fraudulent in its very essence.

Where did Senator Hawley and the Statesman get their forty million petitioners? By reference to the Statesman of Aug. 6, we discover the process of mathematical conjuring by which they were made to appear and terrify the members of the fifty-second Congress. It is furnished by Mr. Crafts himself, thus,—

"The members of evangelical churches, of which all but two or three small bodies have so protested, number thirteen millions. Add twice as many more for the members of their families, the usual allowance for 'adherents,' and we have thirty-nine millions. Nine States out of ten that have voted on this subject by legislature or State commission, have voted against Sunday-opening. Adding those in these States who are not members of evangelical churches, would carry the numbers of those who by their religious and civil representative bodies asked for closing, far above forty millions, without counting those unofficially represented by the three Catholic archbishops who have declared for closing, nor those, not otherwise counted, who are in the constituency of numerous agricultural and industrial organizations that have voted for it."

No wonder the legislators at Washington were frightened at such a spectral array, and were glad of any way to appease them; but let us also make a calculation. Let us see if the rule is so poor that it will not work both ways.

According to Mr. Crafts's statement, there are thirteen million evangelical church-members in this country. The Catholics, he says, are unofficially represented in the matter, and as Cardinal Gibbons favors Sunday-opening, it may fairly be presumed that the bulk of American Catholics also favor it, he being their leader. But to be as fair as possible, we will leave them out of the matter entirely, not counting them as petitioners on either side. This leaves about forty-five million United States citizens who are not members of any church. Now as these thirteen millions are largely composed of young people, it will certainly be a fair estimate to say that twenty millions of people between the same ages are not church-members. These have not petitioned for Sunday-closing, and may therefore be presumed not to favor it. Now "add twice as many more for the members of their families, the usual allowance for 'adherents,' and we have" sixty millions! These are opposed to Sunday-closing, or at least have not signified any desire for it. This, as the reader will see, is a third more than the number who have petitioned for Sunday-closing. What will Congress do in the face of a calculation like this? Will they dare to "insult" these sixty million citizens by refusing to repeal the closing law? We shall see.

This, of course, simply illustrates the absurdity of the Statesman's calculation, and shows the fraudulent nature of the claims with which Mr. Crafts and others frightened the members of Congress last summer. We think it not improbable, however, that nearly, if not quite, sixty millions of our citizens either are opposed to Sunday-closing of the Fair, or do not care whether it is closed or not. As the various State commissioners were not authorized to represent the people of their respective States in the matter of Sunday-closing, we have not deemed that point worthy of notice.

To this add the fact that whenever and wherever the people of the country have spoken upon the subject directly and individually, there has been a very large majority in favor of Sunday-opening, as instanced by the six thousand postal-cards sent out by the World's Fair directors, the replies sent to the New York World and the Chicago Post, etc., and the ghostly nature of Messrs. Hawley and Crafts's forty million petitioners becomes apparent. There were a great many more "petitions" than petitioners.

The Statesman admits that out of 150,000 petitions sent out to church-members, only 10,000 came back to be forwarded to Congress, but in explanation says that many of these 10,000 petitions were adopted by "church congresses of ministers and laymen acting for whole denominations." The readiness which these self-styled "successors of the prophets" manifest to think and act for other people in matters both spiritual and temporal, is truly remarkable. But the people can dispense with their services in everything pertaining to the World's Fair. They are fully competent to think and act for themselves.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

OUR Saviour declares in the scripture we are considering that there "shall arise false Christs" in the last days. There has never been and never can be but one true Christ or Messiah. The Bible recognizes but one person with this designation,—the divine Son of God, associated with the Father, of the same substance, his agent or partner in making the worlds, who was incarnated, taking our nature in order that he might show his unutterable love for a race of rebels by suffering death in their behalf. At the proper age he was anointed by the descent of the Holy Spirit descending in visible form upon him, God the Father at that instant testifying in an audible voice: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Matt. 3:17. At that moment he became the Anointed One, and entered upon his special work as the Messiah, or Christ, these words meaning the anointed one. Acts 10:37, 38; John 1:41, margin. Jesus the true Messiah labored for man during his ministry of three years and a half, then died on the cross in the sinner's stead, was raised from the dead, ascended to heaven, has ministered as our great high priest for eighteen centuries, and will come again in glory to save his people and restore our rebel world to its Eden glory, destroy sin and all rebels against God's righteous government, and reign over his people forever more. It is the one Christ who does all these things. Every other professing to be Christ must necessarily be a false Christ. As he declared that Jewish impostors would arise after his ascension, claiming to be the Messiah, and deceive many, he also declares that previous to his second advent another class of false Christs will come, who will show great signs and wonders, and deceive multitudes.

And it is a most remarkable fulfillment of our Lord's prediction that for a century, or a little more, there have been arising, from time to time, in the Gentile world, persons claiming to be Christs, and never were there so many as at the present time. The coming of these synchronizes wonderfully with the manifestation of the special signs given in prophecy of our Lord's second coming. We shall speak of those especially who have made a mark in our world, having large numbers of followers implicitly believing them to be or to have been Christs.

We first notice the famous name of Emanuel Swedenborg, born in Stockholm, Sweden, in 1688. From youth till the age of fifty-five, he gave his attention to study, travel, and public office, under the appointment of the king. And such proficiency did he make as a scholar, that he became one of the most noted men of that age. Indeed, so high an authority as the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia, declares "that Swedenborg was in many respects the most remarkable man of his own or of any age."—Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia, Art. Swedenborg. He was eminent in scholarship, scientific attainments, and every branch of learning. At this stage of life, he gave his attention especially to theological subjects, and had, as he declares in 1743, a wonderful spiritual illumination. He himself relates it as follows:—

"I have been called to a holy office by the Lord himself, who most mercifully appeared before me, his servant in the year 1743, when he opened my sight into the spiritual world, and enabled me to converse with spirits and angels; in which state I have continued up to the present day." (Same article and authority.)

He continued to write books developing his new system, giving his new revelations, and professing to give the true meaning of the Scriptures. His position was in substance that the Bible as written out, is not to be understood literally, as we would another book; that indeed it teaches folly and error, if understood literally. He claims there is a peculiar spiritual interpretation to be given to the words used in it; and that the key of knowledge formerly possessed by God's people when the Bible was written, which enabled them to grasp the true meaning, had long been lost, but was revealed to himself when his spiritual understanding was opened in 1743, and so he proceeds to tell the meaning of every part of Scripture from Genesis to Revelation, in many large volumes. This supposed meaning is not only in many cases wholly unperceivable to ordinary mortals, but often squarely contradictory to the natural sense of scriptural language. He utterly denies the second personal coming of Christ, the resurrection of the body, translation of the living saints, the final destruction of the wicked, and the renovation of the earth and its restoration to its Eden glory. He teaches there are various heavens and hells, these not being places, but conditions of the mind. Man at death enters the world of spirits, and soon finds the heaven or hell to which he naturally belongs, where his associations are with those like himself. Retributive punishment he discards. The final judgment occurred during his life on earth, about 1757, and since that the final disposition of the departed spirits is made soon after their earthly life ceases.

Swedenborg claimed to be the founder of a new dispensation and a new church, which he called the New Jerusalem Church, explaining St. John's description of the city of God in Revelation 21, 22 as meaning the church he was to found. He also claimed to be a fulfillment of Christ's second coming. Writing to the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, he says:—

"The Lord our Saviour had foretold that he would come again into the world, and that he would establish there a new church. He has given this prediction in the Apocalypse (21 and 22), and also in several places in the evangelists. But as he cannot come into the world again in person, it was necessary that he should do it by means of a man who should not only receive the doctrine of this new church in his understanding, but also publish it by printing; and so the Lord had prepared me for that office from my infancy; he has manifested himself, in person before me, his servant, and sent me to fill it. This took place in the year 1743. He afterward opened the sight of my spirit, and thus introduced me into the spiritual world, and granted me to see the heavens, and many of their wonders, and also the hells, and speak with angels and spirits, and this continually for twenty-seven years. I declare in all truth that such is the fact. This favor of the Lord in regard to me has only taken place for the sake of the new church which I have mentioned above, the doctrine of which is contained in my writings."—McClintock and Strong's Encyclopedia, Art. Swedenborg.

That there was something remarkable, yea, supernatural, about Swedenborg's later experiences, there are the best of testimonies in history. That he related things truly that he could not have known through any human source, there seems no room to doubt. (See Johnson's Encyclopedia, Art. Swedenborg.)

There is indeed a great mystery connected with this remarkable man. He is represented by leading authorities as a benevolent, sensible, upright man, with a wonderful fund of scientific knowledge, as a strong believer in the inspiration of the Bible, and as a man of piety and prayer. Yet nothing is more certain than that his teachings are squarely contradictory of many of the plainest declarations of the Scriptures. He seems to have been the author, or at least the most prominent advocate, of those spiritualizing heresies which are so prevalent in later times, teaching that Christ will never come in a personal manner, but that those Scriptures which so declare, refer to the prevalence of certain doctrines or the work of those who are clothed with the Christ Spirit. As the quotation from his own writings quoted above proves, he claims to have been himself the coming of Christ. Think of it, dear reader! Emanuel Swedenborg, the fulfillment of such statements of the Bible as these:—

"For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. 4: 16, 17. "And they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Matt. 24: 30, 31. "Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." Rev. 1: 7.

Swedenborg's doctrine is the climax, the logical perfection of that mystical spiritualizing system of pretended explanation of the Scriptures, which has done more to break down real confidence of the masses in the literal meaning of the Bible, than any other. The teaching of theologians for ages has been more or less tinctured with this deceptive mysticism which virtually inculcates the doctrine that the Bible does not mean what it says, but that it should receive vague, far-fetched meanings, not warranted by its direct statements. So one set of expositors place their colorings upon it, and another give a different one. Thus an eminent authority says of Swedenborg's system:—

"The method pursued does not appear to be much unlike that of other Christian commentators, except in the extent to which the principles of symbolism are carried, and the results arrived at."—Mc Clintock and Strong's Encyclopedia, Art. Swedenborg.

It is perhaps because of so great a degree of similarity in methods of exposition, that Swedenborg and his work are looked upon with so much approval in the theological world. He claims to have had special revelations from the spiritual world to enable him fully to develop this mystical system of exposition. He certainly is entitled to the highest position as an able exponent of that system. So that those who admire and believe it, certainly ought to hold him in high estimation.

But holding to the literal sense of God's word, we cannot but consider Swedenborg as one of the most dangerous of religious teachers, and his system as utterly contrary to the true sense of Scripture, and as a leading fountain or channel through which false doctrines concerning the future state, and especially of Christ's second coming, have been poured out upon our world in the last days. Many of the false doctrines of Spiritualism have doubtless been derived from his fertile pen. Many of the orthodox conceptions of the other world, of future punishment, and of the life hereafter, and how those after death will exist, have, we believe, their origin in Swedenborg's revelations. He has exerted an immense, though perhaps unknown, influence upon theology. The peculiar sect derived from him, and known as the New Jerusalem Church, is extending slowly and steadily in many countries. Their mystical, nebulous, foggy, metaphysical views and methods of reasoning make them hard for the common mind to meet, and dangerous to those not well established in the faith. The plainest statements of Scripture have not the slightest effect upon them, as it is spiritualized away, and perverted to mean perhaps something entirely different. Their views take the element of the real all out of religion or the mental conception of the future state. Hence, we cannot but regard Swedenborg's teachings as most dangerous, and his religious work as the prolific cause of many of the heresies, now prevalent, relative to the second coming of Christ. And since he claimed himself to be the fulfillment of those Bible predictions of the second advent, we must class him as one of the last-day false Christs, who should show great signs and wonders to deceive. He was, we must conclude, the first one of the series coming about the time of the first specific sign of Christ's coming—the great earthquake of Lisbon, 1755 (Rev. 6: 12), which marked the opening of the sixth seal. His religious work began about 1745, and continued till his death, in 1772.

Thus it will be readily seen that his work commenced at the very time such a work of breaking down faith in the personal coming of Christ would be most effective, when the signs of that coming began to be fulfilled. His theological philosophy has from that time been permeating the theological world, and multitudes have given up the belief in a personal appearing of Christ. They think that his coming is a great influx of spiritual truths, and that no personal advent will ever take place. The whole trend of theological teaching on this subject is in this direction.

ACTIVITY NEEDED NOW: DELAYS ARE DANGEROUS.

It was our privilege last week, in company with several other brethren, to attend the Michigan State meeting of the "American Sabbath Union." We were particularly impressed with the intensity and earnestness that characterized most of the speeches. They spoke specially with reference to the movement that has been started, an account of which has already appeared in the REVIEW, to secure the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. There was a peculiar force of expression in their statements referring to this matter. They said that they must exert themselves with great earnestness, in order to bring an influence to bear upon Congress that will show congressmen that the churches and all of the good men of the country are in favor of "honoring the Lord's day."

The impression that was made on our minds was that the churches, feeling that they have captured Congress, in securing the action already passed with reference to closing the World's Fair on Sunday, now feel greatly enraged to think that any would dare to attempt to have that action reversed. They spoke specially with reference to the little few who are in favor of having the World's Fair open, and the vast majority of this "Christian nation" who are working in favor of having it closed.

They do not propose to allow this country to be dictated to in this way by a few foreigners and atheists, and they said that if these do not like our Christian laws and government, they could go to some other country.

Delegates were appointed to attend a national meeting to be held in Chicago this week. It is expected that the meeting in Chicago will be a very interesting one, inasmuch as they expect there to plan for aggressive work, in view of the efforts to reverse the decision already rendered in regard to the World's Fair.

Brother Moon, who is now in Washington, says that he attended a State meeting of the American Sabbath Union in Pennsylvania, a few days since, and that the same spirit that was manifested in the Michigan meeting was seen in the meeting there. We find further that these State meetings have recently been held in almost every State of the Union, and that they are planning for very vigorous action this winter. They seem to be very careful about allowing any one to know just what they are expecting to do, but in all their meetings, are talking of great plans that they have under consideration. We can see in this greatly increasing activity on the part of these persons, a direct fulfillment of what has been told us in recent testimonies, in regard to the new life and power that is taking hold of Satan's agencies. We are glad that while we see this, we also see on every hand a very remarkable work going on among our own people.

I have never experienced such meetings in my life as we have been enjoying here in Battle Creek for some days past. A regular revival is going on steadily in all of our institutions, and large numbers of our young people, and the old people as well, are giving themselves to the Lord as never before. We have not made any special effort to start these revivals, but the individuals seem to start the work right among themselves, and the Lord is setting his hand and seal to the movement, and great things are being accomplished in a very short time. If we had called in quite a number of our best ministers, and they had labored here faithfully for several months, and such a revival as has been accomplished within the last ten days, without any ministerial effort whatever, had been brought about, we would certainly have thought that great results had been achieved.

We can see that God is working with great power, and we are glad to report that what we are enjoying here in Battle Creek is being enjoyed in many other parts of the field. We are receiving letters from leading brethren in many States, telling us of the wonderful workings of the Lord's good Spirit, in the meetings they are holding this winter.

Now, brethren and sisters, we can readily see that Satan's agents are being stirred to great activity, and we also rejoice to know at the same time that God is fulfilling his promise, "to cause a new light and life and power to descend from on high, to take possession of God's people, who are not dead in trespasses and sins."

It is no longer a question of whether or no the work is going, but we should be earnestly asking ourselves if we are connecting with it, in order to move forward as it advances. The great activity on the part of these agencies that are working against the cause of truth, will call for greater exertions on the part of our people, than anything that we have ever done in the past. The demands of the cause will require more labor this winter than has been done in all the previous history of our work. Millions of pages of our literature, calling attention to the real issues in this Sunday movement, should be placed in the hands of leading men in the country, as well as scattered extensively among all others. The Religious Liberty Association has planned to do a vast amount of work in this line. But to do it, we will need a large amount of means.

We trust that our brethren and sisters who have not paid their annual dues for the past year, will send them to us as soon as possible, and that we may receive abundant donations from others.

The work is going very rapidly, brethren and sisters, and if we want to have a part in it, we must be acting now. These calls for means will soon be past, and if we want to get our money into the cause, now is the time to put it in.

We are glad to report good progress in the work, and it seems to us that our efforts have never seemed so effective as now.

READINGS FOR THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

We have endeavored to send a copy of the readings for the coming week of prayer to every church elder, leader of company, Sabbath-school superintendent, and isolated Sabbath-keeper in every Conference and mission field, as far as possible. All of the church elders and leaders, and most of the other classes mentioned, have been supplied with these, as far as we have been able to obtain lists of their names and addresses; but we are sorry to state that notwithstanding 8,000 copies of the readings were printed,—a number which we presumed would amply supply all the demand for them,—our supply has run a little short, so that in a few States from which lists came in rather late, we have been unable to send a copy to all the Sabbath-school superintendents and isolated ones. We much regret that this is so, but state the facts so that those who fail to receive the readings, will know the reason they have not been sent them. Heretofore there has generally been quite a little supply left over from the number printed, but the demand for them this year has been unprecedented, and consequently our estimate fell short of the number called for. While we regret our inability to supply all, we are glad to note the increased interest manifested in the readings prepared for the season thus set apart for a special seeking of the Lord. We trust that our scattered brethren everywhere will put forth special efforts to meet, if possible, with the nearest church or company of Sabbath-keepers during this important season. We look for great blessings from the Lord to be poured out upon our people at this time.

O. A. OLSEN, Pres. Gen. Conf.

Let us notice a few ways in which it is thus profitable during the life that now is:—

It transfers the individual from a state of condemnation to one of justification, in which the individual feels at peace with God and free from the guilt of which he before was conscious. This alone brings great joy and satisfaction. He feels that it is much better to look forward to the Christian's life than to the sinner's doom.

It makes his life one of constant happiness. The Holy Spirit dwells in his heart, the fruits of which are "love, joy, peace," etc. Happiness and love are inseparable, and when the love of God and all his fellow-men comes into a heart where it was before, how greatly must that individual's happiness be increased. This is something very desirable; for happiness is the constant aim of all.

It gives strength of purpose. Yielding the will to God allies the will with God's will. Thus the will is not weakened or lost, but wonderfully assisted; and this is of inestimable value. No person in the world ever had more will power than he needed. The strongest human will is not prepared unaided to cope with the temptations of "the world, the flesh, and the Devil."

It places the individual in a position of safety; it places him in the hands of God,—the very best position in all the universe. The Devil has no power of death, and is constantly seeking to bring individuals under that power, and the one who is out of Christ is running a terrible risk; for he is on the Devil's ground. But what power can possibly harm the soul which is placed in the hands of God? Certainly nothing whatever can, unless God wills it; for no finite power can prevail against omnipotence. And if God wills it, the individual can always afford it. When the omniscient sees that it is best for a person to rest from his labors, he can lay down his life without the least fear or anxiety. He is still in the hands of God who doeth all things well. Very different is it with the individual who has not made the Lord his refuge.

It gives to life the highest-possible degree of success. It does this by taking the individual out of his own hands, and placing him in the hands of God. This gives God a chance to manifest his own power and his own wisdom in that individual's behalf, and through him in behalf of others. The result of this is just as much better than what the individual can do with himself, as God's ways are better and wiser than man's ways. The prophet Jeremiah wrote (Jer. 10:23), "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." This is the truth, however much human pride may suggest and assert to the contrary. It has been said that every man is the architect of his own fortune. But, however, is at best a very poor architect. Let God be the architect. Let the building be done by the great Master workman, the One who built the universe. Then will it be a glorious structure, one of which you will be proud through eternity.

There is every inducement, from the standpoint of reason as well as of duty, to a life of consecration to God. Knowing then that "God so loved [and all loves] the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life," that we "are bought with a price," which was the highest price that God himself could give, shall not this love constrain us to yield our wills to his in penitence and love, and let him have his own way with us, for our own best good and his own glory?

L. A. S.

THE PURPOSE OF GOD'S BLESSING.

God never bestows his blessing upon any one with the purpose that it shall go no farther than the individual upon whom it descends. God never bestows a blessing upon any one that was not large enough to benefit more than one individual. If he should do so, he would only foster selfishness in the individual who received it; for any good that does no further than self, can do nothing more than exalt self, since it cannot flow out through the channel that communicates with the interests of others.

The apostle James speaks of a class who would, if they could, keep all the blessing of God themselves, the result of their selfishness being that they do not get the blessing at all. He says (James 4:3), "Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts." This explains why many do not get the blessing; when they ask for it. They would make a selfish use of it, and thus it would be of no benefit to themselves or to anybody else. God does not send down blessings to have them lost in this way.

The blessing of God is designed to have a tangible effect upon the recipient. It will produce something more than a good feeling; it will be manifested in works. The Christian life is a life of work, and not of pleasant dreaming. The true Christian is one of the most active persons on the earth; and no wonder, for he has become an actor in the great controversy between Christ and Satan, and sees work everywhere to be done. The Christian life is lived "by the faith of the Son of God" (Gal. 2:20), but this faith is "faith which worketh." Gal. 5:6. By faith Christ dwells in the heart (Eph. 3:17), and "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." Rom. 10:4. With Christ in the heart the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in the life. Rom. 8:4. 1 Tim. 1:5 tells what kind of life will be seen in the individual when this is the case. "Now the end [or object] of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned." So the individual in whom the righteousness of the law is fulfilled will possess the grace of charity. Charity is not shut up in the feelings, but lived in the life. It cannot be separated from the life, but is the controlling element of it. It will be seen in all that the individual says and does. Its manifestations are eminently practical. "Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." 1 Cor. 13:4-7. This was the life of Christ on earth, and is the life of Christ to-day in the human heart. The blessing of God is Christ in the heart by faith; faith works, and works by love; love is charity, and charity is the visible token of Christ's presence.

Shall not the experience of the past few weeks have as one of its results a marked increase of charity on the part of those who so much need at this time to stand together in the bond of Christian unity.

COMING down to a later period, we briefly notice Joseph Smith and the Mormon movement, as a fulfillment in part of our Saviour's prediction of false Christs and false prophets who should deceive many. Joseph Smith was born in Sharon, Vt., in 1805, and moved with his parents to Palmyra, N. Y., when ten years old. His education was very limited. He could barely read and write, and had a meager knowledge of the elementary rules of arithmetic. His religious experiences began when about fifteen years of age. From that time forward he claimed to have special spiritual illumination, conversing with angels; with instruction about a new religious doctrine such as would avoid the various errors of the different sects. He indulged in a species of fortune-telling or soothsaying, claiming power to tell of the existence of valuable mines or lost treasures, and had the reputation in the country of being a fanatic and visionary. He claimed to be guided by "visions," "angels," and "voices."

At the age of twenty-two he claimed to discover in a certain hill, between Palmyra and Manchester, certain "golden plates," upon which were written in ancient characters the history of people living in ages long past in America, some of whom were the ancestors of the American Indians, who they claim were descended from the ten lost tribes of Israel. This Smith claimed to be able to decipher and read by the aid of a curious instrument, called by him the "Urim and Thummim," "two transparent stones clear as crystal," set in two bows, found with the plates. From these plates all Latter-day Saints claim the Book of Mormon was translated; Smith being behind a curtain, the supposed plates being before him, and he pronouncing the words while a scribe on the other side took down his words in writing. Certain "witnesses" claim themselves to have seen the "golden plates," but what has become of them no one knows. Smith claimed that an angel received them from his hand, and disappeared with them.

Disciples now began to be made quite rapidly. Smith being leader, "prophet," "sun," and head, "high priest of the Melchisedec" order, now had great influence. They uniformly had trouble between themselves and the Gentiles, wherever they lived, and settled in different places, till at last a settlement was made in Jackson county, Mo., near Independence. Here Smith claimed to have a revelation that it was the land of promise, a place for the city of Zion, where the New Jerusalem should be built. Twelve hundred Mormons soon gathered there, and went to work with their usual energy and industry, and soon made the wilderness a fruitful field.

Then troubles commenced with the people. Smith organized a military force to repel attacks, and soon blood was shed, and fighting continued till they were driven wholly out of the State, across the Mississippi into Illinois. The people there treated them kindly. They secured land and made a new city, which they called Nauvoo. They built a large temple for public worship, and for a season prospered wonderfully. But the usual troubles arising with those not of their faith, who accused the Mormons of stealing their stock, and other property and too literally practicing the doctrine that, "as everything belongs to the Lord, and as we are the Lord's people, therefore it belongs to us," there soon came a crisis; the authorities sought to arrest Smith and some of the leaders. They resisted by force for a season, but were finally taken and lodged in prison to await their trial. Then a lawless mob of 200 or more arose, took possession of the building, and shot Joseph and his brother, Hyrum Smith, and thus they were considered martyrs to the cause.

Smith had become a great man in his own eyes, because of the attention he was receiving. He was courted by both parties to obtain the large Mormon vote, and even announced himself as a candidate for the presidency of the United States. The whole body was under subjection to his will. He had begun to practice polygamy several years before his death, and a dozen or so of wives besides his lawful one, were "sealed" to him. A pretended revelation favoring polygamy had been written out according to what seems to be unimpeachable testimony, though not publicly promulgated at the time. But it was known to many, and was afterward promulgated from Salt Lake City.

After Smith's death, Brigham Young, one of the so-called "apostles," was chosen as successor, "seer, prophet, and president of the church of Latter-day Saints." Becoming convinced that they could not have liberty to practice all the rites of their religion, or sufficiently control matters in their own vicinity to suit them, they moved west, and finally, after great hardships and sufferings, established themselves in the Salt Lake valley, and built Salt Lake City. Multitudes congregated there, and there polygamy was openly practiced. Missionaries were sent to all parts of the world, and large numbers of converts were made in England, Wales, the Scandinavian countries, and in the Sandwich Islands. A religious despotism was established in Utah, and all who dared to raise their voices were either silenced in death or driven out. Scenes of bloodshed were enacted, which were simply horrible.

When the Pacific railroad was run through that country, these things could no longer be tolerated. Indeed, the United States sent a force of 2,500 soldiers there to bring them to terms before that. Gradually they have come more under subjection, as governors, judges, etc., have been sent by the national government, and since President Young's death, they have had at least nominally to submit to the authority of the laws.

Mormonism is still a great force, however. It is estimated from the best authorities that they number from 250,000 to 300,000 believers in the revelations of Joseph Smith. There is scarcely any portion of the earth where their missionaries have not been.

In their professed belief they claim to accept the Bible and the Christian system, yet they teach doctrines utterly subversive of them, holding that later revelations are to be preferred and accepted, when not in harmony with those more ancient. In their controversial publications some of their leading writers teach the boldest infidelity, when they think they can gain by so doing. They teach many things which are ridiculous, blasphemous, and indecent. They hold that Adam is the "Ancient of Days," and as Brigham Young once preached: "Adam is our father and our God, and the only God with whom we have to do." So they believe God was once a man. The following extract from one of their catechisms illustrates this point.—

"Question 28.—What is God?"

"Answer.—He is a material, intelligent personage, possessing both body and parts.

"Q. 38.—Doth he also possess passions?"

"A.—Yes. He eats, he drinks, he loves, he hates.

"Q. 44.—Can this being occupy two distinct places at once?"

"A.—No."—Latter-day Saints' Catechism, quoted in Morm. Illust., p. 43.

They teach that—

"God of course was once a man, and from manhood by continual progression became God; and he has continued to increase from his manhood to the present time, and may continue to increase without limit. And man may continue to increase in knowledge and power as fast as he pleases."

And again:—

"If man is a creature of eternal progression, the time must certainly arrive when he will know as much as God now knows."—Millennial Star, XIV. 386.

Thus Joseph Smith says:—

"The weakest child of God which now exists upon earth will possess more dominion, more property, more subjects, and more power and glory, than is possessed by Jesus Christ or by his Father; while at the same time they will have their dominion, kingdom, and subjects increased in proportion."—Millennial Star, Vol. 6.

The Mormons believe in gods innumerable; i. e., men who have become gods. Who can fail to see the footprints of Satan, the arch fiend, who said to Mother Eve that if she would partake of the forbidden fruit, "Ye shall be as gods"? They believe in the pre-existence of spirits before birth, believing that vast numbers of them are awaiting the begetting of human bodies for them to inhabit; hence polygamy is necessary that as many as possible of them may be favored (?) in obtaining Mormon habitations.

Many other ridiculous doctrines might be mentioned, but these will suffice as specimens. (These facts are obtained from McClintock and Strong's and the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedias, Art. Mormons.) That a powerful spiritual influence of some kind has attended this work from the beginning is not to be doubted. That it is not from a good source is equally evident. Multitudes have been swept into their ranks because of the subtle, magnetic influences connected with it. Many people of intelligence and great natural ability have accepted it. Actual miracles have been performed in connection with them. The writer has seen a person whose whole nose and quite a portion of the face had been eaten out by a cancer, who was cured instantly by the laying on of hands of a Mormon elder, and for years no further trouble was experienced from it. This person is probably living in eastern Nebraska at the present time. Many in their meetings have peculiar exercises, which they call "speaking with tongues." Some strange influence comes over them, and for a few moments they pour forth a stream of gibberish, which bears little resemblance to any known human language. They evidently are under some strange, mysterious influence, and then they regain their normal state. This is undoubtedly a counterfeit, a poor imitation of the genuine gift of tongues, as seen in apostolic days, when those from various nations heard the uneducated Galileans speak in their "own tongues the wonderful works of God." Acts 2:7-11.

THEOLOGICAL IMAGINATIONS.

A MINISTER of the gospel engaged to deliver theological thunderbolts in a Pennsylvania seminary, has devoted six lectures to the Sabbath. In one of these lectures, speaking of those who observe Saturday, and who claim there is no divine authority for Sunday, he said:—

"They ask for a 'specific command' for the observance of the Lord's day. Let them give a specific command for the observance of the Sabbath before the decalogue, in which they believe as well as we. If God's example is enough in Genesis, Christ's example is enough in the Gospels. If divine acts are to be considered as legislative acts that speak louder than words in the one case, they are of like authority in the other."

We fully agree in the above statement that Christ's example in the Gospels is as important as it was at the creation. But granting the principle, does not do this "theologian" any good; for when he comes to make his application, he will surely find a dismal failure. His argument for Sunday consists of nothing but words,—words of assurance, but without fact of Scripture to rest upon. He assumes that there is as much evidence in the Gospels that Christ rested on Sunday, blessed and sanctified it, as there is that the seventh day was so set apart in the record of creation. This is the boldest kind of assumption without proof that we have ever yet witnessed. Hundreds of able ministers of all denominations of Christians have acknowledged that the Gospels contain nothing that can be used clearly to prove the establishment of Sunday. The texts that are now relied upon as proofs were never used by the early church for that purpose; they were the last resort of the Puritans to justify themselves in keeping Sunday, while they rejected the other holidays of the Church of England. And yet these makeshifts are set up by a modern theologian as proofs "strong as Holy Writ."

Let us examine this subject in detail, and compare the evidences in Genesis for the seventh day, with the evidences in the Gospels for the first day. First we will look at Genesis. There we find, (1) a record of six days' consecutive work; (2) the resting of the Creator upon the seventh day; (3) after the seventh day was passed, a blessing was pronounced upon the seventh day; (4) the sanctification, or setting apart, of the seventh day. Genesis 1 and 2. These are simple facts, recorded in simple language. They form the basis of the Biblical Sabbath, and are referred to in the decalogue as the reason for the command embodied in that law, to keep the seventh day.

Is there anything approaching this in the Gospels, for the observance of Sunday? All men of candor know that there is not. Were there six days of consecutive labor before the day claimed to be the first and new Sabbath of the Christian age?—There were not. Of the day immediately preceding the day thus claimed as a Sabbath, the record in the "Gospel" of Luke says they rested. Luke 23:56. Thus the first necessary step in the formation of a Sabbath was lacking. Is there any record in the Gospels that Christ rested upon the day of his resurrection?—None at all. He rested in death on the seventh day, while his disciples rested in life; and a day held by this theologian (?) to be the first of the new series of Sabbaths, was a day of great activity. Do the Gospels declare that Jesus blessed the day of his resurrection?—They do not; and none but a theologian with a large bump of imagination, and a mind so completely biased by the way he wants to see it, would ever suppose such a thing. Finally, do the Gospels say that Jesus sanctified the first day?—Nothing of the kind can be claimed for Sunday. If there was such a record, we would acknowledge a command for Sunday; for the essential idea of the sanctification of a day, consists in its appointment to the purpose for which it was made. Thus every specific act recorded in Genesis as uniting to create the original Sabbath, is wanting for the counterfeit Sabbath which has usurped its place.

To conclude: we would say that we have a profound respect for the example of Christ. Finding no account in Scripture of his example in keeping any other Sabbath than the one sanctified in Eden, and placed in the bosom of the decalogue, we mean by God's grace to keep it. This command having never been repealed, no other command is needed. It must stand until it is repealed. There is neither example nor command for Sunday-keeping in the Gospels or anywhere else in the Bible. Where, then, may be found for the Sunday Sabbath "legislative acts that speak louder than words?" They are nothing but the figments of a theological imagination. Theologians may claim it, but the Bible now and forever contradicts the claim.

THE RELIGIONS OF INDIA.—NO. 1.

THE religion of a people is to a greater or less extent their history. It gives an insight into mental development, as well as the state of society attained. In all religions, however false, corrupt, there are traces of a knowledge of the God by traditions, rites, and ceremonies, revealing the fact that there are two great sources of religion: the pure, which has left its divine impression upon every heart and every people; and a false source, which has taken numberless shapes and forms to oppose by corruption and otherwise the true, pure, and good.

The religions in India, like its civilization, Christless, purely oriental and Asiatic. They brace the most loathsome, abominable practices and the highest attainment of virtue and morality that can be attained without faith in Christ. The religion of the United States is said to be Christian, and yet there are a legion of forms, names, modes of worship under the name of Christianity. It is the same in India. It is worthy of note that the least departure from the pure principles of Christianity is but taking upon itself some form of the false religions which abound to perfection in India. It is the introduction of principles of the false religions that multiplies sects in the Christian religion.

Polytheism and pantheism are the warp and woof of Hinduism. There is no unity in its worship. Benares is said to be a city of 2,000 temples, and more than ten thousand gods. Every object, both animate and inanimate, is worshipped. The city is situated on the sacred Ganges, which furnishes holy water to the thousands of inhabitants. Every morning both old and young repair to the banks for a bath. Even the dead are brought to its banks to be washed, and are then burned. Long trains of pilgrims who have journeyed for hundreds of miles, are continually arriving to bathe in the holy stream, or worship some particular god.

In these idols and their idolatrous ceremonies are traces of a knowledge of the principles of the Christian religion. Krishna is a man-god declared to be an incarnation of his divine essence; and the figure which is unknown to Veda (their sacred writings) is a popular divinity. Krishna is represented as standing on a serpent which is biting his heel, and he is bruising the serpent's head. In Indian work, "Gitta," there are many disgusting legends regarding Krishna, and it is probable that the author of Gitta adopted the great concepts regarding the divinity and incarnation of Christ and applied them to Krishna, as a personage already famous in Indian story. Says Mitchell:—

"It is in the Mahabharata we first see Vishnu exalted to preme divinity. He became incarnated in Krishna, who have been, as some believe, originally a tribal god of the puts (the great military race in central India), probably exalted into a god. The names of Christ and Krishna are tally unlike in sense, and not very unlike in sound; yet former may have suggested the latter as the personage the poet might represent as the supreme divinity."

Krishna as conceived by the Hindus now is a strangely mixed character. He is a warlike prince but to them he is the supreme divinity incarnate.

The spirit of sacrifice, self-abnegation, and devotion is prominent in all these various religions. Calcutta daily the devout Hindu may be seen taking his lamb or kid to the river, bathing him in sacred water, and then bearing him to the front of a temple containing two apartments, the front always open, the second apartment directly behind of the first, open at certain hours. The kid's head severed by the executioner; while on feast days the priest dips his finger into the blood and applies it to the forehead of the worshiper. He is then borne to the house of the penitent, and eaten. When interrogated concerning this ceremony, they said: "Do you not cross your foreheads with holy water?" referring to the rite of the Catholic Church, claiming that the church received this rite from them. In this is revealed the fact that once they must have had some knowledge of the Jewish ceremonies.

The fakirs, on account of some sin which they have committed, desiring to become holy will place themselves in one position with their arms stretched, until they become withered, living on food given them by the passer-by. Others place themselves on the ground, surrounded by a SOUND SPEECH.

THE apostle Paul exhorted Titus (Titus 2:8) to be careful to have his speech "sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you." This was good advice to Titus, and it is very appropriate for those who stand in a position similar to his in our own day. There is probably no one thing that causes more trouble in the world than the hasty and careless use of the power of speech.

There seems never to have been a language invented, or one so fully developed, that its common words and phrases were not susceptible of more than one meaning. Certainly the English language is not exempt from this misfortune. It is the easiest thing in the world to make use of ambiguous expressions,—much easier, sometimes, than to refrain from their use. Hence, it is a very easy thing to be misunderstood. Nearly all language needs to be interpreted, if its precise meaning is to be ascertained. This is illustrated in the statutes passed by our State legislatures, and in the clauses of our State and national constitutions. The precise meaning of these is perhaps known to the ones who framed them, but only the decisions of courts of justice can determine their meaning for the people in whose interests they were framed; and this is so of all law. It does not seem possible to devise a statute of any length which will be so plain in its meaning to all that no court will be called upon to define the meaning of some of its words or phrases. To illustrate: The first amendment to our national Constitution declares that Congress "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This seems plain; but does it mean that Congress has no authority to interfere with the religion of the Mormons? The courts have held that it does not. The fourteenth amendment declares that "no State shall make or enforce any law that shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." Here the question arises, What are "the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States?" and also, what is to be considered as being an abridgment of these immunities? One of the most famous of English statutes (the Statute of Frauds) was passed to settle disputed points, but resulted in vastly increasing litigation, simply because so many of its words and phrases had to be interpreted by the courts before their precise meaning was settled. The same ambiguity exists in ordinary speech, and would be just as noticeable, if it were not that such language is not usually considered important enough to make its precise meaning a matter of very great value.

But the language of Scripture, and that which relates to the meaning of Scripture, is obviously of great importance, and it is often necessary to ascertain its precise meaning. For this reason Paul exhorted Titus to be careful to utter "sound speech that cannot be condemned," that no one might have a chance to speak evil of him on account of it. In that which pertains to so important a matter as the eternal interests of the soul, people want "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." It will not do to go out and talk to people in a careless way, or a way that will give them an opportunity to misconstrue your language so as to justify themselves in their errors. The Christian evangelist should not only mean what he says, but he should also be careful to say exactly what he means.

As an illustration, consider the much-mooted subject of "faith and works," as it is generally expressed, to which one of our contributors refers on another page. The latter there finds fault with a statement made in the notes to a recent Sabbath-school lesson, that "it is a dangerous thing to say that we ought to keep the commandments of God in addition to our faith." Now, the author of that lesson doubtless did not mean to say that men could be saved without keeping the commandments, although at first glance the impression would naturally be received that he did. And more than this; that impression, to one who did not believe in the perpetuity of the law, would be very much stronger than it would to one who did; in fact, it would be regarded as conclusively the true meaning. This is the important point. While it is true that faith—true, Bible faith—always works by love (or charity), which is the fulfilling of the law, and hence must always result in the keeping of God's commandments, it is also a fact that many people—a very great many—have not the true idea of faith. They do not have that idea of it which shows them its inseparable connection with God's commandments. They have their own idea of faith, that of something which obviates the necessity of keeping those commandments.

The simple term "faith," therefore, must be considered, so far as purposes of discussion are concerned, as having more than one meaning; it must be allowed as many meanings as there are different parties in the discussion; for in a discussion where freedom of opinion is allowed, all meet upon common ground. You must meet an opponent on his own level before you can bring him up to your level. The general term "faith," spoken before a number of persons having different ideas of what faith is, will convey different meanings to their minds. To one class of religionists "faith" means one thing; to another class it means another thing, and so on. And when we speak to one class, we should consider that we are speaking to all classes, and so speak that we can maintain our position before all classes. We are liable to be called upon by representatives of any one of them to do it.

It is with reference to the fact that various ideas of faith would prevail in the world that the language of Scripture on this subject was worded. The Scripture says, "What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and hath not works; can faith save him?" "Faith" as here mentioned does not mean true faith, for true faith will save a man always. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Mark 16:16. Reference is simply made to that idea of faith that would be held by the man who would say, "I have faith," and yet would have no works. Again, the same writer says, "But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" But there is no such thing as "faith without works;" that is, true faith. Again, the apostle Paul wrote to Titus, "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works." Titus 3:8. But if a person truly believes in God, he will of necessity maintain good works, without his taking any thought about it. But these two apostles knew that there was danger that a man might have something which he would think was faith, yet would not be true faith at all; and it was for the admonition and instruction of such that such statements as we have quoted were written.

What was written about works in connection with faith, was necessary, in order that there might be a true standard by which all that professed to be faith might be measured. If a person says to me, I have faith, and I depend on that for salvation, and do not think it necessary to keep the Sabbath (a thing which very many do say), it is useless for me to say to him that he has not faith, unless I have something more with which to back up my assertion. I have no right to judge his assertion that he has faith, any more than he has a right to judge mine, without some further evidence in the case; and I would have no means of pointing out to him or to anybody else that he did not have the faith which saves, unless there was something tangible by which the genuineness of "faith" could be tested. There is such a test; namely, his works. "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works." If the word of God had not indicated such a test of faith, we should be left wholly at sea on the subject, and while some might have true faith, and feel in their hearts the witness of the Spirit that they were children of God, a great many more would have just such a faith as Antinomians have, and there would be no way of pointing out to them their error, nor it may be, of saving ourselves from the delusion which their zealous professions and specious appearance of piety might bring upon us. We could not look into their hearts to know whether they had in truth the witness of spirit, as they might claim; and the way would be clear for the Devil to sow his deceptions on this point broadcast, and gather in his harvest of deluded souls.

It should be borne in mind that we are not living in an ideal world, but in one which is full of error and imperfection, and we must accommodate our utterances to the conditions that actually exist. If there were no such thing as a false faith, the simple expression "faith in God" would be sufficient in every case to convey just the meaning intended; but as there are many false conceptions of faith actually held by men all around us, the ideal sense of the word becomes easily lost in one of these false views, unless we are careful to set out the sense in which the word is used. It is the same with that to which we apply the term "reason." We are often told what "reason" teaches. But what is "reason?" In the ideal sense it is always truth, correct deductions from true premises; but actually and practically, it is simply just what people say it is, and as such it may be right, or it may be wrong. True reason is of course always right and absolutely reliable; but that which is called reason, even by the best finite minds, is often altogether unreliable. Two persons whose beliefs on some subject are diametrically opposite, will each give the "reasons" for their respective views, yet reason itself cannot support both, and may not support either one. We apply the word very often to that which is not reason at all, in the true sense, simply because it is necessary in order to adapt our language in discussion to the conditions which our world presents; and care must be taken not to confound the ideal with the actual in any process of investigation, else the result will very likely be error instead of truth. So likewise must care be taken in speaking before the world of faith; for that which is true of true faith may not be true at all of "faith" in its popular conceptions. Before a congregation of "Antinomians" it would certainly be very unwise to use such expressions as, "It is a dangerous thing to say that we ought to keep the commandments of God in addition to our faith." It would only tend to confirm them in their errors. Recently a lady who for some time had been under conviction in regard to the obligation of God's commandments, and had kept one or two Sabbaths, listened to a sermon preached in the Tabernacle on the subject of salvation by faith, and came away saying that her burden was rolled off, and she did not have to keep the Sabbath any more, since faith in Christ was enough,—a conclusion which she drew from the strong statements of the speaker.

If people would only be careful to say what they mean, and make their exact meaning plain, there would not be one half the discussion and controversy in the world that there is. Especially in speaking to men the words that are to save or condemn their souls, we cannot be too careful to follow the instruction of St. Paul to Titus, to utter "sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you." L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

It is a fact, as all will find when thoroughly investigating the rise of every false system of religion which has deeply impressed mankind, that there is connected with it some strange and wonderful supernatural influence, with more or less of deception also. Mohammedanism had these, so did heathenism with its peculiar oracles. Swedenborg, Ann Lee, Mormonism, Spiritualism, Christian Science,—all have these peculiar influences, some of them in a more marked degree than others. Satan has a finger in all these, working shrewdly to deceive men to their ruin, counterfeiting the work of God, breaking down faith in the cardinal doctrines of the Bible, especially in Christ and his coming. It is impossible for man sitting down coolly, unaided, left alone to his own resources, to rouse up that fanatical faith which will move such masses of people, and hold them together to bear persecution, risk life itself, cause the submission of the will to that of their leaders, till they will do anything for them, make any sacrifices. Human influence alone is not powerful enough to do this. The religious nature must be perverted and enlisted first.

Our Saviour points out these movements which have been so remarkable in our time. Satan designs to deceive the world in regard to Christ's second advent, as he did the masses regarding the first advent. The blindness, bitterness, and intense hatred, the strange, sudden change which came over the minds of the populace, and the spirit which actuated them, were all evidently caused by the spirit of Satan taking possession of the minds of the people. His power and influence are but little realized in our days, yet it was never more potent. He will "deceive if possible the very elect."

It is well known that Spiritualists claim that the rise of this movement is the second advent of Christ. Their mediums are the "Christs of the last dispensation."

"What is the meaning of the word 'Christ?'—'Tis not as supposed, the Son of the Creator of all things. Any just and perfect being is Christ.'—Spiritual Telegraph, No. 37. "It shall be the organ through which the Christs of the last dispensation will choose to speak."—Taken from the prospectus of the Truth Seeker, a Spiritualist paper. "All the testimony from advanced spirits only shows Christ was a medium or reformer in Judea; that he now is an advanced spirit in the sixth sphere, but that he never claimed to be God, and does not at present. I have had two communications to that effect. I have also read some that Dr. Hare had."—Dr. Weiss, before an investigating class of Spiritualists in New York City. "Hearken then to the voice of wisdom, O ye inhabitants of the earth, and be not blinded as to your Lord's appearing; for he is already in your midst."—Important announcement to the world, from the Spiritual Telegraph. "This second coming of Christ means simply the second coming of truths that are not themselves new, that have always existed. . . . He said, 'When I come again, I shall not be known to you.' Spiritualism is that second coming of Christ."—Banner of Light, Nov. 18, 1865, the controlling spirit through Mrs. Conant.

These testimonies are abundantly sufficient to demonstrate that Spiritualism claims to be Christ's second coming. Its mediums claim to be what they say Christ was, simply a mouth-piece for the spirits of the departed to proclaim truths to the world. Hence, a multitude of Christs have appeared in our age. Swedenborg advanced this delusive doctrine, and multitudes have taken it up in our time, showing indeed great signs and wonders. It is truly wonderful how the spirit of our age is permeated with these false principles concerning the coming of Christ. Even the so-called orthodox churches, in one way or another, are disseminating them. According to popular theology and opinion, Christ comes when a good man dies, when a soul is converted, in every great spiritual outpouring, and in great reformatory movements. So common are such sentiments, united as they are in the common belief with that of the soul going to heaven or hell at death, that the importance of the second advent of our Lord in glory, is almost wholly obliterated from the public mind as a possible contingency.

How wonderfully our Lord predicted this condition of things in our time! "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not." How often have believers in our Lord's soon coming, had scoffers accuse them of being of the class who should say, "Lo, here," or "Lo, there!" But a moment's reflection proves that this caution of our Saviour is not applicable to the sincere believer in the personal appearing of Christ, in the slightest degree. It refers wholly to those with false ideas of the nature of Christ's coming, to false Christs, who claim to be Christ himself, or to fulfill the predictions he made of his coming, "Wherefore if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert; go not forth: behold, he is in the secret chambers; believe it not. For as the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Matt. 24:23, 26, 27.

These cautions include every class and every profession of whatever name or persuasion or sect, who teach in the last days that Christ's coming is in any other way than that which he declares himself, visible, personal, glorious, with shining angels, and light resplendent, outshining the sun in its meridian, far surpassing anything and everything ever beheld in majesty and grandeur on our earth before. Those who thus belittle or counterfeit this glorious event, are the enemies of Christ, whether they realize it or not.

THE RELIGIONS OF INDIA.—NO 2.

Their Origin.

The religions of India originally came from the impious descendants of Ham and the co-laborers of Nimrod in building the tower of Babel. From the map of India it will be seen that it is a great three-cornered country stretching southward from mid-Asia into the ocean. The chief part of its western side is washed by the Arabian Sea, and the chief part of its eastern side by the Bay of Bengal, extending into the Indian Ocean. But while thus guarded along the whole length of its boundaries by nature's defenses,—the Himalaya Mountains on the north and the ocean on the east, west, and south,—it has on its northeastern and its northwestern frontiers two opposite gateways, which connect it with the rest of Asia. On the northeast it is bounded by the Buddhist kingdom of Burmah, and on the northwest by the Mohammedan States of Afghanistan and Beloochistan, where two streams of population of widely diverse types poured into India by the passes at these northeastern and northwestern corners.

The two chief races of India are pre-historic. The earliest glimpses of Indian history disclose these two races struggling for the soil. One was a fair-skinned people who entered by the northwestern passes, a people who called themselves Aryan, literally of "noble" lineage, speaking a stately language, worshiping friendly and powerful gods. From these Aryans came the Brahmans and Rajputs of India. The other race was of a lower type, who had long dwelt in the land, and whom the newcomers often drove back into the mountains or reduced to servitude on the plains. The comparatively pure descendants of these two races are now nearly equal in numbers. Subsequent to this, a third race, the Scythians, played an important part in India about the beginning of the Christian era. The Mohammedans belong to a period about a thousand years later.

Among these oldest dwellers there were many tribes called the non-Aryans, or aborigines. They have left no written records; the use of letters or even the simplest hieroglyphics was unknown to them. All that we know of them are rude stone circles and upright slabs and mounds, beneath which, like the primitive peoples of Europe, they buried their dead. They knew how to make round pots of hard, thin, earthenware, not inelegant in shape; they fought with iron weapons, and wore ornaments of copper and gold. They were the ancient tomb-builders. They possessed an intelligence like the first race in China and Japan, superior to the present race of people inhabiting these countries. These too left a religious mold that is now seen in India.

The Aryans entered India from the colder north, and prided themselves on their fair complexion. Their Sanskrit word for color (varna) came to mean "race" or "caste." The old Aryan poets composed the Veda, probably 3,000 or 4,000 years ago. These Vedic hymns describe the primitive tribes as "disturbers of sacrifices," gross "feeders on flesh," "lawless," "without gods, and without rites."

From the intelligent people of India sprang many heathen reformers which developed distinct modes of worship, multiplying sects in India. These coming principally from the different castes, they have left their indelible impress on its followers, as Christianity has left its mold upon Christian civilized nations. The Brahmans became the priests of the highest rank. When a Brahman was asked by a missionary what gods they worshiped, he replied, "The gods worship us." They claim that at the beginning of the world Brahma proceeded from the mouth of the Creator. They finally developed a routine of ceremonies, studies, and duties. The passing traveler marks them distinct from the bronze-cheeked, large-limbed, leisure-loving Rajput warrior caste of Aryan descent; and from the dark-skinned, flat-nosed, thick-lipped, low castes of non-Aryan origin, with their short bodies and bullet heads. The Brahman stands apart from both, tall and slim, with finely modeled lips and nose, fair complexion, high forehead, and a slightly coconut-shaped skull—the man of self-centered refinement. He is also distinguished by his dress. He represents a class who became the ruling power in the country, not by force of arms, but by the vigor of hereditary culture and temperance. They eat no flesh meat, drink nothing intoxicating, use neither tobacco nor opium. Such food to some castes of Brahmans is so detestable that some Christian Brahmans will not allow their children to associate with the European missionaries, lest they partake of their habits and break their caste.

The Brahmans were not only the priests and philosophers, but also the lawyers, the men of science, and the poets of their race. As early as 250 B. C., two alphabets or written characters were used in India. But the Brahmans handed down their holy learning by memory rather than by writing it out. They learned the Veda by heart, as well as many other books. They studied the movements of the heavenly bodies, and more than three thousand years ago they had worked out a fairly correct calculation of the solar year. This, however, was brought from Egypt with them. They were also acquainted with the phases of the moon, the motions of the planets, and the signs of the zodiac. This was before the Greeks had arrived in India, 327 B. C. Their works were translated by the Arabs about 800 A. D., and so reached Europe. They worked out a system of medicine for themselves, and made their first steps in anatomy by cutting up the animals at the sacrifice with a view of offering the different parts to their gods. They also trained their students by means of operations performed on wax spread over a board, instead of flesh, and on the stems of plants. The word "m-s-s-r," pronounced missr, means Egypt, and is used to designate a certain class of Brahmans, which shows that their learning and religion were identical with the Egyptians. They also had an art of music of their own. The seven notes which they invented four centuries B. C., passed through the Persians to Arabia, and were thence introduced into European music in the eleventh century A. D.

One modus operandi of Brahmanic proselytism is the capture of the devotees and spiritual leaders of new sects, and they thus set up new lights in divine matters by organizing new castes, which from their very nature are Brahmanistic. Sir George Campbell wrote in 1871-72: "It is a great mistake to suppose that the Hindu religion is not proselyting. The system of castes gives room for the introduction of any number of outsiders; so long as people do not interfere with existing castes, they may form a new caste, and call themselves Hindus; and the Brahmans are always ready to receive all who will submit to them and pay them. The process of manufacturing Rajputs from ambitious aborigines goes on before our eyes."

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN RUSSIA.

INTERESTING letters have reached me again from this field, which illustrate still more the religious liberty that some claim exists there. But in order that the statements made may be better understood, we give the following as explanation: There are in Russia, besides the State religion, or the Greek-Catholic, a number of tolerated creeds, such as the Roman Catholic, the Mohammedan, the Lutheran, and even certain forms of heathenism, which were found already existing when Russia acquired the territory, or else they came in as settlers were invited in times past from Germany, as the Menonites, etc. These are acknowledged by the government and tolerated, but besides the general acknowledgment of the denomination, every one of the meeting-houses or places, and every one of the ministers or priests are subject to a special permission, which confines the priest or minister in his work to his own members, and to that special place of worship, and obliges him to keep a careful record of all the births, deaths, or marriages performed, and to all additions to his church. And while the Russian State church can propagate all it pleases, the tolerated churches must keep their belief to themselves. Thus it can be truly said that the Roman Catholic, the Protestant, and even the Mohammedan can find temples of his own where he can worship in Russia; but woe unto any one if he should begin to labor for any one else outside of his own membership.

To illustrate still further: a Baptist, who after a long struggle is finally tolerated in Russia, moves to a new place, where there is no church of his. He invites his minister to come and hold some meetings, and invites some of his Lutheran friends; but as his house is not as yet acknowledged as a meeting-house, and his minister has not as yet permission to preach there, they both are liable to a heavy fine. But before his house is acknowledged, and grounded in love," watered by the dews of grace, and springing up beneath the bright beams of the Sun of Righteousness.

Let us not then be discouraged by the scenes that confront our human vision, or become circumscribed and narrow-minded in our spiritual perceptions. We are in the minority here, but in the vast majority with God and angels and the inhabitants of unfallen worlds. Here it is the "little flock," but only as part of the mighty flock that fill the orbits of the skies. When we meet to worship and give praise to God, we are in good company, for it is to join with the innumerable company of the saints in light, and in the mighty anthem which from all the universe of God ascribes "blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." L. A. S.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

FALSE calls to "build" the New Jerusalem in Jackson county, Mo., or Salt Lake, in Deseret, gathering a multitude of deluded souls who expect to become Christs when they die, and revel in the possession of a harem of "sealed" wives to all eternity, rearing a multitude of progeny to reign over, are likely referred to by our Saviour. Millions in all will bein this delusion. So also does he have in view the fearful deceptions of Spiritualism which will deceive multitudes in the last days. Founded on a false view of the condition of man in death, millions believe they are communicating with the spirits of the departed, while they are really doing so with "the spirits of devils," who work miracles, leading away to the "secret chambers" where spiritual circles are held, and these false doctrines inculcated by deluded mediums who are so inflated by Satan that they imagine they have become Christs themselves. Such will be deceived to their ruin, and awake too late from their dream of deception, when the plagues of God's wrath fall upon them. Our Lord brings this feature to view: "For wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." Verse 28. Authors tell us the term "eagle" in this and other places in the common version, signifies the Griffon vulture. They "are pre-eminently the scavengers of the East." (See Schaff's Bible Dictionary, Art. Eagle.)

The figure used by our Lord referring here to the time just preceding his second coming, is that of a carcass being devoured by the vultures. So will our world be torn and devastated by the judgments of God just before the end, after having been warned of Christ's coming, and having rejected it, as the Jewish church did the same Christ at his first advent. False doctrines will be everywhere prevalent. Hatred against those who observe the Sabbath of the Bible, who keep the commandments of God, and are looking for the Lord's return, and are vigorously sounding the warning, will be intense with those who have rejected light. Persecution will be invoked to put them down; the Church, the State, and the world will be in union against them. False views of Christ's coming will everywhere prevail. Selfishness and love of the world and of pleasure will be the absorbing themes of interest. Violence, riots, bloodshed, and class arrayed against class will be everywhere.

Then the judgments of God will fall; the seven last plagues (Revelation 16) will be poured out. These judgments will swoop down upon a corrupt world, like the vultures upon a carcass, rending it, devouring, and destroying it. Then Christ will appear in his glory, and gather his people from the four winds of heaven. Thus does our Lord represent the perils and terrors of the last days. And who can fail to see the clouds from which this terrible storm will burst, gathering around us? Everything is preparing for it. The world is filled with a spirit of unrest and discontent. The great subject of the Lord's return is made a matter of ridicule even by professors of religion. Christ's teachings on this subject are woefully perverted all about us. Selfish impostors arise in various directions, claiming to be Christ, leading away foolish women to gratify their lusts, or duping men in their folly. A dreaming, worldly church put off the day of our Lord's return, its preachers glibly talking of his coming at death or conversion, lulling the conscience to ease and false security concerning the nearness of that great event, which hasteth in its approach.

These things, dear reader, are strikingly set forth by our Lord as signs of his near coming. This is the state of society when his return is imminent. Let us not be among the evil servants who say, "My lord delayeth his coming," at such a time as this. These omens will intensify more and more. Strange manifestations will increase as the end draws near. Spiritualism will be disguising itself under new forms, seeking to clothe itself in garments of light, claiming to be Christian, in order more readily to deceive. "Christian science," so-called, which is sweeping through the land, making believers in all directions, doing indeed many remarkable things, and working apparently miraculous cures, is closely related to Spiritualism in doctrine. (See pamphlet "Christian Science; What is it? Is it science? Is it Christian?" Price 15 cents, published by Pacific Press, Oakland, Cal.; 43 Bond St., New York City.) It has made remarkable progress during the last ten years.

"The coming of the truth is the coming of Christ. We have no longer a personal Jesus. We are no longer seeking to be like the sinless Jew of eighteen hundred years ago." "Here let us apprehend the wise words of our teacher [Mrs. Eddy]: 'Christian science is the second advent of Christ.'"—"The New Interpolation," p. 110. "The coming of the Lord is a descent from the heavens within us, into the body of humanity of the same divine truth which was manifested in Jesus Christ. . . . The Christian Scientist believes that Christ is now here."—"Condensed Thoughts," pp. 49, 50.

Any discerning person can notice the ear-marks connected with these statements, showing the family relation from Swedenborg down to modern Spiritualism. Under one guise or another the same sentiments are inculcated, all of which are utterly contrary to the plain declarations of our Lord himself. These will no doubt increase more and more till the end. The public mind is ripe for the reception of such delusions. The masses, professors and non-professors of religion, have no love for Christ's personal advent. It would be the greatest terror conceivable to most of them. It would bring to an end the things they love most of all. Hence they prefer to believe in most anything else but the event they dislike. But we beseech you, dear reader, that you be careful to notice that this great sign of false Christs, the "lo, here" and "lo there" is Christ, of which our Lord warned us, is fulfilled remarkably already before our eyes. "Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." "Surely I come quickly; Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." G. I. B.

LED BY THE SPIRIT.

"For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." Rom. 8:14.

The honor of being a son or daughter of God is offered to every one who accepts the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. We do not have to wait until Jesus comes and bestows immortality upon us to be taken into this close and honorable relation to him. The apostle John thus testifies, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." 1 John 3:2. We become the sons of God by a union of ourselves with Christ, the divine and only begotten Son of God. Jesus is and always was the Son of God. He took upon him our nature that he might reveal divinity to mankind. Those who receive him he is not ashamed to call brethren. If we thus by faith become brethren of one who is the Son of God by inherent right, we, in the sense of adoption, become members of the family of God,—of the royal family of heaven. And if we are thus adopted, we know it,—we receive "the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." Rom. 8:15-17.

Those who are thus joined to Christ and become members of the "household of faith," are not left to their own direction. Man without the divine guidance is sure to go astray. Says the prophet:

"O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." Jer. 10:23. Therefore we need the direction of the Spirit of God. Israel's journey from Egypt to the land of promise, guided by day by a pillar of cloud, and by night by a pillar of fire, is an illustration of what the Lord wants to do for every individual who comes to him. Says the psalmist, "Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory." Ps. 73:24.

The trouble with many of us is that we do not submit to the Lord's guidance. We try to guide ourselves. We depend upon our own judgment rather than upon the Spirit of God for direction. Yet if we are not led by the Spirit of God, we cannot be his children; for they are thus led.

We have been especially impressed the last few months, while studying the Acts of the Apostles, with the fact that they were under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit. Philip was directed to go into the desert just in time to explain the word of God to a man whose mind the same Spirit had prepared to receive the truth. In the same miraculous manner Cornelius was prepared to receive the gospel from Peter, and Peter was instructed to make it known to Cornelius without fear of the national barriers which had hitherto divided the Jew from the Gentile.

By the direction of the Spirit of God, Paul and Barnabas were separated to the work to which the Lord called them. Of the commencement of this missionary journey we read, "So they being sent forth by the Holy Ghost departed unto Selucia." Is it any wonder that under such divine direction their labors should be so signally blessed of God? Not only did the Holy Spirit tell them where to go, but it also closed up before them unpromising and unfruitful fields. On one occasion Paul and Silas were "forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia." The Lord did not want them to go there. Then a little later they "assayed to go into Bithynia: but the Spirit suffered them not." Going on to Troas they tarried there all night. They did not know where to go. Every avenue was shut up before them. That night at Troas must have been a time of great anxiety for the apostles. Where would they next go to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation? Ere they retired to rest, how they must have pleaded with God who had sent them forth, to direct them to the right place. During that night God answered their prayers. "A vision appeared to Paul in the night; there stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us. And after he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them." Acts 16:9-11. No doubt there were many places in Asia where souls were waiting for the gospel; but the time had come for the gospel to be proclaimed in Europe, and so the Spirit of God closed the way to Asia and opened the way into Europe before the apostles. Their first experience in Macedonia at Philippi, where they were whipped and placed in the prison with their "feet fast in the stocks," was calculated to try their faith; but their miraculous deliverance from prison and the conversion of the jailer and his family showed that God had made no mistake in directing them to Macedonia.

These lessons from the Acts of the Apostles should be very useful to us at the present time. The Lord is just as willing to guide his servants now as he was then. The closing work of the gospel now being given in the threefold message of Rev. 14:6-12, is as important as any work ever committed to mankind, and the Lord does not want his servants who are proclaiming it to go about this work without the special aid of the Spirit of God. Jesus said, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28:30); and the promise of the Spirit was "to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." Acts 2:39. Has the Lord called us to do a great and special work for the world, that the great day of God shall not come upon them as a thief? We confidently believe that he has.

What then shall hinder the manifestations of the Spirit of God among us, for the good of the cause of truth which has been laid upon us to carry to the world? What but our own unbelief,—our fail-we have any less confidence when we ask God to do for us that which he has promised to do, upon our exercising faith in him? Surely his word has not lost its power by being written, nor by the lapse of time since the Almighty gave it utterance. He has spoken it once for us, and to us, though we were then unborn; and how can we expect him to speak the words again? God does not have to speak more than once, for his word is omnipotent. It will not return unto him void, but will accomplish the purpose whereto he has sent it.

We should realize, then, that when God speaks to us, he speaks through his word. He has there given us line upon line, precept upon precept, promise upon promise, so that there is no possible condition into which any of us can come where we will be beyond the range of its instruction,—where we cannot find in it just that which is applicable to our needs. Then if we do not read the word of God, how often will God speak to us? Will he leave what he has spoken to us in his word to become void, and give us some special revelation of the same truths because of our careless indifference?—Verily not.

Since then God speaks to us through his word, his power toward us is manifested by the same means. His power and his word are inseparable. The power of God unto salvation is the gospel, and the gospel is the word. Do we realize, then, when we desire more of the power of God, that that power is to be found in his word? Do we realize that we must go to the word for that power, and that we cannot reasonably expect the power if we neglect the word? When God has given us all the power that we need—creative power—stored up in his word, can any one expect some wonderful power from God to be given him or manifested in his behalf outside of the source which he has already provided?

It is by the word of God that we exercise faith. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Faith is belief in the word, and where there is no word of God, there is no faith. Faith grasps the promises of God, and brings the fulfillment of them into the life of the individual.

The word of God sustains spiritual life. To the tempter Christ said, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God;" and to the Jews, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." "Bread" sustains the natural life, but the spiritual life is maintained by the word, and the word is Christ. John 1:1; Rev. 19:11-13. Christ, the Word, is the bread of spiritual life. John 6:51-56.

By the word of God we are kept from sinning. "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to thy word.

... Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:9-11. "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." Ps. 119:105. The truth shall be the "shield and buckler" of God's people in the time of trouble. Ps. 91:4. Christ, our example, met and overcame temptation with the word of God. And those who go to that word in time of temptation can testify to the overcoming power which it affords them in time of need.

Is it not evident, therefore, that an individual's Christian experience can never go beyond his knowledge of the word of God? And is it any wonder that he who neglects the Bible or gives it only an occasional and hasty glance should somehow fail to get hold of that genuine experience which he seeks, and of which he feels his need?

How evident, then, that we need above all things to study the word, not merely read, but study it—for we cannot get out of it anything more than we are able to see in it. Only thus can any one become "wise unto salvation," and be "perfect thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Terrestrial Convulsions, a Last-day Sign.

"AND great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences; and fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven. But before all these, they shall lay their hands on you, and persecute you, delivering you up to the synagogues, and into prisons, being brought before kings and rulers for my name's sake. . . . And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake." Luke 21:11-17.

These words of our Lord have had a remarkable fulfillment. They clearly show that our earth before the end takes place, will give vivid evidences by its violent throes and convulsions, that the great consummation is approaching. The signs of Christ's coming are not any one thing merely, but a great number of strange precursors, coming in wonderful combinations and profusion. Neither are they in the main new things which were never seen or heard of before. The tokens of his approach are rather calamities, convulsions, and striking occurrences which have been known occasionally in the world, but which as the end draws near, will become remarkably common or far surpass in intensity any previous exhibition of the same sort.

In the above statement, our Saviour clearly locates the time when the signs he mentions will occur. It will be after the great persecution of his disciples is past. He expressly states that the persecutions, the delivering up and bringing before kings and rulers and imprisoning of his followers, should be "before all these" great earthquakes, pestilences, "fearful sights and great signs" which he gives as the special tokens of his coming, should take place. He does not mean of course that these would never have happened before; for we know they had been seen in all ages occasionally. Instances of their occurrence are mentioned in the Old Testament and in ancient history. How, then, can they serve as "signs" of Christ's return to our earth?—Only by a far greater frequency. He declares they will be displayed in a remarkable manner, as we may reasonably believe, in a far greater degree at the time of his appearing than ever before in the history of mankind, even after the close of the great persecutions which occurred during the 1260 years of the papal supremacy.

It is in the highest degree reasonable that they should. All these exhibitions are the result of the disorder sin has brought into our world; evidences of old age, decrepitude, and coming ruin to a world lying under the curse. Can any one for a moment suppose that when God created our world and pronounced everything he had made "very good," such terrible convulsions were seen in it as are now beheld constantly? Were all the elements in such disorder then, as are constantly seen now? Were volcanoes bursting forth, pouring out lava to bury cities, hurling great stones and floods of ashes or mud and scalding water, to destroy thousands of lives in a moment? Were earthquakes tossing the solid ground into waves, tumbling buildings to ruin amid screams of agony and the shrieks of tortured humanity? We cannot believe it. These things are the results of the curse pronounced because of sin.

As the earth grows old and draws near to the time of its visitation by its Creator, to rescue it from the thralldom of sin and the woes of the curse, the evidences of its sad condition will greatly thicken. It will indeed quiver in the chills of its expiring agony, or tremble with the internal fever of its closing convulsions. These symptoms will be terribly alarming as the end draws near. So our Lord declares. As we have seen, the great earthquake of Lisbon in 1755 was the first of the specially noted signs at the opening of the sixth seal. But many thousands of others will follow in the last days.

Scientists acknowledge themselves unable to give the causes of earthquakes. They theorize, speculate, observe, and note many facts, but cannot clearly grasp the great problem. Whether the central portion of our earth is a vast ocean of fire; rolling and heaving till the crust trembles with paroxysms, and quakes to give vent to these billows of flame, or whether the internal fires occupy only portions of the central bulk, none can exactly determine.

Moses wrote: "For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and burneth unto the lowest pit [margin, sheol], and devoureth the earth with her increase, and setteth on fire the foundations of the mountains." Deut. 32:22, Revised Version. The grand fact is thus revealed that God caused these internal conflagrations, and that they will continue, and finally uniting with the last-day flames from heaven above, will consume, purify, and melt over this old disfigured world and sin-cursed earth of ours, till it comes forth again from the hands of its Redeemer a new and glorious earth, in which the righteous will ever dwell, and sin shall never come. 2 Pet. 3:7-13; Rev. 20:8-15; 21:1-5.

As certainly as God's hand directs Providence, so certainly does he overrule the earthquake. The great earthquake of Lisbon was foretold by prophecy ages in advance. It came at the time predicted, ushering in the grand era of the tokens of our Lord's return. "I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath," said Peter at Pentecost. Acts 2:19. The signs in the earth beneath would reasonably include these remarkable phenomena. There is nothing in all nature that is more terrible, nothing which makes man more feel his utter helplessness, nothing which more clearly demonstrates the utter instability of all earthly things. Says Seneca, "What is safe if the solid earth cannot be relied upon?"

The question which the Roman orator and philosopher could not answer, any Christian can solve. God and heaven are safe, and cannot be shaken. Our earth shall yet pass through the throes of dissolution of which the terrible earthquake is but the precursor and token. Our Lord declares that just before the end "great earthquakes shall be in divers places." Has his prediction been fulfilled? In answering this query, we shall present facts culled from many others presented by Taylor in his "Great Consummation," all of which we cannot present for lack of space. He has quoted from many eminent authors, some of whom have made the subject a life study. Robert Mallet, whose extensive researches make him an authority on this subject, presents facts from which the following table is made:—

Earthquakes recorded before the birth of Christ:—
	Total.	Gr't. earthquakes.	No. of yrs.
Thence to end of 9th century,	58	4	1,700
" 15th "	197	15	900
" 18th "	532	44	600
" 18th "	2,804	100	300
Thence to 1850,	3,240	53	50

The reader can discern at a glance the remarkable increase in frequency of these terrible phenomena, and no scientist disputes these facts.

Mr. Taylor presents these facts arranged differently thus:—

"Earthquakes in the fourth century, 21; in the fifth, 25; in the sixth, 31; in the seventh, 10; in the eighth, 11; in the ninth, 36; in the tenth, 17; in the eleventh, 57; in the twelfth, 68; in the thirteenth, 55; in the fourteenth, 58; in the sixteenth, 110; in the seventeenth, 180; in the eighteenth, 680; in the first fifty years of this nineteenth century, 924 earthquakes."—"Great Consummation," pp. 163, 164.

Who can fail to notice a wonderful increase in this age? Professor Milne presents the following list, which doubtless includes all of these phenomena, whether great or small:—

From 1843 to 1847 there were	1,604 earthquakes.
" 1848 " 1852 "	" 2,047 "
" 1853 " 1857 "	" 3,018 "
" 1858 " 1862 "	" 3,140 "
" 1863 " 1867 "	" 2,845 "
" 1868 " 1872 "	" 4,502 "

According to this list, there were 17,158 earthquakes during a period of but thirty years.

In various parts of the world where earthquakes were very infrequent centuries ago, they have now become common. This is true of Europe, and specially so of Great Britain. In the latter for 800 years, from A. D. 1000 to 1800, there were only 234 recorded, while during only four years, from 1868 to 1872, there were no less than 217 earthquakes. (Proctor, in Harper's Magazine, 1885, p. 140.) Says All the Year Round, "We feel a little uneasy at all these facts."

"The Earl of Shaftsbury said publicly in Exeter Hall, London, that several of the most eminent British geologists fully authorized him to say that England was but the lid of a dreadful well of fire; that there might at any time come a crumbling of the surface, which would convert the whole island into one huge volcano."—"Great Consummation," p. 166.

The citizens of the United States where destructive earthquakes have been almost unknown, will not be likely to forget the terrible calamity which befell Charleston, S. C., Aug. 31, 1886, which came near destroying the whole city. Its people can surely never forget those days of horror.

Volcanoes are far more active than formerly. The first recorded eruption of Vesuvius was in A. D. 79. It was not till the seventeenth century that as many as four could be counted in a hundred years. During the eighteenth century, there were twenty-three, and in the first half of the nineteenth there were twenty-six; it becomes more and more active, and no man can give the cause of this remarkable increase.

It is said that history presents no parallel of the frequency of earthquakes during the years 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870. In Aug. 13, 1868, occurred one in Peru, on the 14th and 15th in Chili, and the 16th in Ecuador. These were "for their extent and violence and wide-spread devastation, among the most terrible on record." Their extent covered sixty degrees of latitude, reaching from the Isthmus of Panama to Cape Horn, and their throes were felt throughout the vast extent of the Pacific Ocean. Men who witnessed these terrible convulsions, testify to having seen as "vivid a picture of the judgment day as is possible in this world. A list of over two hundred earthquakes has been reported during fourteen months between October, 1867, and January, 1869, a number many times in excess of any preceding year. G. I. B.

THE RELIGIONS OF INDIA.—NO. 4.

The Jainists and Parsees.

THERE is a special sect called the Jains, a product of the Buddhists, numbering about half a million. Like the Buddhists they are atheists. They deny the authority of the Veda, except in so far as it agrees with their own doctrines; they disregard sacrifice, practice a strict morality, believe that their past and future states depend wholly upon their own actions rather than on any external deity, and refuse to kill either man or beast. Not only do they abstain from all kinds of flesh, like all Buddhists and Brahmins, but the more rigid of them drink only filtered water, breathe only through a veil, go sweeping the ground before them, for fear of swallowing or crushing any invisible animalcules. They are usually merchants or bankers. Their charity is boundless, and they form the chief supporters of the best hospitals which the old Buddhist tenderness for animals has left in many of the cities of India. Like the Buddhists, they are divided into a clerical body and a laity. But the monastic system is developed to a less degree among them. They have their holy books.

The Parsees are another independent people. They are said to be fire-worshippers, and brought their sacred fire with them from Persia. Being driven from their native land by the Mohammedans in the early part of the eighth century, they settled near Bombay, and finally moved to that place. In the morning, by the sea-shore, and all through the day, to a greater or less extent, they can be seen reading their prayers, on the streets, with their faces uplifted toward the sun. They have their own hospitals and charitable and educational institutions, and are peculiar in their dress as well as in their religion. The outside garment is a sack coat, with a hat, tab in front, slanting from the front part to the back lower portion. The women dress very neatly, but expensively.

They claim that as this earth and mankind derive their greatest benefits from the sun, the water, and the air, by looking at these objects in their worship and preserving holy fire continually, it causes them to think of God the Creator. They are not idolaters in the sense of the other heathen worshippers of India, nor ever were. It is supposed they obtained their ideas from the Jews, whom they befriended at the time they overthrew Babylon, the mightiest kingdom on the earth. Their experience also in the days of Esther may have turned their minds toward the God the Jews worshipped. They have no faith in Christ nor the Christian religion. It cannot be said that they are divided up into sects, but they are distinct from all other religions in Asia, both as religionists and in their dress and general appearance.

They believe this world is the battle-field of two contending gods, eternal in their origin, and possessing nearly equal power. Ormuzd is the wise god, and is the author of all good. Ahriman is evil in his nature, and strives to neutralize the beneficent activities of Ormuzd. Ormuzd finally enters upon the last decisive phase of the struggle, with determined zeal, and Ahriman and his followers are defeated and cast into hell, and remain there. He will then be destitute of power to disturb the progress and enjoyment of the good, who are to be rewarded and to prosper unvexed by evil as good citizens of the kingdom.

Their method of disposing of the dead is peculiar. According to their belief, a dead body is the direct result of the working of the power of evil, and is unclean, and must not be allowed to contaminate by its presence any of the elements. Therefore, they must neither bury it in the earth nor burn it in the fire, nor throw it into the water; for by thus doing these elements would be defiled. They are therefore exposed on a circular structure without a roof, on a shelf slightly sloping toward the interior, where there is an opening toward the center. After depositing the dead upon this shelf, the vultures make swift work of it; and the bones, stripped of flesh, are afterward swept down through the central aperture into the cavity below. These structures are called "towers of silence."

There are in India about one hundred thousand Parsees, entirely distinct from all others; half a million Jainists, equally separate; 50,121,595 Mohammedans, who are also distinct with all their various sects; then the Hindus, with their numberless sects and creeds, and 123 different languages and dialects. The individual impress of the founders of these different religions has created systems of faith and institutions for the propagation of the same, each of which stands directly against the introduction of Christianity; and yet Christianity to-day claims 1,000,000 converts, including those from every caste and class of society in the country. One remarkable feature of the religions of India is that there is less conformity to the customs and usages of each of the different sects than there is with the different sects of Christianity in America.

The English law protects every faith,—the Mohammedan who observes the sixth day of the week as a Sabbath, the 50,000 Jews who observe the seventh day, the 100,000 Europeans who observe the first day, and the multitude of the heathen who observe no day. Upon the same bench sits the English judge and the Indian caste judge, so that legal questions can be decided by those understanding the peculiar class of caste to which individuals belong. If it is a question of property in which caste law is involved, it is turned over to the caste judge. God in this manner has wonderfully prepared the way for the truth for these last days to enter every village and hamlet of the 285,000,000 people in India. S. N. H.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

INDIA.

To the sight-seer no other places in India are so attractive as Agra and Delhi. "Shall you see the Taj?" is inquired of every one going into the country. "Have you seen the Taj?" is the question put most frequently to those departing.

Three hundred years ago India was the scene of a great conquest. Mohammedans, mighty in strength and energy, entered the country through the northwest passes, and in twenty-five years effeminate India was pretty nearly subdued, though determined and partly successful resistance had been offered in some parts. Akbar the Great is supposed to be the founder and organizer of the famous Moghul dynasty, and to him and his successors we are indebted for those wonderful monuments of architecture and patient toil, which are the glory of present India, and which characterize those times and those men the wonder of a boasted age.

Shah Jehan (king of the world) was grandson to Akbar, and to his indomitable energy we are chiefly in debt for these palaces of dreamland. He first seems to have settled upon Futtipoor Sikra as his capital. This place is twenty-three miles from Agra. Here he built palaces and fortifications of great beauty and strength which are to-day empty, except for the fakirs and guides who inhabit a few of the halls. He soon relinquished this idea for Agra, as being better situated. This place is in the heart of northwest India and on the river Jumna, a stream nearly as sacred as the Ganges. He built at Agra, the fort, an inclosure one and a half miles in circumference, surrounded with a red sandstone wall, said to be seventy feet high. It is certainly very massive, and has lost none of its original grandeur, it being apparently as good as new. Within this inclosure the king built his own private mosque, called the Pearl Mosque, the Judgment hall, the hall of Private Audience, the Jasmine Tower, or queen's apartments, and private gardens and baths. These are all of marble of different colors, inlaid with stones, some of them precious. But vandalism has spoiled them of most of the latter. The fresco and gilding, the mirrors and pictures, are gone or ruined by age; otherwise these buildings retain much of their beauty. The casements of these buildings and of the others of their class are filled with marble-screens of exquisite workmanship. These screens are frequently more than six feet square, of a single slab of marble two and a half or three inches thick, and are pierced into a fine net-work in beautiful patterns, the whole work being without a flaw.

From most of the casements of these beautiful buildings, one looks out, down, and across a bend in the Jumna to the wonderful Taj Mahal. This was intended as a monument of Shah Jehan's devotion to his favorite wife. He followed the ordinary course of men's natures, however, by building it plenty large enough for himself also, and his tomb is side by side with that of the loved queen. There is a beauty of sentiment in such a testimony of love; but it is greatly marred by the fact that 20,000 men worked here for eighteen years under forced labor, with less than a decent subsistence for their reward.

A beautiful garden of ten acres is in front of the Taj. On either flank is a mosque, one for men, the other for women. The entrance is through a gateway of noble structure and proportions, built of red sandstone inlaid with marble. A broad marble walk inclosing a tank of water leads to the mausoleum. This is built upon a platform 30 feet high and 300 feet square, with a lofty minaret on each corner. The building is about two hundred feet square, and rises with a dome to about one hundred and fifty feet. Platform minarets and buildings are all of pure white marble. Within, the mausoleum is of the same material, richly inlaid. The two tombs are surrounded by an exquisite marble screen. It is not only in detail that one is impressed with this remarkable place. Its beauty is most impressive as one stands at a distance and takes in the symmetry and harmony of outline and surroundings. Other notable structures of those times claim the attention of the traveler, but I will not pause to describe them now nor even name them.

The most interesting feature of my visit to this place was a brief conversation I enjoyed with Dr. Clara Swain, who has for several years been attached to the family of one of the native rulers as physician. Her influence as a Christian extends far and wide. At home she is seventy-five miles from white people; at this time she was with the rani (queen) in Agra.

Later in his career Shah Jehan decided to go to Delhi with his government. Akbar had already built the fortifications, and the buildings of the fort were added to by the already celebrated builder. It would scarcely be of interest to enter into a detailed description of them. The hall of Private Audience, to my mind, excels for massive and gorgeous beauty anything in India. Over thirty marble pillars three feet square, beneath Gothic arches, support the roof and ceiling, which is a marvel of frescoed glory. Here is the platform that supported the Peacock Throne, said to have cost $20,000,000. On the frieze of this structure is the legend, "If paradise be on earth, it is here; it is here." He found it was not there; for his son afterward usurped the throne, and one of those marble rooms became the dreary prison of its builder, Shah Jehan.

Delhi is an ancient city with a history contemporary with that of Babylon. Within a radius of ten miles are scattered the ruins of many ancient buildings which once constituted the city of Delhi. The present town is an important center of native manufacture and trade. As one travels from Calcutta toward the northwest, a constant improvement in the appearance and stature of the people, as well as in the character of the work done by them, is very apparent.

Here it was my privilege to breakfast with Mr. F. J. Blewitt, the local Methodist Episcopal missionary, and to meet at the same time Elder Dennis Osborne, presiding elder of the Punjab district. Their work is new in this district, but in the last seven months they have 8,000 accessions to report. G. C. T.

the links are ordinarily a quarter of an inch in length, but the maker inserts one silver link in one of the sections which is half an inch in length, instead of a quarter, like the others. Any one can see that that does not disarrange the sections or confuse the links. Each section is there with its seven links, one section simply having a longer link than the others. Or, to take another illustration, suppose a heavy embossing machine has a fly-wheel which makes seven revolutions to one impression of the die. We will suppose that the wheel ordinarily makes one revolution in two seconds of time, but the engineer, on one particular occasion, applies the brakes and checks the motion of the machine, so that the wheel occupies four seconds in making that revolution instead of two. As in the other case, any one can see that that would not affect the fact that the seventh revolution would bring the impression of the die just the same. So, we apprehend, the Lord treated the machinery of our earth on that occasion mentioned in Joshua. He simply applied the brakes so that it took the earth forty-eight hours to make the revolution, instead of twenty-four hours. It is the revolution of the earth that makes a day, be it longer or shorter. Unless divine power especially interposes, one revolution of the earth on its axis occupies twenty-four hours; but if the Lord should choose to speed up the machinery, so that a revolution should be accomplished in twelve ordinary hours, that would be a day just the same, though shorter than ordinary days. And if he should then slow it down so that it would take thirty-six ordinary hours in making a revolution, that would still be only a day, but three times longer than the other. Bearing in mind the fact that a day is not just so much absolute time, but a revolution of the earth, whether it occupies more or less time, there will be no difficulty with this long day of Joshua's time, nor with that other question of a definite day on a round world.

290.—THE CREATION OF MAN. GEN. 1:27.

A friend of mine requests me to ask you to explain what seems to her a contradiction, namely, Gen. 1:27, which records the creation of man, and chapter 2:7, which records another creation of man; and the further fact that Eve does not seem to have heard the command not to eat of the forbidden tree. What law is referred to in Gal. 2:21? What is meant by the psalmist when he says, "My flesh crieth out for the living God?"

H. E. C.

Ans.—There is no contradiction between the first two chapters of Genesis. Chapter 1 states the creation of man in a general way. Chapter 2 resumes the subject, to give more fully the particulars of the work, both referring to the same transaction. Gen. 1:27 shows that when the term "man" is used, it includes both male and female. So Eve understood the command in regard to the forbidden tree; for she told the serpent plainly just what their duty was in regard to that tree. (See chapter 3.) The law mentioned in Gal. 2:21 is that law through which certain Jews were teaching the Galatians that they were to obtain righteousness. (See Acts 15:1, 5, 10; Gal. 2:3-5, 11-13.) The words of the psalmist (84:2) expresses the intensity of his longing for God. It was as if the very fibers of his flesh joined in the longing which took possession of his being.

291.—BAPTISM AND FORGIVENESS.

Are we baptized because our sins are forgiven, or in order that they may be forgiven?

H. W. D.

Ans.—Baptism is one of the duties that occupy their respective and appropriate places in the pathway that leads the sinner back to God. "Repent, believe, and be baptized." And if any one is conscious of any sin that he has not put away, he certainly would do well to repent of, and receive forgiveness for, it, before he goes forward in the ordinance of baptism. In the figure of burial, which illustrates baptism, the candidate is supposed to be dead before he is buried,—dead to sin before he performs that symbolic service by which he signifies that fact. A few texts will probably occur to the mind of the reader, with a query whether they accord or not with this view. (1.) Acts 2:38. Peter here speaks of remission of sins, not forgiveness, which is a very different thing, and which takes place at a different time. Remission is the putting away of sins from the sanctuary, the same as the blotting out (chapter 3:19); and baptism, like every other Christian duty, is an act performed for, or looking forward to, that result. Sins are forgiven here and now. They are remitted, blotted out, put away, when the atonement is made in the sanctuary above. (2.) Acts 22:16. When Ananias told Paul to be baptized and wash away his sins, he did not say that he was to wash them away by baptism. The washing away of his sins is a distinct and a separate injunction from that of baptism, and there is nothing to indicate that they are the same act; and the apostle elsewhere tells us that the "washing" is "the washing of regeneration" (Titus 3:5) "by the word." Eph. 5:26. (3.) Heb. 10:22. The apostle does not refer here to baptism, but to physical cleanliness. Baptism is not the putting away of the filth of the flesh. 1 Pet. 3:21. (See also 1 Cor. 6:11.)

TO EVERY MAN HIS WORK.

To be a servant of God, every person has a work to do for God, for his fellow-men, and for himself. To each one the requirement is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself." We cannot keep one part of this commandment and disregard the rest. He who loves God with all his heart will also love his fellow-men, for God has identified himself and his own interests with the interests of humanity. We love God because he first loved us; we love our fellow-men because the principle of divine love has been planted in our hearts. And "he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" 1 John 4:19, 20.

"This is his [God's] commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment." 1 John 3:23. For our selves we must believe on the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and for our fellow-men we must feel that love which will constrain us to earnest labor for their salvation. Faith itself must work by love, or it will amount to nothing; for if I "have all faith so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing."

Without the principle of love, the Christian life cannot go beyond formality. The reason there is so much formality in the church, and so much profitless discussion and contention, is that so many of its members are not actuated by this divine principle. Their connection with the church is maintained by other interests than their love for God and their desire to help save their fellow-mortals, and when this principle or actuating motive is lacking, everything that a person does is done selfishly, and therefore cannot be acceptable to God.

A great many people are in the church because it is fashionable to be there, or because it is a respectable place to be in, or because it is to their temporal advantage. The interest they take in divine truth is not felt on account of its power to sanctify their own hearts, but because of its value for other people and the means it affords for controversy and speculation. They are much more numerous than the few who have yielded up themselves,—their own ways and inclinations and pleasures,—to be in a position where they can uplift and save their fellow-men.

The great universal principle which must pervade all Christian life is that of love. But what is the nature of this principle? Is it a principle which manifests itself simply in words and feelings? The inspired writer says, "My little children, we should not love in word nor with tongue, but in work and in truth." 1 John 3:18. This is saying that the Christian life should be a life of works,—works of charity (or love), such as was the earthly life of Him whom Christians profess to follow. It is not a life of feeling and talking merely, of attending meeting and making a loud profession; but of experience in dealing with the spiritual and temporal needs of humanity, of becoming acquainted with their wants, and of heeding the apostolic injunctions, "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others," and, "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep." Christianity has no tendency whatever to center the thoughts and feelings and ambitions of any individual upon self. Its influence is wholly the opposite.

There is need of a great deal less controversy and speculation in the religious world, and a great deal more of Christian work, of closer spiritual acquaintance among brethren, and a deeper interest in the spiritual and temporal welfare of human souls. This is the only way in which a person is to observe the commandment to love God with all his heart, and his neighbor as himself.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Territorial Convulsions, a Last-day Sign.

ONE writer in Blackwood's Magazine declares:—

"In truth, if people were as superstitious now as in the Middle Ages, we should doubtless have loud prophecies that the end of the world was at hand."

Says Mr. Taylor:—

"Of Lisbon, where, ere the earth was quieted, 200,000 souls went down in death in less than three years; of Peru and other lands in 1868, when 100,000 perished; of Java in 1883, where the tortured islands and angry sea swallowed up 100,000 more; of eruptions that have thrown out material sufficient to make a planetoid; of volcanic din and roar that was heard some eighth the distance round the equator; of convulsions that caused air-waves to move clear around the globe. It is a story of islands submerged, of mountains sinking into the earth, of vast cities laid in the dust, of huge ships borne on mountain waves miles inland, of skies as black as night, and of fleeing, wailing crowds."

"We could write of one of these awful convulsions where the lateral movement, a sudden jerk, was full twenty feet in a moment, shaking buildings and men from side to side like corn in a sieve; or of another where the vertical motion was so violent as to toss dead bodies out of graves; living men, cattle, and stones on the surface perpendicularly into the air to a height of one hundred feet."—"Great Consummation," p. 170.

Such have been the scenes transpiring on this globe of ours in the period in which we live, and in the very time our Saviour declared "great earthquakes" would be "in divers places." Surely there is no need of giving our Lord's prediction a metaphorical signification. How could it be more literally fulfilled before our eyes? Volumes could be filled with a description of facts of thrilling interest concerning these wonderful phenomena. Our earth is waxing old. Already spasmodic throes evince its approaching dissolution. One grander event of the kind foretold by the prophet is not far distant.

"And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done. And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great. And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nation fell; and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath. And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found." Rev. 16:17-20.

That earthquake closes up the scene of earth's orderly arrangement, and reduces its surface to a chaos of ruin. Man's works raised to exalt pride and vain glory, then tumble into utter ruin. Then will be fulfilled the words of Jeremiah:—

"I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form, and void; and the heavens, and they had no light. I beheld the mountains, and, lo, they trembled, and all the hills moved lightly. I beheld, and, lo, there was no man, and all the birds of the heavens were fled. I beheld, and, lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger." Jer. 4:23-26.

Such a condition surely awaits our globe; for the mouth of the Lord has spoken it. And the very forces which will bring the terrible consummation, actively manifest themselves before the eyes of this generation.

Akin to the earthquake shocks are the mighty tidal waves of our time. The one is the shaking of the crust of solid ground upon which we tread, by the pent-up, fearful forces within. The other is in consequence of the same forces exerted in the ocean beds beneath the deep waters. Says Christ:—

"And there shall be signs in sun and moon and stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, in perplexity for the roaring of the sea and the billows; men fainting for fear, and for expectation of the things which are coming on the water," etc. Luke 21:25, 26, Revised Version.

Wakefield's Version expresses the original: "A noise and tossing of the sea." Professor Whiting: "A roaring and tossing of the sea." Emphatic Diaglott: "A roar of sea and tossing." Catholic or Rheim's Version: "Distress of nations by reason of the confusion of the roaring of the sea and of the waves." Englishman's Greek New Testament: "Roaring of the sea and rolling surge."

All express the same thought, that in the period covered by the special signs of Christ's coming, terrible convulsions would be in the sea; such as would astonish and alarm men as unprecedented, awful, and fear-inspiring.

The language used by the inspired writer is too strong, too intense, to refer merely to a wind storm. It far more naturally suggests the effects of a mighty force lifting and tossing the mighty waters exerted beneath old ocean's bed. Such is the cause of the "tidal wave." It is a mighty "sea-quake," closely akin to the earthquake—that mysterious, terrific, subterraneous force shaking the ocean bed, depressing, then lifting it with a titanic power, causing the raging, roaring waters to rise in mighty masses fifty, sixty, yea, in recorded instances, one hundred feet or more, perpendicularly, sweeping everything before them, causing ruin, disaster, and death, and terrifying even to dissolution those viewing it, exposed to its violence.

There is an overwhelming amount of testimony bearing on the fearful tidal waves of the last decades, only a small portion of which we have space to notice. M. Ponton, a distinguished authority on earthquakes and volcanoes, thus writes:—

"One of the most interesting of earthquake phenomena is the great sea-wave which rolls in upon the land with such destructive effects. This wave is observed only when the origin of the shock is at the bottom of the sea. . . . The sea first retreats a long way from the beach, and then returns in a mighty wave of great height, which runs up far beyond the highest tide-mark, sweeping everything before it. The greatest sea-waves are produced when the center of the disturbance is near the shore."—History of Earthquakes and Volcanoes, p. 44, as quoted by Taylor.

Says Harper's Magazine, March, 1869:—

"That most horrible of phenomena—the tidal wave—how many struggling mortals has it swept back into the deep! What countless ships has it crushed against the shores! What mighty cities has it plundered of life and wealth, strewing their fine streets with the ocean sand, and peopling their palaces with sea monsters!" "I saw the whole surface of the sea rise as if a mountain side, actually standing up. Another shock with a fearful roar now took place. I called to my companions to run for their lives on to the pampa. Too late; with a horrible crash, the sea was on us, and at one sweep dashed what was Iquique on to the pampa. I lost my companions, and in an instant was fighting with the dark waters. The mighty waves surged and roared and leaped. The cries of human beings and animals were frightful."

Says the British vice-consul who was an eye-witness:—

"Gracious God, what a sight! I saw all the vessels in the bay carried out irresistibly to sea. Anchors and chains were as pack-thread. In a few minutes the great outward current stopped, stemmed by a mighty rising wave, I should judge about fifty feet high, which came in with an awful rush, carrying everything before it, in its terrible majesty, bringing the shipping with it, sometimes turning in circles as if striving to elude their fate."

Says the New York Tribune of Nov. 12, 1868:—

"The tidal disturbances are the most remarkable and extensive of which there is any record. It is said their velocity was about a thousand miles an hour. Both the great ocean waters of the Atlantic and Pacific have been agitated in their whole extent. We mention in particular the tidal waves at St Thomas and all the neighboring islands, which were full fifty feet in height. . . . It is said by those who have witnessed these waves, that the ocean's roar is exceedingly frightful."

The same paper, of Nov. 12, 1869, says:—

"Later and fuller details are every day increasing the interest with which scientific observers regard the recent earthquakes and tidal disturbances, and confirming our first impressions that these convulsions of nature would prove to be among the most remarkable and extensive of which there is any written record."

Mr. Taylor, in "The Great Consummation," pp. 281-293, presents many interesting facts, which he has culled from various authorities. Some of these we present. The tidal wave is represented as "appalling." It is said to create "fear, dread, alarm, trembling, and terror; there was extreme panic; consternation of men and animals: the air was resonant with shrieks; we stood as if paralyzed; there was intense excitement; if all the dead had started from their graves before us, we could not have been more terrified."

The "roar" of the sea at such times cannot be expressed in language. It is described as "astounding," "with great violence," "an appalling sound," "roaring with terrific noise," "standing up like a white masoned wall, erect and straight as if made after a rule," "hissing, seething, and casting up clouds of spray, mingled with sulphurous fumes," "coming with a noise resembling thunder," "immense tidal waves which swept away full one half of the town," "five times did such a wave rise." "Eight times the wave rolled inward," "the sea rose sixty feet, and everything was submerged." "A tidal wave sixty feet high rose over the tops of the cocoa-trees a quarter of a mile inland, sweeping human beings, houses, and everything movable before it." "At Africa, in August, 1868, two ships, the Peruvian corvette "America," and the United States double-ender "Wateru," were carried on a wave fifty feet high nearly half a mile inland beyond a railroad, and there left stranded high and dry. In the unparalleled convulsion at Java, in August, 1883, the sea rose a perpendicular height of over one hundred and thirty-five feet, submerging the adjacent lands and hills."

Such are some of the descriptive phrases with which eye-witnesses have sought to convey to those not present, some idea of those awful visitations. The speed with which the effects of these "sea-quakes" travel, is astounding. The great earthquake which destroyed the city of Shimoda, Japan, December, 1854, tossed the sea into the air, sending a wave across the broad Pacific, 4,500 miles. It reached the coast of California in twelve and one-half hours, thus traveling at the rate of 360 miles per hour, or six miles per minute. The crest was eighteen feet high, after thus crossing the Pacific Ocean.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

INDIA.

LEAVING Delhi in the evening for Bombay, I stopped the next day at Jeypoor, the capital of an independent native State of the same name. While the greater part of India is directly under British rule, several States have a nominally independent government, with which England does not interfere except in some matters, and England is represented in such States by a resident.

The rajah of Jeypoor is a young man of progressive tendencies, although a staunch Hindu in religion. He has his town nicely laid out with broad streets lighted with gas, and a very creditable water supply is provided. Permits to visit the palace and stables of the rajah are easily obtained, and to visit the ancient city of Amber, for which His Majesty provides elephant and mahout gratis. Jeypoor is pleasantly situated in high lands, and is environed by hills, some of which are crowned by fortifications. Traveling through this part of the country, one continually observes reefs and quarries of beautiful marble, all unused. There are but very few white people living here, not over twenty, I think, in a city of 160,000. So it is in nearly the whole country outside of the principal cities. In districts containing perhaps millions of natives, there will not be found a score of Europeans. The hold which England has upon the country is maintained much more easily than it would be but for the natural docility of the people. A very wise and prudent course is taken in leaving the natives free to carry out their own ways and customs. Infanticide and the suttee have been interfered with as being destructive and inhuman; but in general the people pursue their chosen ways untrammelled by law.

I reached Bombay Nov. 29. This city is second to Calcutta in point of population, by only 30,000 out of a total of 840,000 for the latter. Calcutta is also the seat of government. But otherwise Bombay successfully rivals its eastern competitor. Nine tenths of the incomers land at Bombay; its exports and imports exceed those of Calcutta by a small amount. For natural beauty neither have much to claim, and although Calcutta is called the "city of palaces," many claim that the artificial beauty of Bombay exceeds that of its rival. I find it depends upon where the individual lives; and those who are not interested generally choose neither.

One of the most prominent of the unique features of Bombay is the conspicuous presence of the Parsees. They are a small people, compared with other classes in India, numbering barely 85,000, and they make no effort to propagate their religion. The only practicable way to get into the society is to be born into it. Nearly seventy-five thousand Parsees live in the Bombay presidency. They are the reputed followers of Zoroaster, but they have forsaken that philosopher, for the service of mammon. To me they appear to be Pharisees and publicans combined. They approach the Hindus in their aversion to the truth, and the Jew in their avarice, and for a pretense make long prayers by the seaside, which they willingly interrupt if a customer happens to stroll past. But by their energy they have come to occupy a high place in influence both in political and financial circles.

The Elephanta caves form about the only object of attraction in Bombay. These are old Hindu temples, excavated in solid rock, their supposed age being 1,300 years. They are impressive from their lofty and gloomy grandeur, as well as from the massive sculpture still remaining intact.

Poonah is a very beautiful city, 120 miles inland from Bombay, and situated in an elevated hill region. Here is located the work of the Pundit Ramabai, whose name will be familiar to many of our readers. Mrs. Dr. Kellogg kindly furnished me with a letter of introduction to the lady, which produced a cordial invitation to visit the place, a privilege of which I was happy to avail myself.

Ramabai is a Hindu lady of superior education, left a widow after a brief but happy married life. From the example and teachings of her parents she had early embraced with earnestness the cause of those who suffered so greatly from the prevailing curse of Hindu widowhood. After the death of her husband, she devoted her life to the work of ameliorating the unhappy condition of the young widows of India. Being without means, her heart turned toward England, where she went a stranger. She learned the language, and embraced Christianity, and then was drawn to America where she received material help and encouragement.

At Poonah she has started a home and school, having purchased suitable property. There are now nearly fifty inmates, most of whom have been rescued from lives of suffering. The influence of her work is much more extensive than its apparent results. I greatly enjoyed a short visit to this pleasant and happy home. It would be very gratifying to all who have helped this noble lady, could they see the satisfaction and gratitude manifested by those who now share the benefits of this deliverance.

On the 3d of December I quitted India, having been in the country precisely one month. The time was altogether too brief to make a deep study of the various lines of interest which open up to the visitor. To many inquiries as to what I think of India, I have to reply, "I have been in a dream when I awake and think it over, I will tell you what I think of the dream." I thought I knew something of it before I went there, but found it necessary to hasten away, in order to preserve any traces of what I knew, because I knew so much that did not prove to be true. There are so many anomalies, so many exceptions to given rules, so many things that are inexplicable and unlike everything else, that it was easy to appreciate the remark of a missionary to whom I put the question mentioned above: "I have been here thirty years, and think I know less about India than I thought I did when I had been here a year." But it is a great country; and God has a great work to be done for the 280,000,000 people who know not the truth for our times, but a small fraction of whom have seen one ray of spiritual light or have the faintest hope of eternal life. What shall we do? What a question! May God help us to arise and go forth in his name.

G. C. T.

UNION COLLEGE.

WHILE I have not reported any personal labor since fall, the Lord has given me grace to do something every day in his service. After my trip among the churches in the Northwest, I attended the Kansas general camp-meeting, where the Lord came near to us, and about twenty-seven, mostly young people, were baptized. Considerable attention was given to the question of education, and over twenty young people decided to attend Union College. I also visited the Watertown, Wis., and Mankato, Minn., camp-meetings, and a number of students have come from there.

Oct. 16 I began my work in connection with the of the orthodox church's pretended interest in the laboring men, and declared that the whole clergy were arrayed against the workingmen, with the possible exception of the clergy of the Catholic Church. The workingmen, he said, put their hands into their pockets, and with dimes and fifty-cent pieces and dollars subscribed for half a million of World's Fair stock. Then he exclaimed:—

"What did the church do? Did the church demand that there should be an exposition of the world's products and man's ingenuity? If they did, they did it silently. The workmen responded in this substantial fashion; and since then they have built the Fair, and consecrated it with their blood. Hundreds and hundreds of workmen have been killed and maimed in the construction of that mighty work. And I think that because of these reasons, what we have to say should have additional weight attached to it.

"Not only that; but giving all due credit to the master minds who designed and planned that wonderful exposition,—giving them all due credit,—the products exhibited there come from this kind of hands. (Holding up his own labor-hardened hands.) And after we have built the Fair, sacrificed our lives in doing so, after we have contributed by our ingenuity and labor in placing there the exhibits, these men, who had no hand in it, either in designing, constructing, or in anything else connected with it, have come and shut the gate and turned the lock on us workmen! And then they come here with the miserable plea that they are instructed, that they are justified in speaking for labor! It is absolutely astounding, the assumption these men have in making their plea."

These extracts are sufficient, from the many speeches that were made, to show how plainly and forcibly the truth was brought out at the hearing, although it seemed to fall, so far at least as the committee were concerned, upon deaf ears. As nothing more has been heard from Mr. Durborow and his committee on the subject, it may be presumed that they have decided to kill the resolution by making no report on it to Congress, though it would be a matter of no importance anyway, since it was Mr. Durborow's first resolution, providing for the opening of the Fair in a way which would be a "grand recognition of the Christian Sabbath," that was alone concerned at the hearing; but whatever the arrangements that man may make, the subject will continue to be agitated, and the truth will be brought before the people. The question of Sunday-closing is by no means disposed of by the action of Congress. It is now in the Illinois courts, and quite likely it will remain an open question until the Fair is actually under way. But at all events, the truth will find its way to the front, and find champions among some in high positions. There is nothing certain about it all except that the truth will go to all classes, high and low, and that speedily.

The apostle John saw the "beast" and the powers of the earth gathered together to make war against Christ and against his army, and they are even now arrayed against the weak and despised few, the small and insignificant sect, only seven tenths of one per cent of the population, as Mr. Crafts says, who honor the Creator by keeping his Sabbath. But we need not worry about that. The program of coming events is in the hands of the Omnipotent; the power is His; and He has left us the promise, "Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

Terrestrial Convulsions, a Last-day Sign.

In the convulsions of Chili and Peru, August, 1868, the mighty waves reached California, 4,000 miles northward, in fourteen hours, and with a speed of nearly three hundred miles per hour, reached the far northern shores of Alaska. The Sandwich Islands, 6,300 miles away, felt the force of these waves, traveling at over five hundred miles per hour. These fearful waves, from sixty to eighty feet in height on the coast of South America, were still thirty-six feet high when they struck Honolulu, 6,000 miles away, where they beat upon the shore for three days in succession. An English scientist pronounced it "the greatest sea-wave ever known." "How tremendous then," he adds, "must have been the upheaval of the bed of ocean by which waves-circles were sent across the Pacific, retaining, after traveling 5,000 miles from the center of disturbance, the height of a two-storied house."—Popular Science Monthly, Sup., December, 1877.

This mighty marine disturbance, these immense mountain waves traveling many times faster than the swiftest railway train, were not caused by winds, but by a mighty upheaval of a vast ocean bed. The Scientific American speaks of it as "the tremendous power that disturbed the whole body of an ocean." "Every coast on the Pacific felt the enormous waves. From Alaska and Kamtchatka to the south polar regions, from the Andes to Hawaii, Japan, New Zealand, Australia, and on, on, through the East Indian Ocean, the 'mighty sea-wave' rolled, over a space of full ten thousand miles, or nearly half way around the globe."—"Great Consummation," p. 290. How could our Saviour's words ever have a fulfillment if such phenomena as these were not one?

A visitation similar to the above was experienced in Peru, May 10, 1877. Eight times in succession a mighty sea-wall of water struck the shore, deluging and desolating that ill-fated land, and in thirteen and a half hours it reached the Sandwich Islands, having the terrific speed of over four hundred and fifty miles per hour. It reached the utmost extent of the vast Pacific, thus traveling at the rate of seven or eight miles per minute. The wave was sixty feet in height, and even more in some places. Many hundreds of lives were lost, and many millions of dollars' worth of property. Large numbers of ships were engulfed, the water whirling like a maelstrom. The scene was terrible in the extreme.

Another terrible convulsion occurred in and near the island of Java, in the East Indies, Aug. 25, 1883, in which over one hundred thousand lives were lost. The deep rumblings were heard distinctly forty-five miles away. Showers of red hot stones and ashes fell, making the roads impassable. Great showers of mud, cinders, ashes, and huge rocks were thrown into the air, and falling, crushed many houses and killed many people. Sea and land were both terribly convulsed. One island wholly disappeared. A tract of land fifty miles square, and a range of mountains sixty-five miles long, disappeared forever. Many cities were utterly destroyed. "The huge tidal wave" swept multitudes to ruin, dwellings and inmates being carried away together. While the island of Krakatoa was swallowed up by the waves, another island near by was split into five parts, and sixteen new volcanoes sprang up in the middle of the sea.

Volumes might be written of these terrible convulsions. Year by year notices of them are constantly given through the public press, till they excite but little comment, so common have they become. It would seem almost impossible without a cataclysm that would utterly wreck our earth, to exceed some of these in fury and destructiveness. Yet but few seem to pay much regard to them. Our age is remarkable for terrestrial disturbances. How common of late years has the terrible cyclone become in our own country. Hundreds of these almost in one season are given in the daily press. Who can forget the strange and wonderful, yea, supernatural, fires of Wisconsin, Michigan, and other States, about the time of the great Chicago fire? The accounts of the fire which destroyed Peshtigo, Wis., about that time, was one never to be forgotten. The very air seemed to be on fire. The Detroit Post, under the head of "The Great Fires Supernatural," says:—

"Those who were exposed to the terrible tornado during which Chicago, Peshtigo, Manistee, White Rock, and other towns on Lake Michigan and Huron were burned, testify nearly unanimously that 'the air seemed to be on fire.'"

These words are almost invariably used in describing the phenomena. The fire did not spread gradually from tree to tree, and house to house, but a great sheet of flame overcoming them like the clouds, and moving with the rapidity of a hurricane, rushed upon them without warning. It surrounded them. The atmosphere seemed filled with fire. Many people who inhaled the hot air fell dead. Dead bodies were found without a trace of fire upon them, or even upon the clothes which still covered them. There were frequently no marks of fire among the adjacent trees and fences. Many were killed in compact masses, as if by a blast of death. They were found huddled together away from trees and buildings. Fish were killed in the streams by the intense heat. Many of these people believed that the last day had come, as well they might. The roaring of the whirlwind which preceded the blaze, sounded enough like the trumpet to suggest a prelude to the final catastrophe. The black midnight sky suddenly burst in flame.

Mr. J. A. Richards, a witness, writes in the Waukegan Sentinel:—

"O God, what a scene met my gaze on every side! It came the crisis of the storm; here the fiery elements contended by a tornado and a whirlwind made war on human hopes, hearts and life. The phenomena and results were mysterious, strange. . . . The fields, woods, barns, houses, and even air were on fire, while large balls of fire were revolving, bursting in every direction, igniting everything they came in contact with: and the whole of this devouring element driven before a tornado at the rate of a mile a minute. Mr. Kirby says he saw large balls of fire in the air, and that they came in contact with anything, they would bound ten or forty rods away. Others testify that they saw large clouds of fire burst into fragments, and in some instances great tongues of fire like lightning, would issue from dark clouds and light up the buildings. Pennies were melted in the pockets of persons who were but little burned. A small bell upon an engine, and a new stove standing from twenty to forty feet from any building, were melted. Many thought the great day of his wrath had come."

Space requires us to omit many other thrilling particulars. Who can doubt that our Saviour had these in view when speaking of the last day? He declares: "And great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences; and fearful sights and great signs shall there be in heaven." "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the earth and the waves roaring. Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and glory." Surely the signs of the times herald the speedy advent of our Lord in glory. G. I. S.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

"EGYPT" is a word proverbially associated with darkness. Her deep fall from being the center of civilization and art to become the "basest of kingdoms," was faithfully pointed out by the prophet and has been literally carried out in the history of that most unfortunate country. But it is a fact which all men may rejoice, that as Egypt emerges from the shadow of stupidity and oppression which characterizes Turkish rule, her day seems to be dawning again.

My stay in the country was a very short one, short for an intimate acquaintance with its domestic interests; but I was constantly surprised at evidences of progress everywhere to be seen. The construction of the Suez canal has opened through the country one of the world's great highways. And although it runs through a desert for its entire length of eighty-three miles, still it is a congested artery of commerce and labor. It has created three good sized towns, and provides employment for a multitude. The place at which I landed was Ismailia, midway through the canal, containing about two thousand Europeans, mostly French, and as many Arabs. A railway connects this place with Suez, at the south end of the canal, and with Cairo and Alexandria on the Nile. Connection with Port Said will shortly be made. A large fresh water canal connects the Nile and the ship canal, and it is used for light transportation and irrigation. Wherever irrigation introduced, the soil shows great fertility, and crops are harvested at three seasons each year, not from the same field, to be sure, though two crops may be raised from the same ground. The most primitive methods of farming are still in vogue. An illustrated Bible will give an exact idea of the modes of plowing, sowing, harrowing, threshing and grinding. Indeed, this is true throughout the Orient. In India, Arabia, Egypt, and Palestine it is all the same.

Cairo impressed me much; for I was prepared to see an old, crazy Arab town. On the contrary I found one of the most attractive and bustling cities of our busy age. It contains over four hundred thousand inhabitants, having several very grand hotels. Its public buildings are creditable, its gardens attractive, and in the central portion its streets are beautiful and impressive. They are picturesque, too, with camels, donkeys, and a thoroughly detested and put away. While repentance primarily is deep sorrow for sin, it also includes the changed life, since this is the proof of the genuineness and sincerity of the repentance. Thus Paul testified to the true character of the repentance of the church at Corinth: "For behold this self-same thing, that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge! In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter." 2 Cor. 7:11. We sometimes hear people express themselves as fearful that they have not really repented. We recommend such to read this text. Has their sorrow wrought carefulness lest they again sin? are they filled with indignation that they should have so debased themselves by sinful practices? are they fearful that they may again be induced to repeat sinful acts? have they a "vehement desire" to live beyond the contaminating touch of sin, and by this life of holiness be revenged for the evil that sin has wrought in them? have they really ceased to do evil? and through the help and strength supplied by Christ, are they daily learning to do well? If so, we believe they may safely conclude that their repentance is genuine, and that it will be accepted by the Lord Jesus, and they may claim the promise of the forgiveness of their sins.

To repent of sin is the best thing we can do with it. It is the only thing we can do with it and be uncondemned. There is nothing dishonorable in repentance; the dishonor is in the sin; to repent is the most honorable thing a sinner can do. It takes him out of the ranks of the great originator of sin, the Devil, and makes him a loyal subject to God, whose divine law he now recognizes as right, and which by divine grace he keeps.

And what is the message that comes to the last church—the church of Laodicea? Is God's requirement to them changed from what it has been in the past? Are they to be saved without a thorough work of repentance?—No; they have the most earnest, urgent call to repentance of any people to whom the word of the Lord has ever come. And when we read the inspired description of their spiritual condition, we shall not wonder at the searching call for repentance that is given to them. (Read Rev. 3:14-22.) "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

If this was a literal description of anyone's physical condition, we would say how terrible must be his condition. But is it any the less terrible because it is spiritual, not physical? It is a literal description of the spiritual condition of the professed people of God at the present time. It is sent to them in love. "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten; be zealous therefore, and repent." Then the reason why this message of warning, counsel, and reproof is sent to us, is because of his love to us. He is not chastening us for his own pleasure merely, but for our good. And while he shows us our pitiable condition, he makes provision for all our wants. We are naked, but he has the raiment to cover our nakedness; we are blind, but he gives us the anointing that will heal our sight; we are poor, but he has the gold to make us rich. Will we accept his gracious offers? He knocks at our hearts; he shows us the blessings he has for us; he offers to bestow these precious gifts upon us if we will take them, and then he will come in and sup with us, and we with him. He offers—nay, pleads, with us to accept the gifts, but he will not force them upon us. We must take them by our own free choice. To such he will come in. The misery will be turned to comfort; the poverty will be exchanged for enduring riches; sight will take the place of blindness; and our nakedness will be covered with the beautiful garments of Christ's righteousness. And it will be a reality. We shall not be thinking we have something we have not got. What Jesus does he does well. The anointing, the riches, the raiment will all be real. We shall never know the dreadful poverty from which we have been rescued, the blindness now so graciously healed, nor the nakedness now hidden by the new garments. We never can know it; but we will know that whereas once we were blind, now we see; that the darkness is passed, and the true light now shineth; that we are clothed and in our right mind, and that all things are ours, "whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come." "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift."

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

"Signs in the Sun." Fearful Convulsions in the Sun Itself. The Alarm of Scientists.

"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." Luke 21:25-27.

These words of our Lord as recorded by Luke, form a part of our Lord's great prophecy, a portion of which seems to have been spoken by him at the temple itself, while teaching his disciples there, and a portion given on the Mount of Olives, where he retired to spend the night. Luke seems to have recorded especially those portions spoken at the temple, while Matthew and Mark speak more directly of what was spoken on the Mount of Olives. Thus Luke, after recording the interesting circumstance of the poor widow casting her two mites into the Lord's treasury in the temple,—her whole dependence for a living,—while the rich cast in of their abundance, as he and his disciples beheld them, records as follows:—

"And as some spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts, he said, As for these things which ye behold, the days will come, in the which there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down."

Then follows the discourse of which the above extract is a part. At its close the record states:—

"And in the daytime he was teaching in the temple; and at night he went out, and abode in the mount that is called the Mount of Olives." Luke 21:1-6, 37.

But Matthew and Mark both record what was spoken at night on the Mount of Olives; for at the beginning of their narrative of this discourse these words were used: "And as he sat upon the Mount of Olives," the disciples came to him privately, inquiring more particularly of his strange prediction concerning the throwing down of those immense stones and the destruction of the temple, etc. As these two localities were some distance apart, we must conclude they were parts of the same discourse spoken at different places. They were both called out by the same theme, and given for the same object. Luke gives the former part, occurring in the temple inclosure, which is more general in its nature. The disciples wished to learn more concerning this most thrilling subject, and hence "came to him privately" on the Mount of Olives, to get all the particulars possible. Our Saviour was more specific in his statements on this occasion than at first, as Matthew's record is much more extensive than either of the others.

Matthew and Mark both speak clearly and fully of the "darkening of the sun," etc. In this series we have quite fully considered that great sign, as it occurred in the close of the "great tribulation" upon the true church of Christ, during the 1260 years foretold by the prophet Daniel. Matthew and Mark both very definitely state when this darkening of the sun would occur. It would be in those days, after the tribulation. But Luke is more general in his statements, declaring that there should be "signs in the sun," etc. It is not to be doubted that this darkening of the sun is included in the statement of Luke that there should be "signs in the sun." But does not the language naturally imply more than that? And may it not reasonably include those remarkable, fearful, and most astounding convulsions in the body of the sun itself, which scientific observers of the sun have been considering with such wonder during the last century?

From the language of Luke we would most certainly infer that "signs" (plural) really mean more than one sign. It reasonably implies many. One great sun-darkening in 1780 would hardly be sufficient to constitute "signs in the sun." That darkening was caused by a cloud of some sort (the nature of which, as we have shown, was never satisfactorily accounted for) intervening between the earth and the sun, cutting off its rays of light till vast portions of our earth were darkened in a way to astonish all beholders, and fulfill our Lord's prediction, even as the sun was darkened in Egypt and at the crucifixion. That event was a great sign of our Lord's return.

But if such an intervening cloud between the earth and the sun can be properly called a darkening of the sun, and a sign in the sun, with certainly as great a degree of propriety can those fearful solar convulsions of our time in the body of the sun itself, be called "signs in the sun." It may safely be asserted that nothing that has occurred in all the realms of nature in our times has caused greater perplexity or forebodings among scientists than these fearful solar cataclysms. The sun has been the focus of all the telescopes of our age. Its "spots" have been photographed, their nature has been studied with intense interest, and most dire have been the predictions and conclusions of what is likely to happen in the future, because of these "signs" beheld in the sun itself. We cannot think our Lord failed to include these marvelous events in his wonderful predictions of the precursors of the great day. His language as recorded by Luke clearly intimates his full knowledge of these phenomena.

While Matthew and Mark in their account of the private discourse of our Lord to his disciples on the night after the public teaching in the temple carefully give the chronology of the great sun-darkenings, which marked the close of the great tribulation upon his disciples, and the dawning of a brighter experience for them, Luke in his more general statement includes the great signs which shall indicate the fearful calamities sure to fall on the last generation of men. The sun will cause some of these. Its irregular action noticed and commented upon by learned men, and looked upon with apprehension by all the scientists of this age will indeed under the fourth plague "scorch men with fire" till they shall blaspheme God because they were "scorched with great heat." How reasonable that the premonitory indications of these dire calamities should be foretold by our Lord as one of the "signs" of his coming!

The sun is the most important member of our great solar system. It is its center, the hub of the great wheel without which all would fall into utter confusion. Without its light and heat all the members of the solar family would congeal into solid ice, and be covered with a pall of blackest midnight. Its Creator constituted it a "ruler" at creation. Gen. 1:14-18. It is "the powerful king of day." "Let them"—the sun and moon—"be for signs." Gen. 1:14. How fitting that our Lord should place in connection with them the great signs designed to herald his coming! No object in the heavens can compare with the sun in brilliancy, glory, and magnificence. We cannot wonder so much that the heathen world, when it had through sin, rebellion, and consequent darkness lost nearly all knowledge of the God who created all things should have fallen to worshipping the most brilliant object of his creation. In every idolatrous age the sun has, in one form or another, in one name or another, been the great object of heathen worship and Sun day, "the wild solar holiday of all pagan times."—The North British Review.

The sun, a globe apparently of terrific flame 852,584 miles in diameter, turning on its axis once in twenty-five days, with a mass of matter 316,000 times greater than our earth, and vastly more than that of all the rest of the solar system, serve as a center around which seven planets and over three hundred planetoids revolve in elliptical orbits. Jupiter, the largest by far of all the planets with a diameter of 90,000 miles, in size is but as a pea to an orange in bulk compared with the sun. The latter by its immense mass, by the attraction of gravitation, holds all these worlds in their orbit all traveling in perfect order about the great solar center during the ceaseless ages, thus speaking the praises of the heavenly Architect.

Astronomers all agree that the body of the sun is a mass of fire, burning with intensest brilliancy and heat. With the spectroscope is detected the presence of fifteen metals, and hydrogen gas in immense quantities. They claim that gaseous flames extend hundreds of thousands of miles above the body of the sun, burning with an eternal energy. They are utterly unable to tell what feeds these alavouring flames. To astronomers with their powerful glasses, it appears like a great sea of flame, in tumultuous confusion throwing out great tongues of fire, protuberances of fire, red and fearful to behold. Says Professor Nipher: "A great explosion on the sun may scorch us into cinders in a second." This admission thrillingly suggests the statement of the revelator, who declares that men shall be scorched under the fourth plague with great heat. It has only been two or three hundred years since great spots on the sun have been noticed, and those great signs in it have been witnessed. They have been studied with deep interest since. They seem to come in groups. At times sixty can be seen at a time. At first they caused little or no alarm, but lately it is very different. It has been discovered that a close relation exists between these solar convulsions and irregularities and storms on our earth. We will next notice these signs as manifested in our age.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

PALESTINE.

THE temple site, Mt. Moriah, is in the hands of the Mussulmans. The celebrated Mosque of Omar stands over the rock that forms the summit, and is supposed to have been the threshing-floor of Araunah. This is an octagonal building, elaborately and beautifully finished within. There are twelve large marble columns beneath the dome, said to have been found in the temple ruins, and to have been in Solomon's temple. Another large mosque, originally a church built by the Crusaders, stands on the temple area. To visit this sacred ground, it is necessary to obtain permission from your consul, who delegates a soldier attendant, and he must obtain the consent of the Turkish authorities.

Bethlehem is situated six or seven miles southwest of Jerusalem. I visited the place and the Church of the Nativity located there, on Christmas eve. A foolish and idolatrous service is conducted by the Latin Church, on this night. The church has been the scene of many disturbances between the sects which occupy it jointly. The identical spot where the birth of Jesus is claimed to have taken place is not the exclusive property of either church, but each is supposed to have a share in its proprietorship, and to have access to it. But it forms a bone of contention over which violence and bloodshed are indulged in by these zealous Christians (?). Mohammedan soldiers are appointed to keep peace between them, but a short time ago the cavern was burned out of curtains and hangings, in one of these fracas. The country about the town is beautiful in feature, and must have been particularly so in the days of its fertility.

I made a three days' trip on horse-back to Jericho, the Dead Sea, and Jordan. During this time, we passed several places celebrated in sacred history, and sufficiently distinct to be quite reliable. The road to Jericho is a wild one, and the Turkish government still provides armed guards for every visitor or party of visitors. Should a robber appear, the guards would no doubt set a good example of getting away; there is no longer any occasion for their protection. We stopped the first night at a khan, or inclosure, called the Good Samaritan's Inn. A far more interesting place was the brook Cherith, where Elijah was hidden. We rode along the bank of the defile 300 feet deep, down which the turbulent little stream flows. The Greek Church has a monastery there, and some Russian women live the lives of hermits in the caverns. The site of old Jericho is near where the brook enters the Jordan valley. Three miles north is a great fountain of pure water, the same that Elisha healed with the cruse of salt. It is indeed, "sweet unto this day."

Modern Jericho stands in the place of old Gilgal. It consists of a small, comfortable hotel, two or three houses, and a group of Arab huts. The second day we visited the Dead Sea and the Jordan. In the latter I was disappointed. The valley is here fifteen miles wide, and of a barren, alluvial deposit. The only vegetation is a kind of low bush, on which herds of camels feed. The trees along the river are mere brush, and the stream is turbid and thick with mud, and unapproachable except through a depth of sticky mud. These muddy waters sink at once to the depths, as they strike the sea, and the waters of the sea are limpid, but so bitter.

The road from Jerusalem to Jericho passes through Bethany, after winding around the Mount of Olives. On our return we stopped just at the edge of the village beneath some olive trees, to eat our luncheon. It was doubtless very near the place where Martha met Jesus with the words, "If thou hadst been here, my brother had not died;" and it was with peculiar interest that I read the 11th chapter of John in a spot rendered sacred by one of the most pathetic scenes of sacred history.

Around Jerusalem the places of sacred interest are too numerous to mention, but I stumbled on one of peculiar interest. It was the old ash hills of the temple. These were originally mounds of considerable size, but they are being carted away for various purposes. Delving with a stick, pieces of bones partly burned were found to be numerous. Here was indeed a genuine relic, and I was particularly pleased to find an oxidized portion of a snuffer, or some similar implement of the ancient altar.

The return journey from Jerusalem to Jaffa was by carriage, and we passed Emmaus, Kirjath-jearim, the Valley of Ajalon, Timnath, and Ramleh.

I was particularly interested in the subject of the return of the Jews to Palestine. Some have gone thither from Russia, and others doubtless would come if they could. Just before I reached the country, the sultan had issued a firman forbidding the acquirement of land by Jews. The authorities are very averse to the ingress of these people, because they do not fancy the idea so generally cherished by Christendom of the restoration of their polity, and more, because these Jews either become paupers and beggars, or ruin business by their habit of underbidding other workers. To my mind there is no evidence of any general move of the Jews toward Palestine taking place. German and Russian colonies have been planted, and the Greek, Latin, and a few other churches are making an extensive show of improvement about Jerusalem. But the idea of Christ gathering the Jews to Jerusalem, and setting up his kingdom in a city of unendurable filth and stench, certainly does not commend itself to the ordinary mind as being either probable or consistent. The name and cause of Christ are dishonored here in Jerusalem more flagrantly than in any other place under the sun, unless we should except Rome. Should our Saviour make such a move, he would first of all need to scourge out of the community the swarm of money-changers and relic mongers that now disgrace his cause. He would need to create a water-supply for carrying away the accumulated and accumulating filth, and a layer of soil to cover the barren hills and valleys of a land destitute of vegetable life. He would first of all enforce the sanitary laws long since forgotten by the chosen people; indeed, there is no spot in the world that would require a more thorough renovation and transformation to fit it for a capital of Christ's kingdom, than Jerusalem.

It is high time that the light of present truth was held up in Palestine. There are many honest and thoughtful people whose sensibilities revolt at the imposition and hypocrisy of much that passes for religion, and the mercenary motives by which people are led to identify themselves with the churches. It was my good fortune to have as a dragoman and companion a man of mature years, whose father was a Hungarian Jew, and whose mother was a Syrian Jewess. He was a convert to Christianity, well versed in profane and sacred history relating to that country, and spoke with ease seven languages. When I informed him that I observed the Bible Sabbath, he was at once deeply impressed, and remarked meditatively, "Yes, that is the day the early Christians observed, the seventh day: no one kept Sunday until Constantine had changed the day." And on the Sabbath we walked out to what is believed to be the true Calvary, and while conversing upon thoughts naturally suggested by this solemn place, he said: "Do you know, I would give anything I possess, deny myself of food or raiment, if I could but know the truth and will of God. O, that I had some one to show me the right way!" He was much impressed by my observance of the ancient Sabbath, and yet I was a Christian. That evening being Christmas eve, we drove out to Bethlehem. On the way he inquired why I abstained from the use of tobacco, and I gave him a few Bible reasons. Three days later he told me he had not touched it since our talk, and never should do so again.

My travels have convinced me that the Lord has precious jewels scattered everywhere among the rubbish of earth. To find and bring them out, is a work that angels delight in. And we read that "the eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth," searching out those whose hearts are right toward himself. I doubt not there are many such in Palestine.

Editorial Notes.

No conflict, no victory; no victory, no progress.

Unselfishness is never self-conscious. The person who is always conscious that he is a martyr is one of the most selfish persons on earth.

The person who does not accept salvation through Christ, has just the wisdom of the prisoner who does not know enough to leave his dungeon when the prison doors have been opened.

The best place for a Christian to be in is the humblest place,—the place where he realizes the most that he has no wisdom, no strength, no virtue, and that all merit and excellence are of Christ. If you do not believe this, try it; you will feel so when you are there.

The psalmist has said, "It is time for thee, Lord, to work: for they have made void thy law." Ps. 119:126. God will assuredly work for his honor and his name at such a time; but another rendering of this verse reads, "It is time to work for the Lord." This places a responsibility upon us.

It is not always enough to comply with the conditions upon which the blessing of God is promised; it is often necessary to claim the blessing, as an additional step to those that have already been taken. The Devil would like nothing better than to rob a Christian of the fruits of victory after the victory had been gained.

The "trump card" which the Devil is playing now in the game of life is to hatch up something, it matters not what, to divert your attention from the study of the word of God. And he is working much harder to secure this result for to-day than for some day next year, next month, or next week. "One day at a time" is his plan, and he does not discard anything because it will not be useful to him for more than twenty-four hours. Life is made up simply of to-days.

Faith and works have each their proper place in the Christian life, but they do not both occupy the same place. One will not fit into the place of the other; neither one was designed to do so. And some people are so foolish as to think that because they cannot make one take the place of the other, one or the other of them must be discarded! Much perplexity on the subject will be saved by always keeping in mind that the two were never designed to secure the same end, but the purposes of each and the places they were designed to fill, are separate and distinct.

The Bible is not a museum, but a storehouse. If we treat it as the former, we find in it the petrified bread which sustained the life of those who lived thousands of years ago, and we can take it up, look at it with interest and curiosity, believe in its genuineness, and lay it back in its place. But if we treat it as the latter, we find in it the fresh manna which sustains our present spiritual life. Petrified bread will never nourish the body. We are to seek truth for the sanctifying power it may have on our own lives, and not for the sake of being able to realize how valuable it was or is or might be for somebody else.

the bountiful Father's house to feed on the husks of ambition, fame, or pleasure, which Satan so alluringly spreads in seductive array before him.

We can also view this question which Jesus asked, from another standpoint: A special work to prepare a people for the coming of the Lord is now going forward. That work has nothing in common with the world, and but little in common with what at the present time passes for Christianity. It is based upon the Scriptures, and the prophetic description of those who are engaged in this work is, "Here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." Rev. 14:12. Light from heaven shines upon this company, and those who receive this light are so separated from the spirit of the world and the popular current of Christianity that they are looked upon as being a "peculiar people." It sometimes happens that those who have walked in this narrow way with this people, grow tired, and like the children of Israel, "murmur because of the straitness of the way." Satan assails them with manifold temptations, until blinded by his deceptions, they think there is an easier way. If such tempted ones would but study the experiences of the people of God in the past, with earnest prayer for grace to "walk even as he walked," the allurements of the world, and the pleasures offered by popular Christianity, would not weigh a moment in the balance against the sweetness of being a humble follower of Jesus at this time, when his truth is so lightly regarded. Then to his tender inquiry, "Will ye also go away?" they would be constrained to reply, "Lord, to whom shall we go?"

As we look away from the light of "present truth" to those who are still in darkness, what can we see to attract us? The world with all its honors and riches, even if we could win them, is as nothing compared with the "enduring riches" offered us by Christ "without money and without price." Popular Christianity, as represented by the so-called Protestant churches, with all the pleasure-lovers in its train, and following hard after Rome in doctrines, methods, and spirit, will be a poor place to go to for shelter, especially when we remember that soon great Babylon will come "in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath." No, we cannot go there; for there is no shelter and no safety there. The path of safety is the path of obedience. Those who rejoice at the coming of the Lord, who say, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: . . . we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation," also say, "Yea, in the way of thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for thee; the desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee." Isa. 25:9; 26:8. If we turn our backs upon the "commandments of God and the faith of Jesus," we turn against Jesus himself, against his love, his mercy, his life, and his salvation. Will we do it? How can we do it? "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life."

PROPOSITION TO CURTAIL THE RIGHT OF RELIGIOUS DISCUSSION.

As we have reached a time in the prophetic history of our country when it is scarcely in order to be surprised at anything whatever in the line of departures from the principles of justice and freedom laid down by our forefathers in the foundation of our system of government, we are fully prepared to hear from one of our eminent and influential citizens, a proposition to limit the freedom of religious discussion. Such a proposition comes from the "Right Rev. Leighton Coleman," Bishop of Delaware, and appears in the January North American Review. It is of course directly contrary to the letter and spirit of our Constitution, which declares against any restriction upon freedom of speech or of the press, but as before stated, it is nothing unusual now for some men, especially those whose names are prefixed with "Reverend," to profess greater wisdom in governmental affairs than was possessed by those who framed and adopted the Constitution. The bishop outlines his view as follows (we quote from the Weekly Review):—

"Any discussion which involves disrespect to the fundamental principles of Christianity transcends all proper bounds. Courts and public opinion have always recognized Christianity as the national religion of America, and assaults upon it ought to be as treasonable as attacks on the government. Is it not treasonable to bring into contempt the essentials of Christianity, especially since this is a time of war—Christianity waging a conflict in which there is no discharge, and which will last as long as the world?"

"Nothing is more injurious to the State than a lack of confidence between man and man. This is the risk that is run in allowing religious discussion to go on indefinitely and wantonly, robbing men of their faith in God and Christ, and so, in time, of their faith in one another; for faith in man has its highest development among those who believe in God."

This is exactly the plea that was made by the Church of Rome against Protestants, and it was just as good in their day and for their purposes as it is now for Protestants, or any others. The Lutherans persisted in discussions which involved disrespect to the "fundamental principles of Christianity" (in other words, the principles of the papacy), and of course in the eyes of papists they transcended all proper bounds, and were guilty of treason against the government. (Modern phraseology would also have said "anarchists.") They created "a lack of confidence between man and man," that is, between those who held to opposite views in religion, and this was felt by the papists to be something very hurtful to the State. Accordingly, they did their best to suppress such freedom of speech; and fortunate is it for us who live to-day, that their efforts were not successful.

In the execution of such a purpose, a necessary preliminary would of course be the settlement of the question, What are the "fundamental principles of Christianity?" This thought did not escape the attention of the reverend bishop, and he has undertaken to lay down some of them, to which no doubt some others would have to be added. He says:—

"First is the belief in the personality of Jesus Christ; next is the belief in him as both God and man. A few question the fact of his existence; more refuse to acknowledge his divinity. We know that he is more than human, and therefore perfect and beyond criticism, and assaults upon his goodness can have no place in a Christian land.

"Christianity is the religion of reason, and of reason in its strength and purity. It is founded on facts; Christ is a person. And it is as being a person of perfection, the Incarnate Son of God himself, that we feel that in assailing Christianity, he is assailed; and in assailing him, all virtue and grace is assailed; and in assailing them, the very foundations of life are liable to be overthrown.

"Limits must be set not only to such assaults, but also as regards the discussion of Christ's commands. Baptism and the supper of the Lord are ordained by Christ himself; yet the question of their obligation is flippantly discussed! The question is beyond the legitimate limits of discussion. The mode of baptism may be discussed, but the question of its necessity has been settled, and ought not to be a matter of debate."

It would be very strange if "the fundamental principles of Christianity," as viewed from the standpoint of popular religious belief, would not include the doctrines of Sunday sacredness and the immortality of the soul. The former of these has already the sanction of law to assist toward its further elevation as a fundamental principle of the faith against which it would be treason to speak; and when the attempt is made, if it ever is, to define "the fundamental principles of Christianity," we shall be prepared to see these two dogmas fall easily and naturally into line with the rest. They are the two to which Christendom has held most tenaciously during all the theological revolutions and earthquakes of recent times.

The truth or falsity of any doctrine would of course make no difference with the principle involved in the Rev. Mr. Coleman's proposition. That proposition is as un-American and un-Christian as anything that ever emanated from paganism or the papacy, and its appearance here in the face of all that has hitherto distinguished this land as the home of civil and religious freedom, is a straw that shows the wind to be blowing from a very dangerous quarter.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

"Signs in the Sun." Fearful Convulsions in the Sun Itself. The Alarm of Scientists.

"The years 1838, 1839, 1849, 1850, 1859, 1860, 1870, 1871, were maximum sun-spot periods." In 1839 Captain Davis saw one 189,000 miles in length, and of enormous size, the largest ever seen till then. The last half century has been the most remarkable period ever known for these solar exhibitions. Increasing interest has been taken in the study of these strange and wonderful phenomena, from that time onward till the present time, as thousands of powerful telescopes in the aggregate have made the sun the focus of the most careful investigations.

Interesting discoveries were made some thirty years since, showing the connection between solar commotions and electric storms on our earth. We quote from Taylor, from whose volume we derive many of the facts we are stating on this theme:—

"On Sept. 1, 1859, two astronomers in England, at different stations, while watching the sun-spots, were startled to behold the facule [bright spots] on the spot-edge instantly flash into an unprecedented and intense brilliancy, and in five minutes to move over the sun's disk, a distance of over thirty-four thousand miles. Presto! Then a mighty magnetic storm began on earth, the needle became powerfully excited, the northern and southern auroras flashed with rare splendor, the telegraph wires were burthened with electricity, and the entire globe thrilled and throbbed under the influence of the strange energy. The sun was in commotion. Telegraphic machinery was set on fire, and burnt out, and the pen of the instrument was followed by flame, and its characters traced in fire. Men were astonished in all the realm of science. The instant motion, the explosion, the varying light, the tumult in the sun, suggested change! It was days before the mysterious solar storm subsided; then the earth, which hung so immediately in the sun's grasp, lay quiet again. But the solar eruption was a new thing, and a mystery to all."—"Great Consummation," p. 329.

Since then observation and experience have demonstrated the wonderfully close connection between the sun storms and earth storms, the former being evidently the great electric center of the whole solar system. The experiences of 1870-71, remarkable years for solar disturbances, will probably never be forgotten.

"Huggins, of England, saw one spot move quickly over its [the sun's] face, a distance of 100,000 miles in one second! A single spot was seen in May, 1870, having an area of 320,000,000 square miles. In October one group of 200,000,000 square miles was observed to stretch across the solar disk one fourth of its diameter. In February a group of spots seen by English observers had an area of 1,458,000,000 miles, and in September, Professor Langley, in this country, witnessed at one time hundreds of spots, the area of but one of them being computed to be 2,300,000,000 square miles. In November, 1870, the Evening Post, New York, reported three contiguous spots whose area was 8,649,000,000 square miles."—"Great Consummation," p. 330.

Professor E. Colbert in the Western Monthly for August, 1870, wrote as follows:—

"The present year, though previously indicated as one of maximum, is marked by the appearance of an extraordinary number of spots which have no parallel in number and magnitude within the space of a hundred years."

The year 1871 was a phenomenal year, being styled by Victor Hugo and others, "the black and terrible year." It was the year of the most destructive fires and fearful electric storms perhaps ever witnessed on our globe. Says Taylor:—

"First, when on Oct. 8, 9, 1871, Chicago went down in 'a hell of flames,' and 335,000 persons were imperiled; 100 persons burned in the flames, and 100,000 left homeless,—there being 18,000 buildings consumed, and $180,000,000 worth of property destroyed. Then Boston, on the memorable Nov. 9, 1872, enveloped in hot flames, entailing a property loss of $80,000,000, at the extent and magnitude of which calamities the whole world stood for a time appalled and awed, asking, Are these the judgments of God? No such gigantic fires are known in past history. They surpassed those at Rome, Constantinople, London, and Moscow."—"Great Consummation," p. 331.

The fearful forest fires of 1871 were mysterious, unprecedented, and awful beyond any on record. Many thousands of square miles were burned over. Especially in Wisconsin and Michigan were terrific scenes enacted. In places there were electrical tornadoes and clouds of burning hydrogen, the air filled with fire balls and fire clouds, the flames moving with fearful rapidity, consuming scores of towns, leaving tens of thousands homeless, destroying the lives of from 2,500 to 3,000 persons. It is said by those who have investigated the subject, that in the fires of that year territory was burned over as large as the State of New York, and $100,000,000 worth of property destroyed. It seems beyond reasonable contradiction that there was a supernatural element in these terrible conflagrations. We have never seen a record in history of similar phenomena. There were strange conditions of the atmosphere, and peculiar exhibitions of electrical agencies never witnessed before. Men thought the last great day had come.

We give a few extracts from eye witnesses. Says Abel Palmer in the Detroit Post, who witnessed the Chicago fire from the top of the Tremont House:—

"A strong wind was blowing at that time, and yet the flames seemed to go in all directions, like an expanding scythe mowing great and increasing swaths with frightful rapidity. We could think of nothing else but hell. The flames were in some places like huge waves dashing to and fro, leaping up and down, turning and twisting and pouring—now and then a great column of smoke and blaze hundreds of feet into the air, like a solid perpendicular shaft of molten metal. In other places, it would dart out long streaks like mammoth anacondas, with hissing, fiery tongues; then these serpentine shapes would swoop down over the blazing path into the yet unburned buildings, which seemed pierced and kindled instantaneously. . . . It was unearthly, hideous, terrific. Our eyes seemed riveted so that we could not withdraw them. There were miles of fire, mountains of flame, waves of light, flashes, clouds, brilliant scintillations."

The Detroit Post under the head of "The Great Fires Supernatural," says:—

"Those who were exposed to the terrible tornado during which Chicago, Peshtigo, Manistee, White Rock, and other towns on lakes Michigan and Huron were burned, testify unanimously that 'the air seemed to be on fire.' These words are almost invariably used in describing the phenomena. The fire did not spread gradually from tree to tree and house to house, but a great sheet of flame overcoming them like the clouds, and moving with the rapidity of a hurricane, rushed upon them without warning. It surrounded them. The atmosphere seemed filled with fire. Many people who inhaled the hot air fell dead. Corpses were found without a trace of fire upon them, or even upon the clothes which covered them. There were frequently no marks of fire upon the adjacent trees and fences. Many were killed in compact masses, as if by a blast of death. They were found huddled together away from trees and buildings. Fish were killed in the streams by the intense heat. Many of these people believed that the last day had come. The roaring of the whirlwind which preceded the blaze, sounded enough like the last trump to suggest a prelude to the final catastrophe. The black midnight sky suddenly burst into flame."

Mr. J. A. Richards in the Milwaukee Sentinel gives a description of the Wisconsin fires:—

"O God! what a scene met my gaze on every side. Here came the crisis of the storm; here the fiery elements controlled by a tornado and a whirlwind, made war on human hopes, hearts, and life. The half has not been told nor ever can be."

"The phenomena and results of this storm were mysteriously strange. In some places the forest trees lay in every imaginable position, while in others they were carried into windrows. They were mere sticks in the hands of a great power slashing and whipping the earth, and then made fuel for the work of death. The fields, woods, barns, houses, and even the air, were on fire, while large balls of fire were revolving and bursting in every direction, igniting everything they came in contact with; and the whole of this devouring element was driven before a tornado at the rate of a mile a minute. There can be little doubt that the air strongly charged with electricity helped on the work of destruction and death. Mr. Kirby says he saw large balls of fire in the air, and when they came in contact with anything, they would bound thirty or forty rods away. Others testify that they saw large clouds of fire burst into fragments, and in some instances great tongues of fire like lightning would issue from the dark clouds, and light upon the buildings. Pennies were melted in the pockets of persons who were but little burned. A small bell upon an engine and a new stove standing from twenty to forty feet from any building, were melted."

"Many thought the great day of his wrath had come. And why not? If persons who visit the ruins since the fire are forced to think that God hid his face in wrath and sent forth his thunderbolts of destruction; nay, that he gave the very fiends of hell the right and power to shake the place and burn it up, what must have been the feelings of those who passed through the fiery ordeals?"

Another paper of Oct. 15 says:—

"Later accounts from northern Wisconsin confirm all previous reports and rumors. The loss of life in the neighborhood of the burned district of Peshtigo will reach over eighteen hundred, and fifteen per cent of those injured cannot recover. The fire tornado was heard at a distance like the roaring of the sea. Balls of fire were observed to fall like meteors in different parts of the town, igniting wherever they touched," etc., etc.

We give these somewhat lengthy extracts from eye witnesses (though a vast deal more could be added), to give the reader some little idea of the "fearful sights" and terrific scenes in our world, which come as a consequence of the great electric storms and cataclysms in the sun, the great hub of our vast solar wheel, or system, whose influence so powerfully affects our world. The very stones were reduced to ashes in Chicago, and there were "heaps of dead at Peshtigo having no marks of violence upon them, but lying as if killed by a dynamo, and the melted iron lay around on the ground and the hydrogen clouds flashing with electric fire, held carnival all through the wideness of the west."

Says Taylor: "No man ever saw the like in all time's history."

On Feb. 4, 1872, was another marvelous electrical disturbance. All the telegraphs in the world were affected. They could work none of the great ocean cables, and no human power could check the powerful currents which took possession of the telegraphic lines. They were all controlled by the great electric magnet, the sun. All the batteries were overpowered. "The needle in the compass became wild." Strange fires of all shapes and hues were seen in various parts of the earth. Harper said:—

"Not only was this aurora one of the most remarkable of recent years because of the wide extent of its visibility, but it seems to have been attended with electrical disturbances that are as yet unparalleled in the annals of science for their intensity, if not for their duration and geographical extent."—Magazine, June, 1873.

Scientists are becoming astonished and alarmed at the wonderful exhibitions of disturbance in the body of the sun itself, seen in our time. Instead of its being something stable, solid, reliable, and sure, it is coming to be regarded as inconstant, and very possibly the ultimate cause of the utter ruin of all the worlds composing the solar system.

In the summer of 1872, the Italian astronomer Tacchini beheld through his glass the entire face of the sun overspread with burning vapors of magnesium. It was something never seen before.

"Then a great wail went up from a thousand thoughtful pens, and men mournfully exclaimed, 'Earth's sun is mutable! If the great, strong, central hub give way, what will become of the wheel?'"—"Great Consummation," p. 333.

The astronomer Herschel believed, as far back as 1801, that the sun's fires were electrical, a gigantic electric light. In 1873, Secchi at Rome said that there is a periodic variation in the size of the sun. This idea startled the world. Professor Langley says:—

"When we consider that the thickening of this solar atmosphere would bring back the age of ice, or its thinning carry our polar regions to tropical temperature, . . . we can feel no certainty of the future constancy of the solar heat, nor of our protection against such changes as seem to have befallen other suns in space, and against which we are powerless to guard." Popular Science Monthly, November, 1879.

The same author (an eminent astronomer) also tells us there has been a wonderful projecting outward of the vast equatorial region of the sun's luminous atmosphere, the flowing fire tongue reaching, as estimated by various authorities, millions of miles, some placing it as high as fourteen to thirty, or even forty millions of miles. "It possesses an aspect both astonishing and fearful." Some give the flames the name of "columns of magnetic light."

FAST FULFILLING.

YEARS in the past, when upon the strength of the prophecies of the Bible, Seventh-day Adventists declared that the time would come when the "Sabbath question" would be the great question before the people of this country, we were looked upon by many people as chimerical,—as looking for something that we should never see realized. But suddenly the Sabbath question has forged ahead, and now, in city, town, and country, in national and State legislative halls, the question is being discussed. Shall we enforce the Sabbath (Sunday) by law? Shall we repeal the laws now existing? What day is the Sabbath? What right has Sunday to be called the Sabbath? Is the Sabbath a religious or a civil institution? Can it be enforced without infringing upon the religious liberties of the people? Such are the questions which are now agitating the public mind. In a leading religious paper now before me, is an editorial, from which I take the following sentence: "Groups of citizens on the streets, and about the hotels and depots in Harrisburgh, were overheard earnestly discussing the Sabbath question."

Seventh-day Adventists have not caused this particular discussion in this place, at least not directly. The time was, when if there was any agitation upon this subject, we had to arouse it ourselves. Now the case is very different. Let the agitation go on, no matter by whom the attention of the public is aroused upon this great question. Paul declared that some preached Christ with contention, but while he would have preferred to have him preach some other way, he rejoiced that he was preached even in that way. So we say, "Turn on the light." There are honest people everywhere,—people who love the truth,—people who can see without having church spectacles on to distort their vision. Let the foundations of the Sunday Sabbath be discovered. Then will many return to the observance of the Sabbath of Jehovah.

—The Sunday-law people have, in very desperation, invented the phrase, "A secular Sunday," and promulgated the holiday theory of Sunday laws, in order to deceive and to preserve, under false pretenses, the union of the Church with the State.—Ringgold.

"GO WORK TO-DAY IN MY VINEYARD."

BY ELDER L. D. SANTEE.
(At Conference, Battle Creek.)

Go to the darkened lands where hearts are yearning
For knowledge of the pitying Saviour's love;
Go to the heathen, with your own heart burning,
And point them to the glorious home above.

Why should we be indifferent to their pleading,
Why shun the path that Christ for sinners trod?
O bring the bread of life, that they are needing,
And lead the erring to the Lamb of God.

Go to the heathen with the love of Jesus,
As they to us lift up imploring hands;
Remember that his eye of love e'er sees us,
In halls of home, or in far distant lands.

The Lord will come; the day is not far distant
When "seeking for the lost" will all be o'er;
O while our Intercessor is existent,
Tell darkened minds of the immortal shore.

Soon will probation close, our work be ended,
Our ripened sheaves we'll bear with joy on high;
Soon shall we be by angels bright, attended,
To the eternal gardens of the sky.

IOWA.

CRESTON, GLENWOOD, AND AFTON.—At the request of the Conference Committee, I began a series of meetings Nov. 19, in a school-house south of Creston. Much prejudice was manifest from the beginning. This prejudice was not so much from ignorance as from having heard and rejected the truth. Still because of the interest shown by a few, I did not feel free to leave, and continued preaching and visiting until Dec. 26. Four, heads of families, expressed a purpose to obey the truth, and about fifteen dollars were received in donations.

Dec. 30 meetings were begun at Burr Oak school-house, south of Glenwood, Mills Co. The interest was excellent, and the attendance continued good until the severe weather made it impossible for many to attend. Six or seven were observing the Sabbath, and several more pledged themselves to turn and serve the Lord. Most of those who were keeping the Sabbath had heard little or no preaching, and needed instruction in the word. They will have Sabbath-school and prayer-meeting. Forty-three discourses were given, and many visits were made. Six dollars and sixty-six cents were received in donations. Visits were also made to two excellent families in Glenwood. One of these families, I think, has decided to walk with God.

Feb. 10-15 was spent with the church at Afton. The Holy Spirit came with rich blessing, and the brethren gave thanks to God, and took courage. There was considerable interest manifested by outsiders, and an invitation was given by some of them, as well as by the church, to hold a series of meetings at that place. Five copies of the Home Missionary were ordered and one Sentinel. If this church is faithful to God, he will use them for a light to others. A loving Father has blessed me with health and freedom in speaking the word, for which I praise his name.

MINNESOTA.

ST. PAUL.—The fight here for freedom of conscience is moving on. Many are becoming interested in the Wacek bill, which proposes to repeal three sections of our Sunday laws. We believe this a move in the right direction, and sent petitions to our churches throughout the State. One section asked to be repealed is what is called the Barbers' law. As was expected, this aroused a spirit of opposition from that source. We took occasion to send out a petition favoring the repeal, with some National Religious Liberty literature, to over three hundred boss barbers in the State, with a letter addressed to each. Yesterday a letter was received from one of these, who said he received signatures from everybody in the village. He said: "I see the same spirit of persecution is here in Minnesota, that is in Tennessee. The head of that viper should be crushed. I am glad to stand by you in the fight." The encouragement received here in this city from some hotels where the proprietor offered to circulate our petition, led to the conclusion to send out petitions to a limited number of the leading hotels in the State. With these we send a letter and some literature. We are doing this in faith, and expect good results. Another bill was intro-

Seventh-day Adventist Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association," which is to have control of, and manage, the Orphans' and Old People's Homes, and take charge of our benevolent enterprises generally. More will be said concerning this hereafter.

It is also proposed to organize a local General Conference Association in Dist. No. 4, to be under the control of the General Conference. The object of this is to divide up the responsibility and the business of the General Conference Association as a whole, so that too much burden will not rest upon the parent society.

At the meeting of the General Conference, Feb. 23, an address and remonstrance against the interference of the government with the rights of conscience, and against religious legislation in Congress was adopted, and will be sent broadcast throughout the country.

The brethren in Australia propose to raise $20,000 for a school in that Conference, if the brethren in America will assist them to the amount of $10,000 more. The project is of more than local interest, as it will affect the work in Polynesia, Malaysia, and Australasia.

The report of Union College at College View, Nebr., showed that enterprise to be in a very prosperous condition. The present worth of the plant is $191,471.29.

One matter which will be of general interest to our brethren throughout the field is the disposition the Conference proposes to make of laborers the coming season. Of the changes recommended the following may be noted: Elder H. Grant is transferred from Minnesota to labor in College View, Nebr.; Elder Fero goes to the North Pacific Conference; Elder Bagby to the Upper Columbia Conference; Elder R. S. Owen from Canada to Georgia; Elder C. Mc Reynolds to Kansas; Elder J. M. Rees to Arkansas; J. R. Eastman to Oakland, Cal., to connect with the Pacific Press; Anna R. Ingels to go to Sydney, to enter the tract society work in that field. J. B. Goodrich, of Maine, goes to Canada; J. E. Jayne, of Nebraska, to Maine; L. Dyo Chambers to Dist. No. 2, to take the secretaryship of the Southern Tract Society; W. F. Williams to Cape Town, South Africa; Elder J. F. Hanson to Chicago; A. S. Hickox to Queensland, Australia; Delos Lake and the Misses Georgia A. Burrus and Myrtle G. Griffin to India; Jennie Owen to return, and Mattie Sharp and Julia Parmelee go to labor in England; C. H. Keslake and wife to make England their field of labor, and Julius Christiansen to engage in tract and missionary work in Norway and Denmark; O. Nelson and wife to Sweden; F. H. Westphal to Illinois; H. W. Cottrell to New England; W. J. Stone to Montana, E. T. Russell to Oklahoma; Nora Fenner to South Africa; J. W. Collier to Dist. No. 2; E. W. Webster to South Carolina; Geo. B. Thompson to South Africa; J. W. Scoles to Illinois, and F. I. Richardson to the Maritime Provinces.

A stirring address was read from sister White to the Conference at its eleventh meeting, Feb. 26, full of words of courage and good cheer, and which aroused the Conference to the highest degree of enthusiasm.

At a meeting of the Religious Liberty Association Feb. 27, Elder Geo. B. Wheeler, of Vermont, whom we are most happy to welcome to our midst, lately a Baptist minister, but who has been led to connect himself with the Seventh-day Adventists, gave a very interesting talk respecting the position of the Baptist denomination in regard to religious liberty, reading extracts from their principles and current publications, showing how they are departing from the ground they have so long and honorably maintained for freedom of conscience.

At the meeting of the Conference, Feb. 28, Mr. James T. Ringgold, of whom our readers have previously seen frequent favorable mention in the REVIEW, having just arrived from Baltimore, was introduced to the Conference, and responded with a few cordial and happy remarks, expressing his great interest in religious liberty, and the work that we are doing in that direction, and consequently his interest in us as a people, on account of our efforts in behalf of those great principles. Mr. Ringgold also gave a short address on the evening of March 2, on the principles of religious liberty, which gave additional evidence of his entire sympathy with us in this respect. The assembled Conference gave him a most cordial welcome, and showed their appreciation of his sympathy and co-operation in the good cause. Brethren Allen Moon and A. F. Ballenger also made interesting remarks on that evening, which was devoted to the religious liberty work.

Up to this writing the General Conference has held fifteen meetings, and the study of the Bible has been conducted each evening according to the program. The time is now drawing on to the close of this good occasion, and the Conference will be in the past before these lines reach the readers of the REVIEW. The utmost harmony and cordiality of feeling and a common interest in the work, have prevailed, and marked all the proceedings. The closing items must be deferred to another week.

THE FEASTS OF THE LORD, AND THE SABBATH.

IN Leviticus 23 mention is made of the feasts of the Lord, and the weekly Sabbath is apparently in the list. We say apparently; for we are certain that a careful and critical reading of the chapter will convince every honest person that not only is the Sabbath not included in the list of the feasts, but that it is carefully excluded. Those who take the position that the Sabbath is included in the "feasts," generally read the first three verses, and then rest their case. We think it a better way carefully to read the whole chapter, letting each statement have its due weight, and then decide, as the whole sense of the scripture upon this point shall appear to be the most harmonious and consistent.

We invite the reader to turn to the chapter in question, and study it with us, with the interest its importance demands.

The subject of the chapter is, "The Feasts of the Lord," which are to be proclaimed holy convocations. Having announced the subject, the Lord mentions the weekly Sabbath, but in verse 3, where the Sabbath is distinctly mentioned, he does not call it a feast, but says, "It is the Sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings." He then again announces his subject and declares (verse 4), "These are the feasts of the Lord." Thence on to the 38th verse a minute description is given of these feasts, and it is expressly stated that they are "feasts." The day of the preparation for the atonement is called "a sabbath" (not the Sabbath), probably because the great solemnity of the day made it more like the weekly Sabbath.

Before going any further in the chapter, we wish to notice more particularly the first four verses. As we before stated, verse 4 announces the subject the second time, or resumes the subject which had been interrupted by the allusion to the weekly Sabbath. If the Sabbath of verse 4 is one of the "feasts" which are the subject of the chapter, why should the Lord, after mentioning the Sabbath, call attention anew to the feasts, saying, "These are the feasts," etc.? We know of no reason, only that the Sabbath was not properly included in the "feasts of the Lord."

Other and stronger reasons for so concluding may be drawn from verses 37 and 38. Verse 37 and the first part of verse 38 read as follows: "These are the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, to offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord, a burnt-offering, and a meat-offering, a sacrifice, and drink-offerings, everything upon his day: besides the Sabbaths of the Lord," etc. No one can dispute that the "Sabbaths of the Lord" here mentioned are the regularly recurring weekly Sabbaths, which occurred at intervals of seven days during the year, either between or upon the days set apart for yearly feasts.

A comparison of verses 2 and 37 will make it very clear that the Lord's, or weekly, Sabbath, is separate from the feasts. If the expression, "feasts of the Lord," in verses 2 and 4, include the weekly Sabbath mentioned in verse 3, then it inevitably follows that the same expression, "feasts of the Lord," in verse 37, also includes the weekly Sabbath. But as there are "Sabbaths of the Lord" "beside" these (verse 38), then, if this position is true, there must be, besides all the annual sabbaths and the weekly Sabbaths, some other Sabbaths particularly designated as the "Sabbaths of the Lord;" and those who hold that the weekly Sabbath is included in the "feasts of the Lord," mentioned in Lev. 23: 24, 37, are under obligation to point out these other Sabbaths, tell us when they were instituted, and for what purpose they were established. As it is a manifest impossibility to do this, it therefore follows that the weekly Sabbath, instituted in Eden (Gen. 2: 2, 3), and in the decalogue called the "Sabbath of the Lord thy God," referred to by God through Isaiah as "my holy day" (Isa. 58: 13), was never included in the "feasts of the Lord."

As conclusive proof upon this point, we will now cite the reader to the 44th verse: "And Moses declared unto the children of Israel the feasts of the Lord."

This statement is emphatically true of the annual feasts of the Lord, but it is not true of the weekly Sabbath, which has existed before the birth of Moses, even from Eden, and was known to the children of Israel before they came to Sinai, and it was first formerly proclaimed to them by God himself; and at that time Moses stood with the rest of the children of Israel as a listener. (See Ex. 19: 24, 25; 20: 19-21.) Afterward he went up into the mount, and from the Lord received a knowledge of his will concerning these annual feasts, the sacrificial offerings, etc.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

An astronomer in the New York Sun, May 23, 1870, said: "The sun is beginning to be an object of great anxiety to many scientific men, the spots assuming of late an appearance which astonishes astronomers, and is calculated to alarm that class which fancies that it can detect portents of the future in the heavens." The London Spectator, July, 1869, said that the vast changes thus going on in the physical constitution of the sun, powerfully affected the electrical condition of the earth, and might some day not only throw all telegraph cables into dire confusion, but even cause the sudden disappearance of our whole solar system, after the fashion of other solar systems that have thus disappeared.

The years 1880-86 are famous for astonishing solar disturbances. During these years occurred what astronomers designate as the "perihelia" of the four great planets, Jupiter, Neptune, Uranus, and Saturn. Their orbits being in the form of an ellipse, they come much nearer the sun at their perihelia than at other times; that term being used to designate the nearest point in their orbits to the sun. Their periods of revolution around the sun being of different length, it is most rare that all their perihelia occur about the same time, as they did on this occasion. Astronomers tell us that not since the Christian era had an approximation so close as this been seen.

They all teach that the attraction of these vast planetary bodies upon the sun greatly affected it, causing great disturbance in its mass. Huge spots on its surface appeared, tumultuous disorders were discovered, and fearful explosions were witnessed. Professor C. A. Young, at Hanover, N. H., saw the sun fires mount up to an elevation of 60,000 miles on Oct. 7, 1880, at a rate of 300 miles in a second, and finally continuing till it gained an altitude of 350,000 miles. Then it sank and finally disappeared.

Nov. 16, 1882, the astronomer Langley beheld a sun-spot with an area of 2,200,000 square miles. Lack of space forbids the mention of a large number of astonishing phenomena occurring in the sun and in our world in those memorable years. There were an immense number of cyclones, water-spouts, electrical storms, cloud-bursts, and drenching rain-storms, furious heat and abnormal cold, mock suns and comets, seven of the latter being seen in one year. In Cincinnati, Ohio, in July, 1881, 414 persons in six days died of sunstroke. Soudan reported the highest temperature ever recorded in England.

Many of our readers will remember the famous "yellow day," Sept. 6, 1881, which caused so much comment in the newspapers of our country. By noon it was nearly as dark as twilight. Many great mills were closed, and in a large number of schools the scholars were dismissed, and lamps were lighted in a vast number of others. The barometer sank very low, and the magnetic needle was strongly affected, remaining in many instances in any position in which it was placed. Multitudes beheld it in sober, silent meditation, as if strange forebodings were passing through their minds. It was a strange, weird scene. Not a breath of air stirred. Numerous persons fainted away. It is thus described by M. E. B. in the Boston Journal:—

"When the brassy sky made daylight dark, every utterance, sacred or profane, concerning the time when this heaven and earth shall pass away, ran by some crooked path into the minds of sensible men and women. Even those of us who were able to look the supernatural straight in the face, were yet swamped in uncertainty as to the natural issue. Could anything less than a tornado, an earthquake, or some other dark outcome of the unknown forces of nature ever proceed from that sinister-looking canopy, which changed the most familiar things into something weird and uncanny? It was a mountain of momentous strangeness."—"Great Consummation," pp. 349, 350.

Then followed in Aug. 26–30, 1883, the terrible mundane convulsions in the island of Java, when a mountain 7,000 feet high was split in two, and another "2,800 feet in height and five by three miles in bulk, was tossed into the air, and, sinking, almost disappeared."

"Sixty-five miles of circular mountain range sunk out of sight, and fifty miles square of territory was shattered or engulfed. A great tidal wave arose to a perpendicular height of 135 feet, and sea waves were propelled to the south shores both of Africa and South America, at the rate of 400 and 500 miles an hour. The roar and thunder of the agonized mountain was distinctly heard 3,000 miles distant, while all about the convulsed region the murky and impenetrable air, thick with dust, ashes, and pumice, made all as black as the most rayless night. Barometers all over the world were disturbed by the concussions and air waves. These swift and violent air waves traveled out in every direction from the great eruption! all over the earth, at a speed of 674 and 706 miles an hour, one wave moving west, and making the circuit of the globe three and a quarter times, or 82,200 miles ere it died away." "It was," says the Boston Journal, "the crowning horror of a year which was singularly marked with horrors."—"Great Consummation," p. 352.

In Java's awful earthquake 50,000 square miles were shaken, and 100,000 persons perished.

The magnetic storms during the years above mentioned were most remarkable. Brief notice of but one will be given. It occurred Nov. 10–19, 1882, its greatest intensity being on the 17th. A huge sun-spot, embracing an area 120 times that of our whole globe (described in the Popular Science Monthly, of June, 1883) accompanied the storm. This storm affected telegraphic wires all over the earth. Some could not be worked at all. The great ocean cable became useless. From some of the wires sparks leaped forth, and in some cases switch-boards took fire and were burned, and keys were melted. In other cases, operators received shocks, and the telegraph was run without batteries. "Practical telegraph men said the power of the disturbance exceeded all previous similar visitations." It prevailed over the whole continent of America, and was as wide-spread and violent in Europe. In some large cities not a single wire could be used. In Milwaukee the current was so strong that an electric lamp was kept burning for hours. The whole heavens were lighted up with magnetic lights flashing, dancing, whirling, advancing, and retreating in various hues, shapes, and combinations in wondrous and diversified magnificence. "It surpassed any auroral phenomenon witnessed in the present generation."

It has become the prevailing opinion among astronomers and scientists that a close connection exists between sun-spots and cyclones, tornadoes, and other terrestrial phenomena. The subtle, mysterious, electric fluid, pervading in greater or less degree our earth, seems to be powerfully generated in the sun as a grand magnet. As these sun-spots become more numerous and extensive, these phenomena on earth increase. It is well known how numerous these have become of late years; till in western States in many cases the people have built caves in the ground, into which they hurriedly hasten when the dreaded, black, trunk-shaped cloud, so familiar of late years, is seen approaching, heralding the fearful cyclone.

Professor H. A. Hazen, who has written a volume on tornadoes, gives a table showing the number of sun-spots and tornadoes for a series of years. We sum up his table of the years from 1880 to 1888 inclusive, and find in these nine years 6,120 sun-spots, and the sum of recorded tornadoes 2,833. There were 589 tornadoes in the single year 1883, and on Feb. 9, 1884, there were sixty tornadoes in one day. "These destroyed 10,000 buildings, killed 800 people, and wounded 2,500 others." Eight States were visited by them. In 1884 there occurred in fifty-nine days, in sixteen different States, 172 cyclones, destroying 1,054 lives, wounding 3,861 others, and inflicting a loss of property of $10,000,000. Professor Hazen sums up the havoc caused by electric winds from 1873 to 1888 in this country alone, as numbering 2,221, destroying property to the amount of $32,965,000. It is generally agreed that the principal cause of these terrible storms was electricity generated in the sun.

In view of the wonderful changes going on in the sun and the terrible effects of the electric storms on earth, consequent upon these changes, we cannot wonder that much has been said and written concerning them during the last fifty years, and that great alarm has been expressed by a large number of most eminent philosophers and scientists. They generally express the belief that great catastrophes await the sun and our whole solar system. They see in these solar disorders evidences of weakness, old age, gradual disintegration, and final extinction, and express it with plainness. Mr. Taylor, in the "Great Consummation," records a large number of these opinions, which we have not the space to insert. Some express the conviction that great destruction will yet be caused in our planet by these fearful sun storms of electric intensity, and ruin awaits our globe. There has been no single theme in astronomic science and investigation which has received such attention as this during the last half century, or caused so much alarm. And certainly the wonderful providence of the terrible cyclones of the last few years, caused by these sun storms, have aroused the deepest interest.

We cannot doubt these solar phenomena are among the "signs in the sun," foretold by our Saviour. They are precisely what his language describes. They came at the right time. Their effects are among the "fearful sights and great signs" of which he speaks. They produce perplexity among the great men who are studying the solar system. They suggest indeed with great force the coming of that day when under the fourth plague the sun will have "power" to scorch men "with great heat." Rev. 16:8, 9. It has heretofore been supposed to be solid, stable, sure, safe, and supremely potent to hold all of the members of its solar system in perfect order. But under the investigation of the wisest astronomers, with the most powerful glasses, it is now seen to be at times in wild disorder, fearful commotion, sending forth great tongues of flame thousands, yea, millions of miles above its surface, and having vast portions of its face spotted with great chasms, and sending forth influences affecting not only our earth and throwing it into the wildest disorder, but also the planets and the moon as well. No scientist can explain or comprehend what the forces are which produce these stupendous results, how they originate, or what will be their termination or final effects. They can only chronicle their manifestation and ponder with bated breath the dire calamities in store for our globe should these solar commotions break the bands hitherto holding them. Science is helpless in the presence of such forces and consequences.

But the child of God, with the blessed word before him, fears not. He worships One who made the sun, and holds all nature in his hand. He has full control of all its movements. The Son of God, who by the fiat of the Father and in the counsel of peace between them both created all worlds, clearly foretold these terrible commotions ages ago in this great prophecy. He pointed out these "signs in the sun" as heralds of his rapidly nearing advent. The humble child of God may rejoice that his redemption draweth nigh, while the scientist ponders, wonders, trembles with questioning and fearful looking forward to impending desolation, when the sun shall fail to bestow its proper light and heat.

In view of these terrible evidences of God's approaching wrath, as seen in the earthquake, the cyclone, the tidal wave, and the electric disturbance, how can we be innocent if we ignore them all and continue in careless indifference to the great signs of his coming? How could God more wonderfully fulfill our Lord's predictions? How could it be done on a scale more grand and complete? How could the attention of the world be called to these things in a more emphatic manner? Yet all these striking events are but "signs." They are omens of a far mightier event yet to come. It has not been God's design to drive men to believe. But he will give them reasonable evidence that the great day approaches, by fulfilled signs long ago predicted. The wise will understand. But the world-loving, the careless, the lover of pleasure, the cold, incredulous skeptic, will continue to do wickedly, and they will not understand. So says in substance the holy Scripture. Dan. 12:10.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

THROUGH being delayed in effecting a landing at Jaffa, I was unable to reach the vessel I had intended to take from Port Said to Brindisi, Italy. At first it seemed inevitable that I should remain in this sin-darkened, coal-blackened town at the northern entrance of the Suez canal for five days. I had even engaged my room for that period of time, when through the courtesy of my agents, Thos. Cook & Son, I was permitted to change my route, and return to Alexandria just in time to get a steamer to Naples instead of Brindisi. I spent in all ten nights upon the Mediterranean Sea, and six of them I have no desire to live over again. When we landed at Naples, the snow was blowing furiously, and our hearts were filled with a supreme disgust for life aquatic. The boat was bound for Genoa; but I believe every passenger deserted her at Naples, those for Genoa preferring to repay their fare by rail rather than endure the discomfort and anxiety of another night at sea.

As we neared the Straits of Messina, that lie between the island of Sicily and the toe of Italy, a waterspout formed between us and the neighboring land. A black, cyclone cloud overhung the sea, and extended ashore. In the midst of the cloud was a pure white funnel cloud, revolving with great force. Where its apex rested upon the water, the sea was lashed and dashed into a fury of foam and spray, and was rapidly drawn upward into the main cloud, and emptied in torrents upon the adjacent shore. After watching the phenomenon for some time, it was a relief to discover that its course was not toward us. At the same time that this was attracting attention, Mt. Aetna, on the port side, was to be seen with his lofty head swathed in thick clouds. For about five minutes these broke away, and the great volcano, now active, appeared in majestic grandeur.

After our tossing, we enjoyed the peaceful waters of the straits about three miles wide, lined on either side by cities and towns. Just before dark, we had passed the Lepari Islands, the last of which was the volcano Stromboli. This mountain rises an abrupt cone out of the depths of the sea. A village nestles at its base, but its life seems exceedingly precarious.

Naples is celebrated as one of the beauty spots of the world. During my stay, its beauty must have been indoors, as the weather was exceedingly unfavorable for a display. Mt. Vesuvius is but eight miles distant. It emitted a column of smoke by day, and exhibited a crown of fire by night. But the snow rendered its heights inaccessible, much to my disappointment. A day in the extensive museum, another in Herculaneum and Pompeii, a visit to the mount of San Remo within the city, and to the aquarium,—all richly repay the traveler. Pompeii was buried in scoræ and ashes, and its excavation is comparatively easy, while Herculaneum lies under a bed of solid lava rock. The theater has been excavated at a depth of eighty-five feet. It is interesting to walk those ancient streets, and enter the houses dwelt in two thousand years ago. Two successive cities have been built above Herculaneum, but Pompeii stands desolate and alone, like a vast cemetery.

Leaving Naples in the afternoon, a railway ride of 162 miles brings us to Rome. It is said that "Rome never changes." But the remark must be confined to its meaning in reference to the church, and not applied to the city; for here a wonderful transformation has taken place since the revolution that limited the power of the papacy to the precincts of the Vatican. Before the triumph of Victor Emmanuel, Rome was away down in physical filth

Smith's Bible Dictionary says that Augustus made Tarsus a "free city;" and as Paul was born there, he had all the rights of citizenship. In chapter 21:39 he speaks of Tarsus as "no meancity." So, although he was by natural descent a Jew, being the son of Jewish parents, as a citizen of a free Roman city, he was, in that respect, a Roman; and he did not hesitate to make use of that privilege against his countrymen who were persecuting him.

302.—HUMAN SACRIFICES. LEV. 27:29.

Please explain for me a text which has given me no little perplexity. It is Lev. 27:29. Does this text teach the offering of human sacrifices, or the destruction of the life of human beings, as a vow to the Lord? I. E. K.

Ans.—According to the best Biblical critics, there were two kinds of vows; one, that might be called a common or ordinary vow, and another, a special vow. One was "holy" unto the Lord, the other was "most holy." Objects embraced in the first might be redeemed; while those in the other, could not be. It is evidently to the latter kind of vows that Lev. 27:28, 29 applies. Verse 28 reads: "Notwithstanding, no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord." Verse 29 may be taken to be an emphatic restatement of the fact affirmed in verse 28, that nothing but death could take one out of the condition in which he was placed by this vow. Professor George Bush has the most satisfactory note on this point of any we have seen. On verse 29 he says:—

"The legitimate import seems to be, to repeat in a more emphatic manner that part of the precept in the preceding verse, which had respect to man; or, in other words, simply to declare that when a person, whether child or slave, had been thus most solemnly and irrevocably given away to God, he was never on any consideration to be reclaimed or redeemed. But is it not said, however, that 'he shall surely be put to death,' and does not this imply that Israelitish parents and masters had the power of thus devoting their children or slaves to death? To this it may be answered that the original phrase, מוֹת יָמוּתָהּ, moth yumoth, 'dying shall die,' may without violence be interpreted in this connection, not of any violent death in consequence of the vow, but simply that he should remain in that devoted state until he died. This is the interpretation proposed by several distinguished commentators, and, indeed, considering this law in relation to the duty of private individuals, there seems to be no other sense that does not outrage the spirit of the divine code, which breathes such a tender concern for human life."

An illustration of this kind of vow we think may be seen in the case of Jephthah, in Judges 11:30, 31. He vowed, saying, "Whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering." The margin gives the true reading, "Or I will offer it," etc. If it was anything that would be proper to offer as a burnt-offering, he devoted it to the Lord in that way. If not, it was devoted by this kind of vow through life, to the Lord's service. His daughter came forth to meet him. Verses 34, 35. She could not be put to death, or offered up as a burnt-offering, but was devoted to the Lord, to live a life of perpetual celibacy. This explains the custom spoken of in verse 40.

THE DEVIL AT PRAYER-MEETING.

LET no one be surprised at the idea that the Devil attends prayer-meeting. There is no question about the fact. Not that he believes in and favors prayer-meetings; but as long as they are going to be held, independent of his assent, he makes it a point to be present. In fact, he never stays away unless he is actually shut out. Moreover, he is always punctual, and is not afraid to occupy a front seat.

If opportunity offers, he takes it upon himself to open the meeting. He will at least try to take a hand in this, if he cannot control it entirely. He knows that a good deal depends upon getting a right start. He is ready to take part in the opening song; indeed, he does not shun any part of the exercises. But does the Devil actually join in the singing?—Yes, he does, very frequently, and he sings with an audible voice. There is one way that you can always tell the Devil's singing, and that is by the time he keeps. It is popularly supposed that fast music is the kind he always furnishes, but this is a mistake. He never furnishes this kind at a prayer-meeting. When some good, cheering hymn, ringing with faith and the Christian's hope, is sung about three times as slowly as it should be, it may be set down as certain that the Devil is beating the time. This is one of his most effective means of letting down the interest and offsetting any good impressions that may have been received; for no matter what the words say, the tune says just as plainly as anything can, that Christian life and experience is a dull, lifeless, tiresome thing. When the Devil can wind up a meeting in this way, he is especially delighted.

The Devil believes in long prayers at prayer-meeting, the longer the better. If prayers must be offered there, it is better, he thinks, that one or two should begin and pray "all around the earth," at the conclusion of which there will be neither time nor inclination for any further participation in the exercise. He is very solicitous lest the leaders should somehow get the idea that prayers at a prayer-meeting can be short, that they can be earnest, pointed, and effectual, and yet consist of only a few words.

After prayer he will immediately suggest to the leader that what those present need is an exhortation, to bring them up to a place where the meeting can go forward successfully. He does not say a lengthy exhortation, but he merely suggests that there are very many points connected with Christian faith and experience upon which the assembly need to be enlightened. Not that he favors having them enlightened upon such points, oh no; but he knows that they will hear all that anyway at other meetings, or perhaps have received such instruction many times already, while the object of the prayer-meeting is to give them an opportunity to speak, to give and receive the blessing of bearing testimony before one another; and he is determined to have just as little of this as he can. When at last the leader concludes his exhortation, and says, "Now the time is yours," he promptly suggests to each one that the remaining time is so short it would be better to let it be occupied by others who have more desire to speak. To timid brother S or sister T he suggests also that of course it would not do for them to say anything until brother A or brother B, or other leading ones in front, have spoken. It is not strange if under such circumstances the speaking lags.

But perhaps above everything else, the Devil is anxious to dictate the testimonies of those who take part in the meeting; for he knows that testimonies of a certain kind give more glory to himself than they do to God. He doesn't care how many testimonies are given, if they are only of this kind. There are certain distinguishing features by which the Devil's testimony is easily recognized. The tone of voice in which it is uttered is very doleful. The speaker tells of the trials that he meets and the many failures that he makes, and what hard work it is to be a Christian; and to each sentence the Devil says, Amen! for has he not over and over again himself asserted that the Christian life is a hard, toilsome, and gloomy one? He wants this impressed upon every mind. Then he whispers to the speaker that it will not do to be too positive in his testimony, lest he should be saying things that may not be true. It will not do to say that he knows his sins are forgiven, "for," says the Devil, "you know that is not so. You are not sure of it, anyway. You can say other things that will sound all right without saying that. Tell what you want to be, and then you will not be saying anything but what is true." So the speaker makes some good general statements, but nothing to show his own personal knowledge of the power of the gospel of Christ. To this kind of testimony the Devil is always ready to say, Amen.

If the Devil cannot dictate all of a testimony, he will dictate as much as he can. To one he will say, "You can't claim the righteousness of Christ; you know you do n't feel anything of the kind." To another he will say, "Be careful about praising God; you do n't want to appear like a fanatic;" and to another, "It won't do for you to say that; it wouldn't sound respectable; it would be altogether out of the usual order." (He fears that it might do something to break up formality.) To another he will say, "It will be a good enough testimony if you tell the people what you want to be and what you mean to do"—for the Devil does n't care a cent what a person is going to do, so long as he doesn't do it. He has his suggestions fixed up to suit each individual case.

But while the Devil always comes to prayer-meeting, he does not always remain till the meeting is concluded. There is a way to be rid of his obnoxious presence, and that is by paying no attention whatever to his suggestions. He will stay as long as he has encouragement to do so, but when resisted in the name of Christ, he will flee. When freedom takes the place of formality, when the prayers are short and correspondingly earnest and pointed, the singing joyful and full of life, and the testimonies full of praise to God and faith in his promises, telling what God has done for each soul and claiming the righteousness of Christ, his Satanic Majesty speedily finds the meeting too uncomfortable for him to remain, and he is glad to depart and take all his imps along with him. There is nothing more distasteful to him than a clear positive testimony to the present power of the gospel of Christ to save a person from his sins. Discourage him at the start by having every exercise full of life and faith and hope, give him no chance to beat time to the singing, and his chances for turning the meeting to his own account will be discouragingly few.

OUR SAVIOUR'S GREAT PROPHECY.

"This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled."

The reader's attention is now called to a most interesting and important portion of this wonderful discourse,—the nearness of the great climax of this prophecy, the glorious appearing of Christ, when the signs preceding it have had their fulfillment. In the preceding chapters of this series we have dwelt at some length upon the various signs which were to precede and herald the visible advent of the Son of God. We have noticed every prominent statement made by our Lord of events marking the different periods of the gospel age, and especially of all those given as signs of his soon coming.

To refresh the mind of the reader, we briefly sum up these interesting themes as given by our Lord. The appearing of false Christs, wars, famines, pestilences, earthquakes, and changes of kingdoms; the destruction of Jerusalem; the great persecutions of the papacy during its long period of 1260 years, their beginning in A. D. 538, when the pope of Rome was made head of all the churches by the decree of Justinian, the Greek-Roman emperor; their termination in 1798, when the pope was carried into captivity by the French, and died in exile; the special signs of Christ's coming commencing near the closing year of this long period; the great earthquake of Lisbon, the wonderful sun-darkening of 1780, and others immediately following; the moon clothed in sackcloth; the astounding star showers, such as were never known before in history, in our own generation; the arising of false Christs and false prophets during this very generation, in which these great signs have been fulfilling; the tidal waves, tornadoes, electric storms etc., so closely connected with the signs in the sun seen so frequently, and of such an awe-inspiring nature, in the marvelous sun-spots and tremendous solar disturbances chronicled by the most eminent scientists of our age,—all these predictions have been literally fulfilled. Not a single prediction presented in this great prophecy as a sign to precede his coming, can be shown to be unfulfilled.

But this is a wholly inadequate statement of the matter. These signs have been of world-wide interest and comment, on a scale demanding and receiving the attention of vast numbers of mankind; studied by sages, philosophers, and scientists of world-wide reputation, and of such note and certainty that no intelligent man ever thinks of denying the facts of their occurrence; however much he may dispute or question the significance of their being actually heralds of Christ's return to our globe. But whether accepted as signs or not, this is certain, that if the events we have been considering are not the fulfillment of our Lord's predictions, in the very nature of things many of them never can be fulfilled. If the same events were to occur again, would be but a repetition, destroying their whole force as a "sign." If two literal fulfillments of one predicted sign should occur, the query would at once arise, "Why not other similar occurrences ad infinitum?" Its whole significance would disappear.

Again: take for example "the great tribulation" of 1260 years, based on several distinctive prophecies, so defining it that no possible recurrence could meet the prophetic specifications; for the Roman empire and its subdivisions are now forever past. But the close of this long period marks the beginning of the "signs" themselves. God has so hedged this subject about that we are forced to conclude that these predicted signs are now fully given. Not one is unfulfilled. Christ has brought in each event in its predicted order, on a scale sufficient to satisfy all reasonable demands, and fully meet the requirements of a consistent faith.

How near, then, are we to the great event itself? This is a question to be approached by every humble, sensible Christian with the deepest reverence and greatest self-distrust, but with full confidence in the statements of our Lord himself. What are his own declarations concerning this subject? Does he teach that it is impossible for us to know anything about it? Why, then, should he predict all these events? Why give his disciples any signs at all? Does he, or does he not, desire us to know anything about the time of his advent? We will let him answer himself, in his own language, as quoted by all three of the evangelists,—Matthew, Mark, and Luke, the only Bible writers who give this discourse:—

"Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Matt. 24:32-34.

The testimony of Mark is almost word for word the same as that of Matthew, with no divergence of meaning whatever. Luke says:—

"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh. And he spake to them a parable; Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees; when they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away, till all be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away." Luke 21:25-33.

Before coming to a close, critical scrutiny of the exact words of our Lord, and their meaning, and of the positions taken by others concerning them, we notice briefly the general significance of this language. After giving in detail the order of events preceding his coming, our Lord mentions the specific signs to precede it, prominent among which are the signs in the sun and moon and falling of the stars. At the end of this series, he places the coming of himself in glory, in language most unmistakable and positive, clear, emphatic, and decisive. It is not too much to say that if the clear import of his language could be set aside as having little significance,—meaning nothing,—any language he ever uttered, or any doctrine, or subject, could be set aside as of no value.

The reader should never lose sight of the disciples' questions, which served to call out this discourse: "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. 24:32. Then follows the discourse announcing the grand events of the gospel dispensation till at last the special signs of the Lord's return are most impressively given; then are seen the great convulsions of nature connected with his coming, and the personal appearing of our Lord himself in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, and the glorious resurrection of all his faithful saints to himself from the whole circumference of the globe, and their ascension to him to go to heaven above.

And now, forever to silence all questionings, destroy all doubts of the certainty of these things, and remove every ground of unbelief from the mind of his disciples in all ages, and especially in the last generation, that it would be possible to learn when his coming was near at hand, he presents three distinct considerations bearing upon this point, to make emphatic the sure certainty of his predictions that his coming would actually take place very soon after the signs he had given had been fulfilled.

(1.) He gives us the parable of the fig-tree, or, as expressed by Luke, "all the trees," a figure from nature with which all are familiar. When these put forth their leaves, the approach of summer is surely indicated. Summer does not at once appear in its full noontide radiance and warmth, but it is an unfailing omen of its near approach. Was it ever known to fail, that when all the trees put forth their leaves, summer was immediately at hand?—Such a thing was never known in all history. "So likewise ye, when ye see all these things, know that it [or "he"] is near, even at the doors." Just as certainly will Jesus soon return when these signs have appeared, as that summer will come when the trees put on their leaves. And there is nothing surer in all nature than this illustration of our Lord.

(2) "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled." We reserve this statement for a more critical examination soon to be noticed. But its general, natural meaning cannot fail to be understood by the considerate reader, taken in its connection with the subject matter of which our Lord is speaking. It is an impressive, emphatic statement that when the signs have all been completely manifested, the generation living at the time shall never pass away till Christ himself appears in the clouds of heaven.

(3.) Our Saviour knowing the unbelieving nature of men, and doubtless fully foreseeing the great prevalence of unbelief in the last days, and the many circumstances calculated to test the faith of his disciples who should be looking for the Lord's return at that period, saw fit to add one more statement as emphatic as he ever used to impress upon all who had any reverence for him, the certainty of his truthfulness: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." As we tread the solid earth, so firm under our feet, and behold the massive mountains which seem so impregnable, and gaze into the blue vault of heaven, in which for ages the earth has rolled with perfect regular orbit through the realms of space, how enduring and firm they seem to us. How natural to suppose they will thus continue forever! But the divine Maker of them declares they shall pass away. But his immutable word shall stand true to all eternity. He has declared with a solemnity and power never surpassed, that these signs shall surely testify the near approach of our coming King. When they appear, we may know he is near, "even at the doors;" the next great event thereafter, he is to enter. No multiplication of words can make these declarations of our Lord more clear, certain, and emphatic. They stand there in Holy Writ to serve as mighty monuments upon which to base our faith, firmer than mountains, unshaken as the throne of the Eternal.

In view of these statements, what can we conclude concerning the ideas so prevalent in the world in general, and in the teaching of popular theologians in particular, that it is not possible to tell with any certainty anything concerning the nearness of our Lord's return? They would have us believe that none but fanatics and "cranks" would seek to understand the prophecies, and look with expectancy for our Saviour's advent. They teach that Christ's coming, if it ever takes place at all, which many of them utterly disbelieve, will come like a clap of thunder from a clear sky, with no token of its approach. Our Saviour's great prophecy as a whole, stamps such sentiments as false, utterly irreconcilable with this whole discourse, and entirely contrary not only to reason and common sense and all the dealings of God with mankind in the past, but utter infidelity when compared with these strong statements of Jesus himself. They cannot be reconciled with his declarations.

We claim precisely what our Saviour taught himself, in the plainest language, no more and no less. Not that the day and hour of his coming may be ascertained; for he immediately declares: "But of that day and hour knoweth no man."

We know of no sensible person who claims, or has ever claimed, to know the day or hour of his coming. Our Saviour nowhere gives any data upon which to found such a claim. And not a line in all the Bible can be quoted upon which to base it. But that we may know when we are in the last days by the fulfillment of the signs our Saviour predicted, we have his own positive statement, which no true disciple should ever question. As our Saviour illustrates this point by a comparison from nature, we may draw profitable lessons from nature upon which to base our conclusions. When the trees put forth their leaves, we know summer is near. But we cannot tell the day nor the hour when summer will fully dawn upon us. We can be reasonably sure that fruit will ripen on the trees near a certain time, but cannot tell the day nor the hour when it will happen. We sow our various seeds, and if the conditions are favorable, we know they will germinate and come up; but the day and hour are wholly unknown to us. So of our Lord's return, as he himself has stated. The fulfillment of the signs he gives is positive evidence of their nearness. Then we are to watch, lest coming suddenly he find us sleeping. To watch is the constant command, repeated over and over, and constantly reiterated. But what nonsense to watch for something of which nothing whatever could be learned relative to its approach, and with no evidence it was near! But more concerning this command hereafter.

The view, therefore, of the vast majority of the religious world that Christ's coming is a matter of complete uncertainty, with no data given upon which to gather any light relative to the time of his coming, is a great, yea, a monstrous error, and one fraught with terrible danger, a rejection of the teaching of the Lord of glory himself. His coming again is the grandest event the world ever has seen, or ever will see, and it should interest every man and woman living on the earth. G. I. B.

DETRACTING FROM THE GLORY OF CHRIST.

A WRITER in Our Hope, referring to 1 Thess. 4:16, inquires, "Who are the dead in Christ?" The writer then attempts to show that the expression "dead in Christ" cannot include the just who lived during the patriarchal and Jewish ages. Thus he says:—

"Under the law and prophets, justification was by works, and not by faith alone. In the gospel age, it is by faith apart from works of law. It is evident that those who died under the law did not fall asleep in Christ, and are not the 'dead in Christ.' We must look to the gospel age for the 'dead who die in the Lord.' They are those who were converted and saved by the power of God through faith in him."

We are aware that the idea that men in the former dispensations were saved in a different way from what they are saved in the present, is quite prevalent among our Adventist brethren, who reject the authority of the law of God; but it is not often that we hear this position stated so frankly as this writer states it. He has the just men who lived before God was manifested in the flesh in Christ, know nothing of him, or of salvation by faith. But was it not an Old Testament prophet who first declared "the just shall live by his faith?" Hab. 2:4. And that the worthies of that age were saved by faith it is only necessary to read the 11th chapter of Hebrews, where many of these just men are mentioned by name, and it is expressly said of them that it was by faith that all their good works were wrought. And that this faith was faith in Christ, is susceptible of the clearest proof. Paul tells us (1 Cor. 10:1-9) that the being who guided the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan was Christ. "That spiritual rock that followed [margin, went with] them" was no other than Christ the Saviour of the world. When they murmured "against God and against Moses," Paul says they tempted Christ. And Moses their earthly leader, when brought to the great decision as to whether he would remain in Egypt or cast in his fortune with the people of God, decided upon the latter course, "esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt." Heb. 11:26. Granting that the words "dead in Christ" only apply to the dead who believed in Christ, and were saved by the power of God through faith in him,

THE OHIO SCHOOL.

[ACCORDING to the action of the late General Conference, the Sanitarium at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, will soon be transformed into a seat of learning. Concerning this move, the Mt. Vernon Semi-weekly Republican, of April 15, says:—]

On the first day of May, 1893, the Mt. Vernon Sanitarium will close its doors as an institution for the care of the sick, and on or about the first day of September next, will re-open them as an academy or college.

This change was decided upon at a joint meeting of the stockholders of the Sanitarium company and a delegated committee from the General Conference of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, held at the Sanitarium on Tuesday afternoon and evening.

The decision was unanimous, and the Sanitarium will close its doors at the early date named, in order to give plenty of time to make all the changes and additions necessary for the carrying on of a large educational institution.

This will be, practically, a Mt. Vernon College. The buildings are in Morris township, but only a short distance from the corporation line, and therefore Mt. Vernon ought to give the institution her hearty support and best words. Not Mt. Vernon only, but indeed the whole county, which will be benefited by the presence of such a seat of learning as the Seventh-day Adventists propose to make of this.

President Gilmore informs the Republican that they have already assurances and pledges which make it safe for them to say that they will open their first term with not less than two hundred students. Their district embraces Ohio and the larger portion of the two Virginias, and the enterprise is backed by the denomination in Ohio, which numbers nearly sixty churches. Our citizens are well acquainted with the excellent character and reputation of these people, and will give them a hearty welcome.

The Seventh-day Adventists are opening a new sanitarium at 28 College Place, Chicago, which will soon be ready for business; but as the Mt. Vernon Sanitarium will close for alteration before that is ready, the patients here, and many of the Sanitarium family, will be taken to the Sanitarium at Battle Creek, Mich., in a special train, about May 1, and free tickets will be furnished all patients and nurses who may wish to go at that time. As soon as this Sanitarium is vacated, all the furniture and appliances not needed for the school will be taken to Chicago.

There are a great many details yet to be arranged, and the Republican will from time to time put its readers in possession of such information as will interest them regarding the progress of the enterprise. It may be well to state here, that while the College will be under the influence and control of the Seventh-day Adventists, its doors will be open to acceptable youths of any denomination, the object of its promoters being to make it a first-class seat of learning, and they hope to win for it a name and reputation equal to any.

REPORTS WANTED.

I AM a reader of the REVIEW, and am always anxious to get the latest copy of the paper. I turn first to the department headed "Progress of the Cause." I first glance to see what States are represented. I see Kansas, Wisconsin, South Carolina, Michigan, New York, etc., etc. But Tennessee is scarcely ever found in this department.

There are many readers of the REVIEW scattered over the State of Tennessee, and out of the State, who would be glad to hear of the good done in Tennessee. But nothing is found except an occasional letter from brother Kilgore, when passing through. There are many active in the cause who are capable of giving us good news. If anything is being done in Tennessee for the cause of the truth, I hope some one will take time to tell us.

Special Notices.

OHIO STATE MEETING.

THIS meeting will be held at Yellow Springs, Ohio, May 22-29. Elder Loughborough, the director of the district, will be with us during the entire meeting. The annual Auditing Committee meets at this time; hence it is important that all laborers make out, and forward, their annual reports to the Conference secretary before this time. Plans for the summer campaign will be made during this meeting; therefore it is important for those knowing of good openings for tent, or other meetings, to write me at once, giving facts and particulars that will enable the committee to act intelligently in distributing the laborers.

As this is the first general meeting held in this part of the State for some time, we hope the brethren in the immediate vicinity will plan to avail themselves of this opportunity to enjoy the rich blessing the Lord has in store for us at this time. All the laborers in the State are expected to attend this meeting, as matters of importance will come up for consideration, in which all are expected to bear a part.

GEO. A. IRWIN.

ALBUNA DEDICATION.

THE dedication of the first church building in Ontario will take place in connection with the general meeting to be held at Albuna, Essex Co., May 24-28, 1893. This company extends a general invitation to all Sabbath-keepers in the province to be present, also such as can attend from the States. This being the first gathering of this kind for this province, it is very important that there should be a full attendance of all the Seventh-day Adventists in Ontario. At that time we expect a church will be organized, and opportunity given for baptism.

Those from the East will leave the Michigan Central railway at Blytheswood, situated on a branch of this road, and will be met at this station by brother George Bailey, if they will notify him by card. Those coming from the West leave the train at Ruscomb Station, and inquire for John McCanley, who lives near by. It will be well to bring bedding. Elders I. H. Evans, J. Fargo, H. M. Kenyon, and perhaps others will be present.

A SPECIAL MEDICAL MISSIONARY COURSE.

A COMPLETELY equipped medical missionary must necessarily be a physician; but there are various lines of medical missionary work which include not only the work of a missionary physician, but also that of a missionary nurse, and which might be termed the medical evangelistic work, since there is a gospel of health by good living as well as a mission of mercy for the relief of the suffering.

The manifest interest in the appreciation of the value of medical work as a gospel agent, and of the needs of practical instruction in health principles and the care of the sick, has created a desire on the part of many, especially those who are preparing to enter upon medical work in foreign lands, to obtain instruction at the Sanitarium. For the accommodation of such, the managers of the Sanitarium Medical Missionary Training School have decided to begin about the 1st of July next a special course of instruction for the benefit of those who have given themselves to missionary work, and who are desirous of obtaining the necessary knowledge of the missionary nurse in as short a time as possible. This course will include substantially the same instruction which is given in the first two years of the Nurses' Training Course of the Sanitarium, and will be thoroughly practical in character, besides some other instruction. The conditions are as follows:—

1. None will be received except those who are recommended by the General Conference Committee, the Foreign Missionary Board, or the Trustees of the Seventh-day Adventist Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association.

2. One hundred dollars will be charged for board for fifty weeks.

3. Tuition will be free, but each student will be expected to be engaged five hours daily in practical medical work, in order to gain the necessary medical experience.

Students will require the greater part of the remainder of the time for study. Those who have time to do extra work will be paid according to the value of their services, and thus be given an opportunity to earn something toward their expenses.

Those who wish to pay their board in work while taking this course will be given an opportunity to do so, but such will require two years' time for the completion of the work, instead of one. The purpose of organizing this special course is to give an opportunity for those who have calls to foreign fields, or whose time is, for other reasons, necessarily limited, an opportunity to obtain a good practical knowledge of hygiene, and an acquaintance with practical nursing, in as short a space of time as possible.

PENNSYLVANIA CAMP-MEETING.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE: Our annual camp-meeting for 1893 has been appointed, as you will see by the REVIEW, from June 6-13, to be preceded by a workers' meeting from May 30 to June 6. After careful consideration, we have decided to hold our meeting at Williamsport. This place will be most convenient, and most central for our people from all parts of our Conference. It is on the line of the Philadelphia, Erie, & Northern Central, and Philadelphia & Reading R. R.

As our canvassers' school is to be held at the same place, from May 1-30, we shall expect to have our camp in readiness to begin our workers' meeting on time. It is intended that the time of our workers' meeting will be used in attending to the business of the Conference, and studying each branch of the message, such as religious liberty, which is the gospel itself, and also tract society, Sabbath-school, and health and temperance work.

All the laborers of our Conference are expected to be present at the beginning of our workers' meeting. We also request all of our brethren and sisters in our Conference who can possibly do so, to be present during this time and also all through the meeting. Brethren, this will be the most important meeting ever held in our Conference. And as we see new life springing up and taking fast hold of all Satan's agencies in our State, let us awake, come together, and help devise methods and plans, that the work of the Lord may be carried on more successfully. Come praying that the blessing of God may be with us. We have the promise of good help for our meeting. Elders A. T. Jones, I. D. Van Horn, and other good help will be present. All who are desiring to rent tents should send in their orders at once, giving size of tents desired. Send to me at Corydon, Pa. Other instructions will be given in regard to railroad rates and situation of grounds.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

LESSON VII.—SIGNS OF HIS COMING NEAR.

(Sabbath, May 13.)

1. REVIEW questions:—

- (a.) Who are called children of light? Why?
 - (b.) What have we learned about prophecy and its interpretation?
 - (c.) Give proof that Christ spoke through the prophets.
 - (d.) How definite are the prophecies as to time concerning the second coming of Christ?
2. Where did Jesus say there would be signs? Luke 21: 25.
 3. What signs did Jesus say would be seen in the sun, moon, and stars? Matt. 24: 29.
 4. When did he say the sun would be darkened? Verse 29; Mark 13: 24.
 5. What is said of the character of this tribulation? Matt. 24: 21.
 6. What other great event did Jesus say would precede the darkening of the sun? Rev. 6: 12.
 7. What is connected with the great tribulation that helps us to locate it? (See note 1.)
 8. What persecution of the past will fulfill these specifications? (See note 2.)
 9. When would "the days" of the great persecution close? (See note 3.)
 10. How does Mark speak of the tribulation and the days? Mark 13: 24.
 11. Which closes first, the "tribulation" or "days"?
 12. What time did the tribulation cease? (See note 4.)
 13. Then between what two dates would the darkening have to come to be a sign? Ans.—Between 1776 and 1798.
 14. Was the sun darkened at this time? (See note 5.)
 15. Give a description of the dark day of 1780. (See note 5.)
 16. What great earthquake was felt prior to 1780? Ans.—

The Lisbon earthquake, in 1755. (See "Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation," chapter 6.)

17. When was the sign in the moon fulfilled? (See note 6.)

18. What did Jesus exhort his people to do when they saw these things begin to come to pass? Luke 21:28.

NOTES.

1. There have been a great many tribulations through which God's people have had to pass. If the Saviour had only spoken of a tribulation, we should have been at a loss to know which one he meant. But he connects with it three specifications that locate it beyond a doubt; first, it is a great tribulation; second, there never was one like it before, nor ever will be another like it again; third, there is a certain time called "days" allotted to it.

2. There is one persecution, and only one, that meets the demands of the Saviour's words, and that is found in the papal persecution, from A. D. 538 to 1798. It was great in extent and severity. There never was a time when so many of God's people sealed their testimony with their blood. About fifty million people suffered martyrdom at the hands of this power. According to other prophecies, it was to have authority over the saints for "time and times and the dividing of times" (Dan. 7:25; Rev. 12:14); twelve hundred and sixty days (Rev. 12:6); or forty-two months (Rev. 13:5), which literally signifies twelve hundred and sixty years. (See "Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation.")

3. The days began with the subjection of the Ostrogoths in A. D. 538, and, continuing twelve hundred and sixty years, would close A. D. 1798, when the papacy as a persecutor was overthrown.

4. The empress of Austria was the first European ruler to issue an edict of tolerance to Christianity, which took place in A. D. 1776. Owing to the work of the reformers, persecution ceased in the other States about the same time.

5. "In the month of May, 1780, there was a terrific dark day in New England, 'when all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived, 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment-day was at hand; and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man, who spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude."—American Tract Society, Tract No. 379, Life of Edward Lee. "Candles were lighted in many houses, birds were silent and disappeared, fowls retired to roost. It was the general opinion that the day of judgment was at hand."—President Dwight, in Connecticut Historical Collection.

6. The evening that followed the dark day which should have had the light of a full moon, was shrouded in inky darkness. In the latter part of the night, the moon was visible, but had the appearance of blood. (See Rev. 6:12.)

News of the Week.

FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 29, 1893.

DOMESTIC.

—The heavy rains in the Northwest, melting the late heavy fall of snow there, has raised the rivers, and many lowland farms are under water.

—The Michigan crop report for April shows that wheat in this State is not promising, owing to a lack of rain, but that the prospect for fruit is good.

—Storms on the Great Lakes were very severe April 19 and 20. There was much damage to shipping on Lakes Huron and Ontario; and considerable loss of life.

—Robert T. Lincoln, American Minister to England, sailed for the United States, April 22, leaving Secretary White in charge of the legation until Mr. Bayard's arrival.

—The famous Liberty Bell was removed from Philadelphia, April 24, preparatory to its removal to Chicago. It will be taken on a special train, and the mayor of Philadelphia will accompany it.

—A cyclone of almost unprecedented severity visited Oklahoma Ter., April 26. About seventy-five persons were killed, and 200 were injured. Thirty coffins were furnished by one undertaker at Norman.

—The new extradition treaty between the United States and Russia has been ratified by the czar, and by the United States Senate, and now only waits the proclamation of President Cleveland to complete it.

—It is announced semi-officially by the State department that the agreements with Brazil, and with Spain for Cuba and Porto Rico, are to be abrogated on the ground that the reciprocity arrangements practically have been a failure.

—The students in Amherst College, Massachusetts, are in rebellion against the rule making attendance on religious services compulsory. A series of resolutions expressing their minds upon this subject have been presented by them to the faculty of the College.

—A statue of Ericsson, the inventor of the "Monitor," was unveiled in Battery Park, New York City, April 27, with appropriate ceremonies. The Swedish people of New York took a prominent part in the ceremonies. The "Miantonomah" thundered forth a salute as the statue was unveiled.

—The great Krupp cannon, now at Chicago, has been presented to the city of Chicago by the maker. A fort covering five acres will be built, and the great gun mounted as soon as the fair is over. It will protect the whole lake front of the city from any vessels that may be sent against it.

—The demand for gold to ship to foreign countries has so drawn upon the government treasury, that the $100,000,000 free gold in the treasury has been treasured upon by $3,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury secured enough gold from other sources to make up the deficit, and refused to issue bonds, at which the Wall street bankers are very angry.

—The fleet assembled in Hampton Roads, comprising thirty-nine vessels, and representing the governments of England, France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Russia, Holland, Brazil, The Argentine Confederation, and the United States, sailed from the Roads for New York City, April 24, where they arrived the following day. No fleet of such power and representing so many nations was ever before seen.

FOREIGN.

—Preparations have been made by the Catholics of Germany to erect a monument to the late Herr Windthorst, in his native town of Meppen.

—A man suspected of having an intention of murdering Mrs. Gladstone, was arrested by the police, April 27. He resisted arrest, and fired at the officer. He is believed to be insane over the question of home rule.

—Ninety-six soldiers of the Provisional government of Hawaii showed decided symptoms of being poisoned, April 11. It is believed to have been done by some adherent to the queen's party. None of the men died.

—The refusal of King Oscar, of Sweden and Norway, to grant to Norway her own consular service, is exceedingly offensive to the latter country, and the Norwegian papers attack the king savagely for pursuing such a policy.

—The Chinese government is considerably stirred by the enforcement of the Exclusion bill in regard to the Chinese in the United States. It is feared that the Chinese will retaliate by driving the American missionaries out of China.

—There is great danger of a conflict between the Orangemen and the Nationalists at Belfast, Ireland. Both parties are thoroughly armed and prepared for battle. Nothing but the presence of the military, which is kept between the two rival factions, prevents bloodshed.

—The Russian Hebrew Committee in London has advice from St. Petersburg that the Minister of the Interior has ordered the governors of Livonia and Courland to expel all Hebrews from these two provinces before next Nov. 1. More than eighty thousand Hebrews will be expelled under this order.

—An earnest appeal has been sent out to the governments of Europe by the Belgian Anti-slavery Society, asking that diplomatic action be taken to stop the growing supply of arms to the Arab slave-hunters in Africa. The society says that it has conclusive proof that both England and Germany are tolerating this traffic.

—The heavy taxes imposed by the Catholic Church upon all the people of Ecuador is at last becoming intolerable, even to that long-suffering and priest-ridden country. The people are growing rebellious, and threaten to do as many other South American countries have done—throw the oppressive church overboard and run their own business.

—The Australian Joint Stock bank has failed, with liabilities amounting to $65,000,000. The deposits amount to nearly $55,000,000. The bank has 200 branches in Australia. Within a month three great Australian banks have failed, with liabilities aggregating nearly $150,000,000. The effect will be disastrous to the business welfare of the colony.

RELIGIOUS.

—The Canada Presbyterian General Assembly will be held this year at Bradford, Ont., during the second and third weeks of June.

—Catholic papers complain that ex-President Harrison was the only civilized ruler in the world who failed to send a letter of congratulations and a present to Pope Leo XIII., on the occasion of his jubilee.

—Dr. Talmage's church is liable to lose its church building, the Brooklyn Tabernacle. The debts on the church are so great that they fear it will have to be sold. If it is sold, it will probably be used for a theater.

—The Roman Catholic missionary at Pedong, on the Indian border of Thibet, is translating the Gospel of John into Thibetan. This he proposes to have printed and sent into Thibet by the traders who pass that way.

—The question as to whether the doctrine of a future probation should be approved or not, was lately submitted to the American Board of Foreign missions. The majority of the members reported themselves as opposed to the doctrine.

—The pope has ordered that prayers for rain be offered by Catholics throughout Italy. Rain has not fallen for two months. In other countries of southern Europe the drouth has been hardly less persistent. In southern Russia the crops have sustained great damage.

—Another movement for the recovery of the Holy Sepulcher, is being inaugurated by the Catholic Church. It is not an armed crusade, but an effort to obtain by peaceable purchase the exclusive right to this historic spot. The society which is being organized for this purpose is called the Army of the Holy Cross.

SOUTH DAKOTA CAMP-MEETING.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS: It has been decided to hold our annual camp-meeting at Madison, So. Dak., June 21-28, preceded by a workers' meeting, beginning the morning of June 14. Arrangements are being made to have the preparation of the camp so far completed before the workers' meeting begins, that at least four religious services may be held daily during this preliminary meeting.

Able help for this meeting is to be furnished by the General Conference, so you see that during the first week much valuable instruction and help will be given, as well as at the regular camp-meeting. During the regular meeting, efficient laborers are promised in the German, Scandinavian, and English languages.

The usual accommodations will be provided, including a provision and dining tent, where food may be secured at very reasonable rates.

Teams will meet all trains, and convey passengers and baggage to and from the grounds, free of charge.

We expect the usual reduction of fare over the different lines of railroads of the State, but further particulars in regard to this matter will be given later. Tents will be pitched on the ground for all who attend, so none need order tents this year; but come right along, and select your tent when you reach the camp.

Determine at once to come to this most important of camp-meetings ever held in Dakota. Last year we all agreed that we had a most precious meeting, but now we are one year nearer the perfect day, one year nearer the perils that are to try men's souls. How much we need more of God's blessing for the growing responsibilities of the flying moments that carry us so rapidly toward the judgment.

Since our last camp-meeting, we have had some drops, yes, even showers of the latter rain; but may we not confidently look for much greater blessing at our annual feast of 1893? Not only do we earnestly beseech you all to be diligent in arranging your business so as to attend this meeting, but what is more important, we sincerely hope that you will each attend to your spiritual preparation by an earnest heart searching and seeking after God, that you may not only bring light with you for others, but that you may be prepared for the reception of the light that God will reveal at this time.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

LESSON VIII.—SIGNS OF THE NEARNESS OF HIS COMING.

(Sabbath, May 20.)

1. REVIEW questions:—

(a.) What sign was there to be in the sun and in the moon?

(b.) Give an account of its fulfillment.

(c.) How can you prove that the dark day of 1780 is the one referred to in the prophecy?

2. What sign was to appear in the stars? Matt. 24: 29.

3. What is said of the manner of their fall? Rev. 6: 13.

4. Was it the real planetary stars that fell? (See note 1.)

5. In what marked way was this prophecy fulfilled? (See note 2.)

6. Have there not been many meteoric showers? (See note 3.)

7. Then how can we know that the one of 1833 is the one referred to by our Saviour? (See note 3.)

8. What signs were to follow the falling of the stars? Luke 21: 25, 26.

9. Have the nations of the earth been particularly distressed since 1833? (See note 4.)

10. What marked disturbance of the seas has been witnessed in the last sixty years? (See note 5.)

11. What effect do all these things have upon the people? Verse 26.

12. At this same time what can be said of the mental improvement of the people? Dan. 12: 4.

13. What do noted men say of the increase of knowledge in this century? (See note 6.)

14. Name some of the principal inventions since 1833. (See note 7.)

15. What are we to know when we see all of these things? Luke 21: 31.

16. How near? Matt. 24: 33, margin.

17. What expression is used that shows the coming of the Lord very near? Luke 21: 32. (See note 8.)

18. Then what may we expect within the present generation? Rev. 6: 14; Matt. 24: 30.

19. What will he do when he appears? Matt. 24: 31.

NOTES.

1. "This language of the prophet (Rev. 6: 13) has always been received as metaphorical. Yesterday it was literally fulfilled. The ancients understood by 'aster' in Greek and 'stella' in Latin the smaller lights of heaven. The refinement of modern astronomy has made the distinction between stars of heaven and meteors of heaven. Therefore, the idea of the prophet as it is expressed in the original Greek, was literally fulfilled in the phenomena of yesterday."—Henry Dana Ward, in Journal of Commerce, Nov. 14, 1833.

2. "The meteoric phenomenon which occurred on the morning of the 13th of November last, was of so extraordinary and interesting a character as to be entitled to more than a mere passing notice. . . . The lively and graphic descriptions which have appeared in various public journals do not exceed the reality. No language, indeed, can come up to the splendor of that magnificent display, and I hesitate not to say that no one who did not witness it can form an adequate conception of its glory. It seemed as if the whole starry heavens had congregated at the point near the zenith, and were simultaneously shooting forth, with the velocity of lightning, to every part of the horizon, and yet they were not exhausted, thousands swiftly following in the track of thousands, as if created for the occasion."—Christian Advocate and Journal, Dec. 13, 1833.

3. There is a record of not less than sixteen star showers between 902 and 1868 A. D. None of those previous to 1780 could be the one referred to by the Saviour. Since that date we have a record of six of these showers that have been noticed in different parts of the world. The skeptic may ask, "How can you know which of these is the fulfillment of the prophecy?" This is easily determined by reading Rev. 6: 13. It is the one in which the stars fall as untimely figs. This was true only of the one in 1833. The astronomers speak of the shower of 1833 as the most important one that has yet been seen.

4. We have a record of more disastrous storms and fires, extraordinary sights in the heavens, and famines and pestilences within the last half century than has ever been seen in the same length of time before. There may have been times when some one of these may have been greater, but, taking the combination, it can be truly said that there has never yet been a half century that contained so many destructive agencies which were at work at the same time to bring distress upon the earth. (See "Facts for the Times," pp. 134-136.)

5. "The tidal disturbances are the most remarkable and extensive of which there is any record. It is said their velocity was about one thousand miles an hour. Both the great ocean waters of the Atlantic and Pacific have been agitated in their whole extent. We mention in particular the tidal waves at St. Thomas and all the neighboring islands, which were full fifty feet in height. . . . It is said by those who have witnessed these waves that the ocean's roar is exceedingly frightful."—New York Tribune, of Nov. 12, 1868. (See "Facts for the Times," pp. 149, 150.)

6. "In the education of the intellect, mankind has made great strides since the birth of this century. Whether we regard the number taught or the knowledge imparted, the progress made has been marvelous."—Horace Greeley.

7. Reaper and mower, 1833; telegraph, electrotype, and phonography, 1837; photography, 1839; electric light and sewing machine, 1846; submarine cable, 1851; telephone, 1876; phonograph, 1877; audiphone, 1881.

8. From the record in Matthew 24, it might be inferred that the period spoken of as "this generation" might begin with the darkening of the sun; but when we compare this with the record of Luke 21, we see that the generation must begin later than the darkening of the sun. He mentions the sun, moon, and stars, then adds, "And upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." Then he says, "When ye see these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." The beginning of the signs was seen in the sun, moon, and it may be the falling of the stars. After speaking of the figure, he says: "So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

News of the Week.

FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 6, 1893.

DOMESTIC.

—A Catholic has been elected governor of Missouri, for the first time in the history of that State.

—A home for aged Jews was dedicated at Chicago, April 30. The cost of the building was $75,000.

—The Spanish vessels which took part in the naval parade at Hampton Roads and at New York, have sailed to Cuba.

—After July 1 the State of South Carolina takes control of the liquor business of that State, and will appoint agents for its sale.

—There is a great rush of immigrants to this country from Europe this spring. Ten thousand Italians sailed from Marseilles, France, on eleven steamships, a few days since. There are also 13,000 immigrants from northern Europe ready to sail from Bremen.

—As a result of the recent hazing at Delaware, Ohio, the Ohio House of Representatives, by a vote of sixty-one to two, passed a bill prohibiting hazing, and making the penalty a fine of from $10 to $100, and an imprisonment of from thirty days to one year.

—The World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago was formally opened to the public, May 1. President Cleveland touched the button, Mr. Milburn, the blind chaplain of the Senate, offered prayer, and the mud and the 400,000 people on the Fair ground did the rest.

—Ex-President Harrison will begin his course of lectures on international law at the Stanford University, California, next October, when the new school of law will be opened. Besides general instruction in law, the course includes training in branches that will fit students for the public service.

—The $200,000 appropriated by Congress for the entertainment of the foreign fleet now in United States waters having been all expended, prominent railroad men are arranging a special excursion of the officers of the foreign ships to Chicago and return to New York City.

—General Castelar, the Spanish premier, and noted Liberal, has written an address to the people of the United States, in recognition of the opening of the World's Fair, in which he predicts great progress among all the nations of the earth, and the final formation of the "United States" of our planet.

—The Russian consul general at New York City has refused to sign the passport of an American lady who desires to visit Russia, because she is a Jewess. Much indignation is naturally felt by the Jewish citizens of the United States at this unjust discrimination, and the case will be presented before the United States Secretary of State.

—At the British Woman's Temperance Association, which met in London, May 3, Lady Somerset was elected president. Before the election, the ladies indulged in many bitter speeches against each other, much after the fashion of their masculine brothers. Upon the announcement of Lady Somerset's election, the minority, who were opposed to her, immediately left the house.

—Some of the students in the Wesleyan University at Delaware, Ohio, lately committed most brutal outrages on other students. They were overpowered, and their faces so burned by the application of nitrate of silver as to disfigure some of them for life. Girls attending a ladies' seminary in the same town committed the same kind of outrage on other girls the same night. The object was to prevent their attending class receptions and entertainments. Suits with damages aggregating $100,000 have grown out of the affair.

FOREIGN.

—Nearly one hundred newspapers were lately suppressed in Mexico in one week, because of their opposition to President Diaz.

—The rebellion in the Province of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, has not yet been put down. A bloody battle has lately been fought there. Eight hundred were killed. Both sides claim the victory.

—May 1, known now as Labor Day, passed quietly in all the cities of Europe, with the exception of Marseilles, France. In that city a mob attacked the police, who finally succeeded in dispersing them.

—A revolution has been started against President Sacasa, of Nicaragua. It is reported that several skirmishes have been fought in Granada and Masaya. Telegraph communication with the interior of Nicaragua is interrupted, but reports of serious trouble may be expected.

—Official reports show that the heights of Quebec are crumbling. The rampart wall facing the Parliament buildings has fallen, and reveals cracks and fissures in the solid rock, such as indicate that large sections of Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father? Believeest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself: but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works." John 14:8-10. His whole ministry of three and a half years, which was just closing, was for the express purpose of showing the Father to the world; to reveal God in such a manner to the human family, fallen and sinful, might comprehend him; and Jesus Christ revealed the Father not simply in his words, but his life was a revelation of God's life. When he healed the sick, it was but showing forth the character of the great Healer. When he was lifting up those who had fallen down, he was showing forth the willingness of God to be the mighty helper. That was the way Christ was revealing to the world the character of God. One purpose of his mission was to reveal God to the world in human flesh, that humanity might have correct idea of the true character of God the Father.

Christ came as the outflowing of the love of God. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son." It was because God loved the world that he gave Christ to die. The purpose of his mission was that he might reveal to humanity God's idea concerning humanity—not simply that he might reveal God, but that he might reveal the image of God, as God intended it should be revealed in man. So Jesus Christ, the Christ of Judea, was the ideal man; he was our example of what man should be. In the beginning God said, "Let us make man in our image," and Jesus Christ was the one through whom this was carried out; for without him was not anything made that was made." Jesus Christ was the agent of God in creating the nature of man, which he himself afterward to bear in this world.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

44.—In 1 Thess. 4:16, 17 Paul speaks of the coming of the Lord, of the resurrection "of the dead in Christ," and of the taking up of the living; but what comes of the living wicked? C. R. B.

See 2 Thess. 2:7-10 and 3:8.

45.—If God is not the God of the dead, but of the living only (Matt. 22:32), and as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob died many years ago, does it not follow that they have an existence in another state? J. R. W.

No; we think not. By reading the preceding verses it will be seen that the resurrection of the dead was the subject in question; and Jesus was proving out of the Pentateuch, in which the Sadducees believed, though they rejected most of the Old Testament, the resurrection, which they denied. If God is still the God of Abraham, it shows that Abraham will have a resurrection. This was the argument, otherwise it would seem to have no force.

46.—(1) How long was Noah building the ark? (2) That would have been the result had Esau instead of Jacob received the blessing from Isaac? S. S. L.

I am not aware of any definite information. Noah preached for one hundred and twenty years. See Gen. 6:3, and "Patriarchs and Prophets," p. 96. Peter writes that Noah preached "while the ark was a preparing."

1 Peter 3:19, 20. It would seem appropriate that while the invitations of mercy were being held out, the means of salvation should also be preparing. (2) All through those patriarchal days we are struck by the value that was attached to the father's blessing. This blessing was conferred by the laying on of the hands. Gen. 48:13-19. This custom was transmitted to the gospel church. By the apostles the Holy Spirit was conferred by the laying on of the hands. By this means they were capable of transferring the blessing which they had received and enjoyed. It is probable that this was the case in patriarchal days. It rested with the father, as the priest of his own house, to place upon the son of his choice the special blessings that God had vouchsafed him. That the value of this blessing was not an imaginary thing, the bitter tears and lamentations of Esau abundantly testify. But in the case under question, I suppose that had Rebecca and Jacob trusted the matter to God, he would have seen that the blessing was placed where it belonged, on Jacob, and the long years of separation and servitude need not have been endured, and Esau would have suffered no wrong. It is thus, by taking the work out of God's hands, that some of our most grievous mistakes are made. The case presented in the question is not supposable; or if it be so, we cannot tell how things would have been if they were not as they are.

47.—Where did the twelve tribes originate? how did they preserve their tribal relations? and how long did they continue? E. P.

The best answer to these questions is to be found in a study of the historical books of the Old Testament. Briefly, the tribes originated with the sons of Jacob. Genesis 46. The land of Canaan was parceled out to the tribes, and their boundaries clearly defined. See the book of Joshua. These distinctions seem to have been well preserved until the division of the kingdom in the time of Rehoboam. 1 Kings 12. After that the principal distinction was between Judah and Israel. The first embraced the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and the second the other ten tribes. The Jews are the descendants of the former, while the latter became extinct as a separate people during wars and captivities with Assyria.

48.—(1) Does the expression, "And there was no more sea" (Rev. 21:1) mean that there will not be any bodies of water called seas in the new earth? (2) To whom does the Lord refer in Job 38:2, "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" to himself, Job, or Elihu? F. S.

(1) It is not unreasonable to suppose that the meaning of the expression is that the vast wastes of water which now cover three fourths of the earth will be no more. There will be rivers and streams there (Rev. 22:1; Isa. 35:6), and we may believe there will be pleasant lakes, but no oceans. It is probable that these were produced at the time of the flood. (2) To Job, undoubtedly. The Lord was answering Job's arguments; but he had no reproof for Elihu.

49.—(1) Please explain Rev. 9:15 through the REVIEW, as several are interested. It appears to me that this is a prophecy of time. (2) Please explain Prov. 26:4, 5.

(1) You are right. The prophecy relates to the time of the supremacy of the Ottoman empire, and is one of great interest and value. But in this place we could hardly give space for its exposition, with the attendant facts. See "Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation," page 480 and onward. (2) It is difficult to know how to treat people who act foolishly, for if you answer them according to their folly, you make a fool of yourself; and if you answer them in wisdom, they cannot comprehend your meaning, and therefore consider their arguments unanswerable. Either way, there is difficulty. These are maxims, rather than commands. Solomon was not in favor of answering a fool, but of putting a rod on his back. Verse 3.

50.—Please explain Num. 28:18: "In the first day shall be an holy convocation; ye shall do no manner of servile work therein." A. M. H.

Reference is made to the first day of the feast, not the first day of the week. See verses 24 and 25. These were annual sabbaths. Lev. 23:24-39.

51.—Please harmonize Matt. 1:16 with Luke 3:23. An infidel here says it cannot be done. He wants an answer. * * *

A comparison of the two genealogies of Christ will show that they separate after David. Matthew gives David, Solomon, Rehoboam, etc.; and Luke gives David, Nathan, Mattatha, etc. They have no further agreement until they reach Joseph, the "supposed" father of Christ. Matthew follows the line of Joseph, and Luke follows that of Mary, both together showing that Christ was of the seed of David by a double line of descent. Joseph's name is inserted in the place of Mary's by Luke because the Hebrews never permitted women to enter their genealogical reckonings. When a family ended with a daughter, her husband's name was inserted instead of hers.

52.—G. H. O. wishes the REVIEW to notice some marked paragraphs of a report of one of Ingersoll's lectures, for the benefit of several inquirers. They are in substance as follows: (1) "The Bible says, After the flood some seventy people went into Egypt, and in fifteen years they had increased to 4,000,000. It says that there were 600,000 men of war. (2) We read that David built a temple forty-five feet high, with a porch one hundred and eighty feet high. Probably the architect was inspired. (3) Matthew says that Christ was born when Herod was king, and Luke says that it was when Cyrenius was governor; but according to Greek history and the annals of Rome, Cyrenius was not made governor until ten years after Herod was dead."

Following up Robert Ingersoll, or any other railer against the truth, is not a profitable business. It is like following a crane, who tempts you into a swamp. He is at home in the muck and mud, while you will soon get stuck. However, these so-called criticisms are sometimes thrown into our faces in a way that it is difficult not to notice them. To criticize is one of the easiest things in the world. While the Lord has provided abundant grounds for faith, he has left sufficient room for doubt to those who choose it.

(1) This is one of Ingersoll's mistakes. The children of Israel were in Egypt at least two hundred and fifteen years. The Bible does not give their number at the exode. The length of life was greater then than now. It is true that the result shows an unusual increase, and the Bible claims that it was so. Ex. 1:7. But reckoning their number at 3,000,000, the ratio of increase would be by no means impossible, even if there were no miraculous intervention. (2) What of it? The portico, or façade, of the temple rose high above the main part of the building—a mode of architecture not uncommon then, nor unknown now. All the representations of the temple show it that way. (3) Various methods of explaining this apparent difficulty have been employed by commentators. One of these, which does not seem improbable, is that instead of the Greek word πρώτη, translated "first," we should have the two words πρὸ τῆς, in which case it would read: "This taxing was made before that when Cyrenius was governor of Syria." But to my mind it is wholly unnecessary to twist the record to accommodate our imperfect understanding of the secular history of those days. It is not at all improbable that Cyrenius did occupy some place of authority before he was formally appointed governor. One thing is certain; we cannot afford to throw away the great weight of evidence we have in favor of the inspiration of the Bible because such men as Ingersoll can throw dust on some obscure points like the above.

53.—Would the following be a correct proposition?—God told Noah that the days of man should be one hundred and twenty years. Christ says, "This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled." The generation of Noah was one hundred and twenty years. From the dark day in 1780 to 1900 is the same period. This would bring the end in 1900. What do you think of it? A. M.

I think it is unnecessary speculation, not sustained by the circumstances. "This generation" means the people living at the time referred to.

54.—(1) Please explain 1 Cor. 1:18, last clause. Can we say we are saved to-day? (2) Would it be right for me to cook pork for my husband, who is not a Christian?

(1) The salvation provided by Christ is a present salvation. Because some people make an extreme of that grand truth, we should not take the opposite extreme. A man rescued in mid ocean is saved if he abide in the ship, though of course he can jump overboard. Christ rescues, cleanses, saves, those who come to him. (2) Your best way will be to learn to prepare more healthful food in such a good and attractive shape that your husband will not care for swine. But if he requires it, you do not do wrong in heeding his wishes. Unbelieving husbands are to be won by the godly deportment (conversation) of their Christian wives, rather than exasperated by refusals to comply with what are to them, at least, reasonable requirements.

55.—Please harmonize John 14:19 and Rev. 1:7. One says, "The world seeth me no more," and the other says, "Every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him." J. D. B.

The principal difficulty in this case, as in many others, is in not taking the Bible in its evident meaning, but putting a strained, unnatural meaning in its place. Jesus says, "Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more." That is, he was going to heaven, where they could not see him. And there is no occasion for putting this statement into opposition with one concerning his second coming, when all will see him. The world had seen him, and had an opportunity to believe in him, but he was now soon to go away.

56.—Is it wrong for a Seventh-day Adventist to hold a place in a village treasurer's office? A. J. B.

It would not be inconsistent for a Christian to work for a town treasurer. The question of holding an elective office is another thing, and is frequently so beset with worldly entanglements as to make it difficult to maintain an earnest, Christian life. I do not hold that it is in itself sinful to hold an official position; but the present state of public affairs is inconsistent with pure and undefiled religion, and the drift is making it more and more so.

57.—Please harmonize the apparent contradiction found in Acts 9:7 and 22:9. S. W. S.

It seems evident that those who were with Saul heard the sound, but it did not strike them as articulate speech. Once when God spoke to Christ, those who stood near said, "It thundered." So now; they heard the sound, but not the voice of speech. G. C. T.

"He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."—Ps. 126:6.

LIFE'S DECLINE.

BY W. W. NORTON.*
(Northfield, Minn.)

I HAVE this day completed my sixty-fourth circuit around the sun. I have journeyed far, but am now—

"Nearing the bound of life, Where burdens are laid down."

The outward man is failing,
Its strength of youth is gone;
Life's banner low is trailing,
By feeble hands scarce borne.
Late march is sadly tiring
To those o'ertasked ere noon;
Hark! sunset guns are firing,
And rest now cometh soon.

We thank thee, glorious Saviour,
Who called us by thy grace,
And trusted us with treasure,
And gave to us a place
To use for thee, our Master,
To work with thee, our Lord;
And then, toward disaster,
Became our guide and guard.

But as thou didst constrain us
Through love to work with thee,
Bear with us, and retain us,
Who didst our failures see;
For this we owe thee ever Adoring, grateful love,
Which we can pay thee never,
While endless ages move.

We give to thine own keeping
Our life's poor work, and pray
There may be some glad reaping,
Some fruit for thee, that day
When, waking from their slumber,
The dead to judgment come,
And thou as thine shalt number
All whom thy love hath won.

* It will interest some of our readers to know that the writer of these lines is a brother of the mother of Elder I. N. Williams, who is over eighty years of age.—Ed.

BURMA.

BURMA lies east of the Bay of Bengal, and covers a range of country stretching from the 10th to the 27th parallel of north latitude, a distance of nearly one thousand two hundred miles. It has a very extensive seaboard, and an area of 280,000 square miles; or, in other words, it has three and one-third times the area of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and a population not much more than one fifth as great. Its resources are great, and the country is developing very rapidly.

It is divided into two great divisions,—Upper and Lower Burma. As a rule, the country is undulating, and the soil very productive. It is well watered by numerous rivers, the largest of which is the Irawadi, navigable throughout the year for over nine hundred miles, and for purposes of commerce forming the great artery of the province. The internal commerce is extensive, and the foreign trade large and profitable. The commerce of Rangoon exceeds that of Madras. The principal exports are rice, teak timber, cutch, and india-rubber. Many of the tropical fruits are extensively grown. Cotton, tobacco, tea, coffee, and cinchona are produced in various parts of the province, and Indian corn, millet, peas, and sesamum are extensively grown in Upper Burma. A number of the useful and several of the precious metals are dug from the earth.

Though England has had commercial connection with Burma for more than two centuries, her first permanent connection dates from 1824, when the foolish king, who was a very cruel despot, declared war against Great Britain, and prepared golden chains to bind the governor-general of India; but a mere handful of British defeated his army of 60,000 men, and England took a large portion of his territory. In 1838 England took some more territory from the king of Burma, and about ten years ago, deposed the king, and all Burma became a British province.

The rapidly growing population—now more than eight million—is said to be composed of as many as forty-seven different races, which often mingle closely together in both town and country. The Burmese are by far the most numerous, and number 6,200,000. There are 500,000 natives of India, 40,000 Chinese, and 21,000 Europeans and Eurasians in Burma. The Burmese language is generally used, being the language of the courts, of commerce, and of literature. The Burmese are smaller in stature than the European races, yet they appear to be a hardy and robust people. They belong to a race which is considered to be intermediate between the Chinese and the Malay race. Their faces have an open, wide-awake expression, and not the sleepy eyes of the Chinaman. They are polite in their manner, and most of the men are able to read.

Buddhism is the prevailing religion, and the people are free from the fetters of caste which bind their neighbors across the Bay of Bengal; thus they are much happier socially than the people in India. The women, who are far better looking than the men, dress very neatly. They are great tobacco-smokers, and very independent; they usually carry the family purse. Very few of them know English.

This presents a difficulty in my work; but the time has come, and the work must be done. The hand of the Lord is in this work, and I am having fully as good success as I had in India or even better. I liked India as a missionary field, but I have rather fallen in love with Burma. I love to work for these people; they are so good in many respects. It is a saying among the Europeans that a Burman would divide his last morsel of food he had, if he saw a person in need, and I believe that there is a good deal of truth in it.

There are 121,000 professed Christians in Burma, making one sixty-sixth of the entire population Christian. A very large portion of these are from a tribe known as the Karens, who number 631,000. There is a tradition or belief among this people that salvation would be brought to them from the far west, and so large numbers of them readily received Christianity when it was brought to them by the missionaries, and these converts are said to be very good Christians. During the first seventy years of missionary work in Burma, but few converts were gained from the Burmese proper; but within the last decade a great change has come over them, and they are manifesting a very encouraging interest in Christianity. The spirit of God is working upon their hearts, and preparing them for the reception of the last message of mercy; and may God help us to reach the condition of the people in these far-away lands, and our duty toward them as it really is.

This nation stands with its doors wide open, and many of the people are pleading for the light. Now we have golden opportunities to spread the truth in this land, and they should be improved, for they will not last long. Soon a time of trouble, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, will burst upon us, and war, famine, distress, and perplexity will cut short the blessed privilege of rescuing souls. O let us arise and labor as never before! "For as the earth brings forth her bud, and as the garden causeth to spring forth things that are sown in it to spring forth, so shall the Lord God cause righteousness and peace to spring forth."

standing in the way of their children. How strange it is that parents who love their children, and who pray and toil and sacrifice for them, will entirely commit unto others the work of instructing them in the way of eternal life. The most powerful influences for good that can possibly be thrown around the youth are in the safeguard of home religious training. The idea should not be simply to acquire a knowledge of the words of truth, but each truth should be made practical to the daily life of each member of the family. There is power in the word of God to enable us to resist temptation. That power will be plainly manifest in the homes where his word is a frequent topic of conversation.

It is not always necessary to take unoccupied time for family study. While at work, at the dinner hour, or whenever opportunity offers, the points of the lesson may be spoken of.

"Whom shall he teach knowledge? and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? them that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts. For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little." Isa. 28:9, 10. "And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." Deut. 6:6, 7.

READING CIRCLE STUDY.

S. N. H.

THE books of Daniel and Revelation bear one characteristic peculiar to themselves,—their prophecies are consecutive. Anciently, instead of books, there were scrolls, so rolled together that a seal could be removed, and a portion unrolled without opening the remainder. A book of this description was taken to illustrate this line of prophecy. In unfolding the future, one period follows another, as the seals were broken one by one. The purity and the triumph of the gospel in the apostolic age are illustrated by the white horse which went forth conquering and to conquer. During the first thirty years after the gospel went to the Gentiles, every person, in every nation, kindred, tongue, and people, heard the gospel, and there were converts in all parts of the world. Rom. 1:8; Col. 1:5, 6, 23.

During the second century, Satan, through paganism, did his best to destroy the people of God. Nero lighted his gardens by burning the saints, who had been covered with pitch, or something of like nature. In the great Coliseum at Rome thousands of persons would assemble to see the saints—men, women, and even helpless babes—destroyed by wild beasts. Nearly all the apostles suffered persecution or martyrdom during the first and second seals. Rome at this time was a universal kingdom, and there was no safety for God's people on the earth. It continued thus until the beginning of the fourth century.

The red-horse period took peace from the earth, but during this time there were remarkable triumphs of the power of God. When Polycarp was asked to abjure his faith, he said, "Eighty and six years I have served the Lord, and now I can not deny him." The flame formed an arch over him while at the stake, and he was not burned. Finally his executioner thrust a spear into his body, thus ending his life, and the blood extinguished the fire. However, his body was afterward burned. Others spoke after their tongues had been removed. The church stood faultless during this period, as described in Rev. 2:8-11.

Persecution, martyrdom, and unpopularity in the world are the purifiers of the church. Satan signally failed in destroying God's people; for martyrs were the seed of the church.

In the period represented by the third seal, Satan changed his tactics, and emperors arose who favored the believers. Worldly policy came in. The Christian religion was weighed in the worldly balances; church and state were united. Worldly positions were offered the people of God. By compromise the Christian religion became popular. The hellish black banner of Satan was erected amid the professed people of God. This was far more dangerous to the purity of the church than persecution. It is illustrated by a black horse. But amid all this amalgamation with the world, God preserved his people, not suffering the oil and wine to be hurt.

The period of time covered by the first three churches and the first three seals is the same. It was during this time that the faith of the church became adulterated with error. What Satan could not accomplish by force he now accomplished by worldly policy. It was this spirit that taught Balak to overcome Israel. First, he led them to commit sin, and by it they were weakened. Num. 25:1-5.

The fourth seal opens the twelve hundred and sixty years of papal persecution. Here was a culmination of the development of the man of sin, the antichrist of 2 Thess. 2:2-8 and of 1 John 2:18, 19. It is variously estimated that from sixty to one hundred millions perished on account of their faith during this time. A little later John saw them under the altar, slain. They had not gone to heaven, for the altar upon which they sacrificed their lives, and under which their blood cried for vengeance, was upon the earth. As the world looks back upon this time of persecution, all now attribute to every one of them the white robe of Christ's righteousness.

The sixth seal opened with the great earthquake of 1755, when the city of Lisbon was destroyed, and nearly the whole world felt the shock. May 19, 1780, the sun was darkened and the moon turned to blood, and Nov. 13, 1833, the stars fell. When the signs began to be seen, the coming of the Lord was drawing near. When they were seen as signs, it was near, even at the door. This defines the generation in which Christ will come. Luke 21:25-32. This is the only text which shows that the signs in the heavens were to be consecutive.

Prophecy had marked out thirteen characteristics which were all fulfilled in these signs, as follows:—

1. Preceded by a great earthquake. Rev. 6:12.
2. Signs consecutive. Luke 21:25-32.
3. Sun black as sackcloth. Rev. 6:12.
4. Darkness to cover sun, moon, and stars. Joel 3:15.
5. Dark night to be with the dark day. Amos 5:8.
6. Darkness to begin in the morning. Isa. 13:10.
7. Darkest at noon. Amos 8:9.
8. To come in a clear day. Id.
9. Sun covered with a cloud. Eze. 32:7, 8.
10. Moon became as blood. Rev. 6:12.
11. Immediately after the tribulation. Matt. 24:29.
12. In the twelve hundred and sixty years, after the tribulation. Mark 13:24.
13. Stars to fall like unripe figs. Rev. 6:13.

The latest point we could fix for the generation to begin was after the signs had been preached as signs in 1844; and a person must be from ten to fifteen years of age to appreciate them. So at the present time we are at least from sixty-five to seventy years in the last generation. The next events are the scenes described in verses 14-17. It is the Lord's description of what is just before us. We can refer the reader to only a few other scriptures to be studied with these: Amos 8:11, 12; Zeph. 1:2-18; Hab. 3:3-18; Psalm 91; Isa. 33:13-16; Jer. 25:30-38. It is the day of God's wrath without mercy. It brings to view scenes that human language can not portray so that the mind can grasp its awfulness. Imagination usually overdraws things, but here it fails, as the terribleness of the scenes just before us exceeds the strongest imagination. Our only safety is to hide in God, and prepare to meet him who, to his people, will be the chiefest among ten thousand, the one altogether lovely and greatly to be admired.

QUESTIONS.

1. What is the significance of the book being sealed with seven seals, and of the Lamb opening them one by one? Who invited the prophet to behold the opening of the first seal?
2. What did the color of the horse indicate? What was the significance of the bow and the crown?
3. What period of time was covered by the first seal? How widely was the gospel preached during this period?
4. Who invited John to behold the second seal?
5. How much time was covered by the second seal? What condition of the church was indicated by the red horse? Who was given power to take peace from the earth? What was indicated by the sword given the rider?
6. How much time is included under the third seal? What condition of the church is indicated by the black horse, and the balances in the hand of the rider?
7. From what place does the prophet hear a voice? What is said? What do the oil and the wine represent?
8. Who take an especial interest in the opening of the seals, and invite John to behold the first four?
9. What period of time is covered by the fourth seal? What was the condition of the church during the time?
10. When the fifth seal was opened, what did John see? Was the altar in heaven, or on earth, where the martyrs were slain? Then where were their souls?
11. What are they represented as saying? Can lifeless objects call for revenge? Gen. 4:10.
12. Has the world, as well as God, given the martyrs white robes of character?
13. What work was carried forward in the earth during the time of the fifth seal?
14. What event marked the opening of the sixth seal? When did it take place?
15. What signs were seen in heaven? When did they take place? How were the stars to fall? How many and what are the characteristics of the signs in the heavens?
16. What is meant by the heavens departing as a scroll? How were the mountains and islands affected?
17. How many classes of men will hide themselves in the dens and rocks of the mountains? What will they say to the mountains and rocks?
18. Why will they seek to hide?

wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men." When apparent disaster comes to God's work, we should not be disheartened, but we should inquire of God to find his way and to learn what lesson he desires to teach us. The chastening hand of God is sometimes laid in love upon his children as the only way of saving them from the fruit of their own doings. Let us be strong and of a good courage, but let us diligently inquire of the Lord for the meaning of these very marked providences. Who can fail to understand that there must be a lesson in these things,—not a lesson of doubt and despair, but a call to learn the way of the Lord? It is time for us to ask ourselves the question which we have urged upon others, "What do these things mean?"

The Review Office

In the shadow of a great calamity, we are of good courage. We have no disposition to draw back in the face of untoward circumstances. Fire has wiped from the face of the earth the visible symbol of what has long been regarded as an object of love and veneration. But God lives, and his truth endures. The original office building erected on the removal of the work to Battle Creek in 1855, still stands. The publication of The Advent Review and Sabbath Herald was begun by Elder James White at Paris, Me., in 1850. In August, 1851, the office was established at Saratoga Springs, N. Y. Seven months later it was removed to Rochester, N. Y., and in 1855 to Battle Creek, Mich. The first issue from Battle Creek was dated Dec. 4, 1855. In May, 1861, the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association was incorporated. In the summer of 1857 an Adams press was procured, also a steam engine to furnish power. The association immediately erected a new brick office building two stories in height. In 1871 a second building was erected, and in 1873 a third building was added. In 1878 the first and third buildings were united by a large four-story building, with two three-story wings. In the year 1881 a large press room was added to the right and rear, increasing the floor space to forty thousand square feet.

All this space was equipped with first-class machinery for printing, folding, book-binding, electrotyping, stereotyping, photographing, photo-engraving, mailing, shipping, etc., to which equipment had recently been added three typesetting machines. The machinery was most modern in all its branches. This is the building which has gone down before the flames. It was the expensive and delicate machinery which helped to swell the aggregate loss to a large amount. Against this there was only one hundred thousand dollars' insurance. But the promises of the Lord are sure. He has promised to go with us, even to the end of the world. The strength of the cause is the love for his appearing, which we bear, and our willingness to respond to any demands which his providence may lay upon us.

Former Things

"Remember the former things of old: for I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me." Isa. 46: 9. The readers of the Review have not failed to notice what appeared in the paper last week, at the close of the volume, entitled, "The Review for 1903." With the sentiments there expressed, the editorial workers on the Review are in the most hearty accord; and in the policy outlined for the paper, our hearts are fixed in the most steadfast purpose and determination. That purpose is to make this paper an exponent of the "present truth," the bearer of "good tidings of great joy" to all its readers, and "an inspiration to a complete consecration of heart and life to the work of hastening the coming of the blessed Master." The aim will be to make it of such inestimable value to all who love his appearing, that it will lead them to identify themselves with this great movement to give the advent message to all the world in this generation, regarding it as indispensable to the carrying out of their purpose, to "co-operate intelligently with other believers in this closing work."

This strikes the keynote of the work in our hands, namely, the sounding of the advent proclamation in all the world, before the generation beginning at a definite point in the past, and now nearing the utmost limits of its existence, shall have all passed off the stage of action. The prophetic announcement and its limitations are set forth in this scripture: "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." In Matt. 24: 29, reference is made to certain days of tribulation; and it is said that immediately after that tribulation, phenomena in the sun and the moon, unheard of and unexplainable, were to take place. The sun was to be preternaturally darkened, and the moon was not to give her light. This was all literally and impressively fulfilled in the notable Dark Day of May 19, 1780, and in the following night. Fifty-three years and fourteen days later, Nov. 13, 1833, came the wonderful shower of meteors, known as "the falling of the stars." This was to be followed, after an indefinite interval, by the shaking of the powers of the heavens. This will be fulfilled when Heb. 12: 26 is fulfilled, and the heaven and the earth shake at the voice of God. Rev. 16: 17, 18; Joel 3: 15, 16.

But these are parts of the great day itself, when kings and chief captains, the rich and mighty men of the earth, call for rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from the face of him that sitteth on the throne; for they then testify with terrible emphasis, that "the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" Rev. 6: 14-17. But the events prophesied of in Matt. 24: 29, except the shaking of "the powers of the heavens," occur long enough beforehand to arouse the world, and to act as signs and precursors of the coming of that day. We stand right between verses 13 and 14 of Revelation 6, with the falling of the stars as the last sign in nature to herald to us the coming of the Son of man. What follows in this line of events is too late to be signs and warnings to us. Now note the climax of this instruction in Matt. 24: 32-34: "Now learn a parable of the fig tree; When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it ["he," Christ, margin] is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled."

The writer of this may be allowed a word of personal application on this point: Born May 2, 1832, he easily reckons himself as coming within the generation which was living at the time of the falling of the stars, Nov. 13, 1833, the last tabulated sign in the heavens to foretell the near coming of the Son of man, and at the time of his baptism by an Adventist elder, in good standing under the first message, in the early summer of 1844, of sufficient age to see (historically) "all these things," these phenomena in the heavens, and contemplate their value, as signs of the end, and on this evidence to raise from the doorsteps of his home in West Wilton, N. H., the cry, "The Lord is coming," as far as the voice was able to reach relatives and friends in the neighborhood.

On that doctrine he has never had a misgiving from that day to this. And there he still stands, on the authority of the words of Christ, as we can but interpret them, "This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled." Whether or not the writer lives till the Lord appears, there will undoubtedly be a sufficient number of that generation alive at the end to make good the prophecy. For the Lord says, "My words shall not pass away."

In endeavoring to comply with the prophetic injunction to "remember the former things of old," the object has been in these introductory lines to ascertain how far experiences of a personal nature could be linked with any work which God is developing in the earth, or any fulfillments of his prophetic word. This has led to a consideration of what is meant by "this generation," one of the crucial points of New Testament prophecy, for we finally reach a point in which it can be said, "This generation shall not pass away, till all these things," not only the preliminary signs, but the events of the great day itself, shall take place. This inquiry is liable to lead to startling conclusions; for when we enter the little space of this generation, we enter ground which challenges the attention of the world. And we are happy to find a series of events set apart in the Scriptures as "these things," covering "this generation," the beginning of which clearly antedates the writer's birthday. And now the question arises how long a generation can continue, the youngest members of which are upward of seventy years of age. We have not to wait for a new generation to arise, pass its period of infancy, youth, and middle life, before we reach the end, but only for a section of the human family to retire its old men, already fast disappearing, before all these things are closed up and finished. Happy they who have a part in this work now!

Three Phases of the Church-and-State Movement in the United States

In the thirteenth chapter of Revelation there is a prophecy which has not yet reached its fulfillment, but which is to be fulfilled in our day, in connection with the proclamation of the message giving a world-wide warning against the worship of the beast and his image. This belief Seventh-day Adventists have long held, and it has moved them in the past to a commendable activity in the prosecution of their appointed work.

The beginning of the fulfillment of this prophecy was seen in the rise and work of the National Reform Party, which was organized by the Reformed Presbyterian Church. The avowed purpose of this organization was so to "reform" the government that God should be recognized in the national Constitution, and Christian observances in this country placed on a legal basis in the fundamental law. This meant nothing else than a union of church and state.

By means of the pulpit and the press, the doctrines of this new party were widely disseminated, and many religious and educational leaders were enlisted in the movement. It was denied that just government rests upon the consent of the governed, and the Constitution was held up as a godless document, which it was necessary so to amend that the government would be bound by it to execute the will of God.

To observers of the Bible Sabbath, the progress of this movement was of great significance. They saw it gaining adherents among men of national reputation. They beheld it laying siege to Congress, and making demands upon State legislatures, while from it an influence went out which put life into legal relics of the Dark Ages, and made men offenders for conscience sake. And as they saw powerful allies coming to its support—the W. C. T. U., the American Sabbath Union, the Christian Endeavor Society, and other organizations—and saw the fires of religious persecution kindling in various sections, bringing imprisonment and confiscation of goods upon many for their allegiance to God's Sabbath law, it seemed to them that the expected crisis was upon them, and that the climax of the struggle which the prophecy foretold, was at hand.

But this activity in religious circles was not all that was necessary to the end in view. That alone could not bring about the situation which the prophecy describes. It was one phase of the movement which was to accomplish this work, and there have been two other phases since, each no less significant than the first, though not so directly connected with religion. The state must join with the church before the latter could have power to enforce a false worship upon the people, and in this country the state was fundamentally opposed to any interference with religious freedom. The rights of conscience were protected by the principles upon which the government was established. A change in the national policy was to be looked for, and the change came. The essence of that change was expressed by the assertion made and maintained on the floor of the United States Senate, that governments derive their just powers from the consent of "some of the governed." This statement was substituted for that one in the Declaration of Independence which recognizes all men as possessing the same inalienable rights, which it is the true purpose of civil government to preserve. The vital part of the Declaration was repudiated, and this sentiment was echoed and defended by representatives of the government from the president down, by leading clergymen and educators also, and was approved by a majority of the people. It has become a part of the political creed of the nation.

Who are "some" of the governed? This is a question that must be settled. From what portion or class of the governed is the government to derive its authority? What class of the people, in other words, is to control it and exercise authority over the rest? Will it be a large class? or will it be only a few? Does "some of the governed" mean men of a certain race only—the Caucasian race? Does it mean the millionaires? Does it mean the members of the labor unions? Does it mean the adherents of a certain church, or of a church combine? The Constitution is no longer a guarantee of the rights of all the people, with the power of all for their protection. There is now left only a struggle between the different classes for the mastery; and the sounds of that struggle are already in the air.

The third phase of the church-and-state movement began with the rise of the labor unions, in the gigantic contest between labor and capital. The labor unions have become a great power, and their power is steadily increasing. In many places the will of the labor unions stands for law. It sets aside the law, and steps into the place of the government. Unionized labor has two weapons which all men dread—intimidation and the boycott. The first is chiefly exercised in connection with strikes, and the second is in perpetual use, silent but deadly. Not all the authority of the law can so quickly or so fully bring an individual to terms as does the dread of ruin which the menace of these weapons inspires.

The contest of unionized labor with capital is developing a new and revolutionary form of government in this country. In the settlement of the great coal strike it was found that there was no power in the State or national government that would avail anything—that republican government in this country, so far as this strike was concerned, had vanished—and it was necessary to resort to a new procedure outside of all constitutional provisions to restore peace. This new procedure took the place of the law, and in the place of popular government there was instituted government by arbitration.

But under this form of government there must be an arbitrator, some third party not identified with either of the contesting parties. It must naturally be some body of persons or some organization outside of the ranks of labor, outside of the trusts, and distinct from the civil power. There is one such organization, and that is the church. But when the church steps into this position, the church becomes the government, and in all matters where its arbitration is invoked, there is a union of church and state, full and complete. To this it need only be added that the question of which church shall be selected remains to be settled, and that the Catholic Church, by reason of its control of the leaders of the labor unions and of those elements within the unions which are most active in fomenting strikes and disorders, is the one that must naturally be chosen. And when this is done, Rome becomes the government and dominates the nation, and there is a union of church and state which is a perfect "image

Christ as their Redeemer had it not been for these misfortunes. How important it is for us that we seek to obtain a broader and more far-reaching view of the experiences that overtake us in this eventful life. How many times we have drawn — regarding the deportment of some brother or sister who we thought had pursued a wrong course; but after we had considered the matter in a more deliberate way, we saw where we were mistaken, or were near-sighted. All such experiences emphasize the fact that we are blind, and can not say, as did the young man whose eyes Jesus opened, "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see."

Hasty and Unwarranted Conclusions

Remedy

It is by the medium of the Holy Spirit that men are convicted of sin; for the Saviour says: "It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you. And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin."

Many have sought in vain to heal themselves, or have tried to obtain salvation by some works or efforts of their own. It is the Holy Spirit that gives assurance to the child of God, as is emphasized by the words of the apostle in 1 John 2:27, 28. Through the Spirit's cleansing, the true children of God, when Jesus appears, will have "confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming." If, when Jesus appears, one is to be so confident that his peace has been made with God, he must now, in this present life, be able to say, "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see."

Seeing Not and Hearing Not

E. R. LAUDA

"HAvING eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember?" Mark 8: 18.

The thought expressed in this scripture is one of personal interest. The disciples had had the opportunity of seeing with their eyes the miraculous power of God, and hearing with their ears the praises offered to Christ from those who had been healed. They had been instructed by the Great Teacher concerning his mission and the experience he must pass through; but the discouraging condition expressed in the text was now visible. They had eyes, but saw not; ears had they, but heard not; nor did they remember the teaching of their Instructor.

Can it be true that the above scripture has its application in our time, that we are in the same predicament? Let us consider a few facts: We have been privileged to see the dark day of May 19, 1780; the falling stars, Nov. 13, 1833; signs in the earth and among the nations; and the third angel's message going to all the world.

The inventions of our day are a fulfilment of Daniel's prophecy. The low ebb of Christianity, the prevalence of crime, and other signs are all heralds of Christ's coming. Notwithstanding the unmistakable omens of our Lord's return, our lukewarmness is clearly observed when we do not see in these the writing "Jesus is coming," nor hear the thundering tones from heaven "Get ready, the Lord cometh." If we do not sense the meaning of these signs, we need to awake and renew our hold on this blessed truth. We should study anew the way-marks pointing to the eternal rest, so as to experience the blessing recorded in Matt. 13:16: "Blessed are your eyes, for they see, and your ears, for they hear." If alive when our Lord returns, we shall see him as he is. O, what comfort will then be realized! If sleeping, we have the assurance from Christ that when the hour arrives, we shall hear his voice and come forth clothed in immortal bloom, never more to die, never more to sorrow, but to be happy through all eternity. It pays to serve Jesus. May we hold on to the arm of the Master, and soon, very soon, be privileged to see him as he is.

The Sure Word of Prophecy

R. L. UNDERWOOD

THE prophecies are given us as a sure guide. Let us for a moment notice the words of Peter. He was favored with the grand privilege of being present at the transfiguration on the holy mount. He was an eye-witness of Christ's majesty. He says: "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts." 2 Peter 1:19.

This word of prophecy was what saved Noah at the time of the flood. It cheered the heart of Abraham in his long sojourn without receiving the promise. It moved Moses to give up the riches of this world, and to undertake the great task of leading the children of Israel out of Egypt. Prophecy cheered God's people while in Babylon, the Lord having foretold their deliverance. It gave to John the Baptist the time when his message would be due.

So it is the prophecies of the blessed Bible that tell us when this earth's history shall close. Can we know anything about it? If we are students of prophecy, we can. The apostle Paul, referring to this class, says, "Ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." 1 Thess. 5:4.

In order that we be firmly established for the trying hour that is just before us, we must study to show ourselves approved unto God, workmen "that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." 2 Tim. 2:15.

The Women Find Jesus Risen

ARTHUR. V. FOX

JOSEPH of Arimathæa and Nicodemus had wrapped the body of Jesus in linen, with spices, when they laid it in the tomb. John 19:40. This was the custom with the Jews. These women knew it; nevertheless they bought spices, too, to anoint him. It was not enough that others had done it; they would do it also. It was a service of love; and love is not content to serve by others. We see their love also in their being at the sepulcher so early, "at the rising of the sun." This was on the first day of the week, Sunday. Then they bought the spices, and came to anoint the body. They had rested on the Sabbath, the seventh day of the week, "according to the commandment," which to-day is as binding on Christians as ever.

But they had seen a great stone placed at the entrance. They thought of this as they were coming, and spoke of it to one another. That morning they could think and speak of no subject but one.

Unless the stone was rolled away, they could not get to the body; it was a great stone, too great for their strength; who would help them? No man was near. Upon arriving at the place, they saw, even in that dim light, that the stone was rolled away. Now therefore they could go in. God often rolls away the stone for us when, wishing to do him service, we see some difficulty in our way. No human help appears, perhaps the case is even beyond the help of man; but when we come up to the place,—when we are brought face to face with the work we have to do,—the stone is gone, the difficulty is removed. We should have more faith beforehand. Now the women went in, to apply, as they thought, their spices. But no, the body was gone. The Lord had risen.

Instead, therefore, of doing honor to the dead body of the Lord, these women were to spread the news that he was alive. Their work was quite different from what they had expected. But so it often happens with the servants of God.

The women were to tell the disciples, especially Peter. The last thing we saw of him he was going out to weep after denying the Lord. Well might he think himself cast out from the number of disciples; well might he go apart from all, and hide himself in shame. But his and our most gracious Lord sent him a special message. He was a disciple still, for he was to meet Jesus in Galilee with the rest. The message was, in fact, a message of forgiveness. The Gospel of Mark is the only one in which it is mentioned.

No wonder Peter loved to tell of it; often, no doubt, had Mark heard him do so. There is comfort for us here, great comfort. The Lord had seen Peter's tears. Even thus does he still deal with those who mourn because of their sins. He forgives them, and sends them messages of comfort.

The General Conference

Thirty-Eighth Session, May 15 to June 8, 1913

Eighth Meeting

May 19, 2:30 P. M.

L. R. CONRADI in the chair.

Elder J. E. Jayne offered prayer.

The eighth meeting was occupied in continuing the reports of the Foreign Department of the General Conference. Reports were presented of the Jewish work, French work, the Danish-Norwegian Seminary, the Swedish Seminary, and the German Seminary; also of the work among Russians in North America. The secretary of the Department of Education also rendered his report during this session of the Conference. These reports must be deferred for the present.

Ninth Meeting

May 20, 10 A. M.

A. G. DANIELLS in the chair.

Prayer by G. B. Thompson.

A. G. Daniells: We have the following recommendation from the brethren in the Bermuda Island Mission:—
"Dear Brethren, Greeting.

"As loyal believers of the Seventh-day Adventist body, we would cordially ask you to receive our brother, Thomas MacKay Doe, as delegate to represent the Bermuda Mission field.

"In behalf of the members of the Seventh-day Adventist Bermuda Mission.

"(Signed)

"M. ENOCH,

"L. O. MACLAN,

"OWEN AIRTH FIRTH."

It was voted that this request be granted.

A. G. Daniells: The first of our reports this morning will be from the secretary of the Sabbath School Department.

This report will be published later.

Following the rendering of the report of the Sabbath-school work, reports were presented by L. A. Hansen, assistant secretary of the Medical Department; of the North American Negro Department by the secretary, Elder A. J. Haysmer; and of the work of the Press Bureau by the secretary, L. W. Burgan. These reports likewise must be deferred until a later issue.

At the close of his report, Brother Burgan showed the Conference an immense scrap-book, containing thousands of clippings from the newspapers, reporting features of our work. He stated that already reports had come in from thirty-three States in which newspapers had given notices of this Conference session. At this point Conference adjourned.

Tenth Meeting

May 20, 2:30 P. M.

A. G. DANIELLS in the chair.

J. E. Fulton offered prayer.

By vote of the Conference, the following-named brethren were seated as delegates: T. H. Branch, J. M. Campbell, U. S. Willis, W. D. Ford, and Sydney Scott.

At this meeting reports were rendered by various brethren of the European Division, including Germany, Great Britain, Scandinavia, and Russia. We regret that we have only space for the general report of the European Division, which has already been given. Many interesting features, however, of these reports from various sections of the European field will be printed later in the REVIEW.

Eleventh Meeting

May 21, 10 A. M.

L. R. CONRADI in the chair.

U. Bender offered prayer.

L. R. Conradi: We will now listen to the report of M. E. Kern, secretary of the Young People's Missionary Volunteer Department.

This report, which was read by Professor Kern, will appear in a subsequent issue of the REVIEW.

Report on European Memorial

The chairman then called for a report of the committee on plans regarding the memorial from the European Division presented in the seventh meeting.

Guy Dail, secretary of the committee on plans (reading):—

"The committee on plans and resolutions would recommend:—

"1. That, in response to the memorial submitted by the European brethren to the fall council, 1912, we adopt the general plan of organizing important territories and groups of union fields into General Conference divisions, and that this form of divisional organization be effected in the various fields as the conditions of the work require.

"2. That the numerical basis of representation from the division conferences and division missions to the General Conference be that called for by the General Conference constitution.

"3. That the general mission funds of the division be reported quarterly to the treasurer of the General Conference, and that they be included in the financial statements of the General Conference.

"4. That steps be taken at this Conference for the organization of the European Division Conference, with a constitution in harmony with the provisions of the General Conference Constitution."

There was also presented at the same time a draft of the constitution for the European Division Conference. As this is published in full in the Bulletin, it does not seem best to repeat it here.

At the eleventh meeting reports were rendered of the Atlantic Union Conference and the Columbia Union Conference by Elders W. B. White and B. G. Wilkinson, presidents of the same.

Twelfth Meeting

May 21, 2:30 P. M.

L. R. CONRADI in the chair.

A. T. Robinson offered prayer.

Elder W. J. Fitzgerald rendered a report of the British Union Conference, followed by a report of the Scandinavian Union Conference by Elder J. C. Raft. Reports were likewise presented of the Latin Union Conference by Elder L. T. Tieche; of the work in Spain and Portugal by W. T. Bond and C. E. Rentfro. After the rendering of these reports showing the progress of the work in these fields, Elder J. N. Loughborough spoke of the organization of the General Conference fifty years ago and the fact of this being the fiftieth anniversary of the event. His remarks follow:—

J. N. Loughborough: It so happens that on this camp-ground there are two anniversaries. I have told you about one,—the dark day of May 19, 1780. Now I want to tell you about the birth of a little child. You know old folks are all interested in little children. This was one that was born fifty years ago this very day, May 21, 1863, and I think it was at about this hour that we got it where we could call it a living child. It was the General Conference. Do you think I am interested in hearing these reports? Well, I can hardly hold my breath sometimes when I hear them. How that little child has grown!

Well, at the time of that meeting, we had been talking for two years about having a General Conference. We had the State conference of Michigan, organized in 1861. Perhaps you have read in the old papers about the conferences they had in those days. I have a report of one that was held in 1859. Why talk about conferences in '61 and '63, when you had one in '59? I can even tell you about a conference where there were only twelve present. Well, this leaflet [holding it up] is a report of it. What a little Bulletin! It contains a report of a sermon on Systematic Benevolence; that is, being so benevolent as to pay the Lord the tithe that really belongs to him. The report of business transacted in that three days' conference covers four pages. There was a $160 debt for running a tent the year before, and they wanted to get pledges and cash to make up $500 to meet that debt, and to keep the missionary work going that year. They lacked about $110 of that, and they thought that by soliciting from the brethren they would be able to make it all up. And then, too, they wanted a committee of three men to take charge of the money when it should be collected. You see we went at it business style back there.

Now, in 1863 a call was made for a General Conference, signed by James White, J. N. Loughborough, and John Byington. We got together and had a delegate conference. There were twenty delegates, from seven States. Two of them had one delegate apiece. One was the State of Wisconsin, and one was the State of Minnesota; and, I declare, Michigan had most all the rest! Well, they wanted a committee on a constitution, and they appointed it fifty years ago this morning. The committee reported fifty years ago today. The constitution adopted was not nearly so long as the one you read here today, but it served the purpose.

Some of you have been in the army, and when the others were all shot down around you, and you were left alone, you began to feel lonesome, with the bullets flying around your head. Well, out of those eight men who in consultation and much prayer drew up that constitution, how many are alive?—Just one man besides your speaker, that other being past ninety years of age, Elder Isaac Sanborn. And where are my friends that were there?—Ah, they have fallen. Out of twelve men on two committees at that meeting, four apostatized, and the rest have died—died in the triumphs of faith.

How many persons do you suppose there are in this audience that were in the city of Battle Creek when the General Conference was organized? I know of only two, Sister Kilgore and myself—save one who was not old enough to take part in the proceedings, but who carried water for us, it being a hot day. He was W. C. White, then not quite nine years old. How the work has grown! I thank God that I am here, and that the message is going. I am glad that the little child that was organized fifty years ago has grown to be as strong a being as it is now. However, I expect to see it grow faster yet. Yes, this is the anniversary day of the birth of the General Conference.

Thirteenth Meeting

May 22, 10 A. M.

W. T. Knox in the chair.

J. T. Boettcher offered prayer.

The secretary read the report of the committee on plans regarding the European Memorial, found on the preceding page.

W. T. Knox: Is there any discussion on this? I believe Brother Daniells wishes to say something.

A. G. Daniells: I have been requested to make a general statement on the plan of organization and the reasons for it. I shall try to be very brief in making such a statement, and outlining the reasons for this recommendation before us.

This suggestion is made for the purpose of giving efficiency to our endeavors in carrying on our work throughout the world. There was a time when each local conference was directly connected with the General Conference; and we may even go back of that, to a center with its remote parts. Before we had any organization at all, we had a center of administrative and properly constituted authority, with the units scattered about over the field. That center rested in the leaders. Elder James White, Elder Joseph Bates, and a few of their associates, before ever a conference was organized, before a constitution was framed, or an association was made, were administrators of this work and movement. They had a word to speak, they had counsel to give, they had commands, so to speak, to issue, and decrees to send forth. God was leading out a people, and the brethren and sisters scattered about over the territory recognized this leadership, and paid heed to the counsels given. But after a while it was seen that this administration needed to be defined, these leaders to be chosen by the people, and this authority needed to be recognized in a proper way, and the limitations set. So they framed local conferences for the remoter parts, and a General Conference for the center. For many years the General Conference received its delegation from the local conferences, and the local conferences themselves dealt directly with all the affairs relating to general interests.

Well, the work moved on; the people increased; new fields were entered, and new divisions sprang up, until away out in Australia, across the Pacific Ocean, nearly ten thousand miles from the central headquarters, a people were raised up, and conferences were organized; and there we came to feel as never before the need of something more in the way of organization to expedite our work. Perhaps I might tell you what we experienced, for I was out there. We had our conferences—one in New Zealand, one in Victoria, one in New South Wales, mission fields in Queensland, South and West Australia, and in Fiji, and all about there. Well, we had no authority out there outside of each local conference, and it was our understanding that all matters outside of the conference questions must be referred to headquarters. We were loyal, and we referred our questions, our needs, to them. We could not always control the character of the question raised, nor limit the time when it needed attention. But we would send the question on. It took about four weeks to get to the headquarters, and four weeks for an answer to get back. And, possibly, while we were writing in, the secretary and members of the committee were out holding camp-meetings in remote parts, and the question could not receive attention when it got there. I remember that we have waited three or four months before we could get any reply to our questions.

Sometimes after two or three months we received a note or five or six lines from the secretary, saying our matter had come, but the Conference brethren were scattered, and when they got together in the fall, they would take the matter up. Well, if it were the case of hanging, the answer would be too late, and in many cases it was as important as that. We found continually that our work was hindered. Sometimes when the committee got together, they could not quite see through our questions, and wrote us for more light. After six or nine months, perhaps, we would get the matter settled. This was impeding the progress of the work; it was hampering us. So when Elder Olsen, president of the General Conference, was out to see us in 1894, he and Elder W. C. White put their heads together and fixed up a union conference organization. This was effected. That was for the purpose of bringing all those questions together and dealing authoritatively, administratively, with South Pacific Ocean questions, Australasian problems, so that any conference might get this word from a center of authority right there.

Now, I know some of our brethren thought then that the work was going to be wrecked, that we were going to tear the organization all to pieces, and get up secession out there in the South Sea islands. But we did not get up any secession; we did not raise any rebellion; and our brethren have found that out there in the Australasian field where this new division was created, the people have been as loyal to this denomination, and as loyal to this organization, too, as anybody in the wide world. No one in the United States has been truer to this organized movement than the Australasian brethren.

We worked away at this for seven years, and then the brethren came to see the advantages of it. In 1901 the General Conference recognized or recommended the organization of union-conferences throughout the world. Today we have twenty-five of these, whereas we had but one or two twelve years ago. Now it has been demonstrated that this organization thrown in between the local conferences and the General, has proved a great advantage in our administrative work. Well, time has passed on. Twelve years have gone by since the union conference came to stay with us and be a part of our organized work, and nineteen years since the first union was formed.

Now we come before this delegation with a recommendation for the putting in of another important piece in this great machine that is built up. (And I use the word machine in a proper way, and a sacred way, because it is a great facility in the hands of the Lord for carrying on the world-wide movement.) This is what is proposed: we find that our brethren in Europe have been doing and growing and developing, as you have seen from the reports which have been brought to you. Now over the sea, across the Atlantic, we have a constituency of thirty thousand people, and these people are in all these countries [pointing to the map]. Here is the United Kingdom; here are the countries of Scandinavia; here are the different parts of Germany, and the Latin countries, with France, Italy, Spain, and Portugal. Here are the more eastern countries, the Balkan States, and this great empire of Russia, and Asiatic Turkey, and the northern part of Africa and Egypt. In all these lands this message is planted to stay, and there are earnest, active, consecrated believers all through these countries to the number of thirty thousand.

Now, we find that we have separate unions there. They are union conferences, units, it is true, but they have become so large, the problems have become so great in conference administration, the institutions have become so numerous, and they overlap and intermingle so closely, that they feel the need of some kind of binding, uniting, authoritative organization that will enable the people in all this overlapping situation, with these big problems, to act together in administrative work, and to act together in the support of their institutions. I will relate an instance to show the need of some sort of organization like this. Twelve years ago Norway was hit hard by a financial crisis, and our printing-house at Christiania was greatly hurt and imperiled, and you know we were obliged in this country to come forward and save the institution. We raised sixty-six thousand dollars to pay the people in Christiania what was due them. We were all glad when the last dollar was paid, and those mercantile and banking interests were satisfied. But, brethren, when that was done, there was still a great debt on that institution, amounting to—right example. Even if the money is in sight [provided beforehand], they should not use more than is absolutely needed." "We must also remember that our work is to correspond with our faith. We believe that the Lord is soon to come, and should not our faith be represented in the buildings we erect? Shall we put a large outlay of money into a building that will soon be consumed in the great conflagration?"

"God desires that the humble, meek, and lowly spirit of the Master, who is the Majesty of heaven, the King of glory, shall ever be revealed in our institutions. Christ's first advent is not studied as it should be. He came to be our example in all things. His life was one of strict self-denial. If we follow his example, we shall never expend means unnecessarily.—Id., Vol. VII, pages 91, 92.

Webster's New International Dictionary defines debt as follows: "That which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one person is bound to pay to another, or to perform for his benefit: thing owed; obligation; liability."

When it comes to our churches, sanitariums, schools, and publishing houses, these properties are not realizable in the same sense that private homes are, in that they are not usually of such a nature as to be sold to advantage, although adapted to our work. Consequently all the more important is it that these be established and kept free from debt.

The Wide-Spread Occurrence of the Signs in the Heavens

D. E. ROBINSON

THE question is sometimes raised, Why were the signs in the sun, moon, and stars, as foretold by our Saviour, seen only by the dwellers in the United States?

It is worthy of note that at the proper time to fulfil the specifications of prophecy these signs were seen in various parts of the world.

Our readers are familiar with the fact that on May 19, 1780, there occurred in the eastern portion of North America a darkness "so intense that many who were but a little way from home, on well-known roads, could not without difficulty retrace the way to their own dwellings."—John W. Whiton, in "Sketches of the History of New Hampshire," page 144.

Darkness in Europe

In 1783 a mysterious darkness rested over all Europe, extending far into Asia on the west, and into the northern regions of Africa on the south.

The darkness was first experienced at Copenhagen on the twenty-fourth of May, and spread southward and westward, until by the end of June it had spread over all Norway, France, Italy, Austria, Sweden, Russia, and other European countries, and by the middle of July it had penetrated into Asia as far as the Altai Mts. Leaves fell from the trees in June, as they usually fall in the autumn.

"The obscurity prevailed a greater portion of the summer, imparting to the sun an unnatural color of a dull, rusty red, and causing both the days and the nights to wear a weird and gloomy aspect. The atmosphere was highly electric, and nature was greatly convulsed."—D. T. Taylor, in "Great Consummation."

The Hamburger Neue Zeitung of July 18, 1783, speaks of the appearance of the sun, and says that it was gradually dimmed, till it appeared as if its rays had passed through thick smoke or dark glass.

Dark Days in Canada

"On the ninth of October (1785) there was an uncommon darkness in Canada, while the atmosphere was of a very luminous appearance. This was followed by squalls of wind and rain, with severe thunder. On the fifteenth occurred a still greater obscurity, succeeded also by lightning, thunder, and rain.

"On the sixteenth, the morning was calm and foggy. At ten o'clock arose a wind from the east, which partly expelled the fog; and soon after commenced the darkness of midnight. The people dined by candlelight."—Dr. Noah Webster, in "History of Epidemics and Pestilential Diseases," Vol. I, page 280.

A Dark Day in France

In the REVIEW AND HERALD of Oct. 29, 1867, a lengthy article is quoted from the Advent Herald, entitled "A Dark Day in France." The writer of this article quotes the following from the "Encyclopedia, First American Edition, Philadelphia, 1798," found in the article on the "French Revolution:"—

"We cannot here avoid mentioning a physical event which assisted not a little in producing many of the convulsions attending the revolution, a general scarcity of grain, which occurred about that time. On Sunday, the thirteenth of July, 1788, about nine in the morning, without any eclipse, a dreadful darkness suddenly overspread several parts of France. It was the prelude of such a tempest as is unexampled in the temperate climates of Europe. Wind, rain, hail, and thunder seemed to contend in impetuosity; but the hail was the great instrument of ruin. . . . The country people, beaten down in the fields on their way to church, amidst this concussion of the elements, concluded that the last day had arrived; and scarcely attempting to extricate themselves, lay despairing and half suffocated amidst the water and the mud, expecting the immediate dissolution of all things."

A Solemn Impression

On these dark days the predictions of Scripture regarding the darkening of the sun came to the minds of many. Men and women who were usually irreverent, prayed for mercy. In the churches many of the preachers read to their congregations those portions of Scripture that foretell the coming of the day of judgment.

One writer declares that on May 19, 1780, "hosts of people believed that the end of the world had begun to come; men dropped to their knees to pray in the field; many ran to their neighbors to confess wrongs and ask for forgiveness; multitudes rushed into the meeting-houses in towns where they had such, where pious and aged ministers, pleading repentance, interceded with God in their behalf; and everywhere throughout this day of wonder and alarm, the once careless thought of their sins and their Maker."—"History of the Town of Antrim, New Hampshire," by W. R. Cochrane.

Dr. Noah Webster also speaks of the "haziness in the atmosphere," which spread over "all parts of Europe, Great Britain, Italy, Sicily, France, and even the Alps," and says:—

"This caused universal consternation, as a similar appearance had preceded the earthquake in Sicily on the fifth of February. The churches were crowded with suppliants. The French astronomer Lalande attempted to quiet the popular fears by ascribing the phenomenon to a superabundance of watery particles in the earth, from the moisture of the preceding year, which were then exhaled by the summer heats."—"History of Epidemics," Vol. I, page 267.

Causes of These Dark Days

So long as these dark days occurred at the time specified by the prophecy, need we contend that they were supernatural? However, the differences of opinion among scientists is at least significant. Dr. Noah Webster does not regard the explanation offered by Lalande as satisfactory, and he attributes the darkness in Europe of 1783 to volcanic dust from Mt. Hecla.

The famous German meteorologist, Alexander Von Humboldt, in turn, doubts the plausibility of Webster's explanation. He says: "On account of the magnitude of the phenomena, I have always regarded as exceedingly improbable the opinion which is even still sometimes expressed, attributing the remarkable darkness which . . . overspread a considerable portion of Europe and Asia as well as of the north of Africa . . . to great volcanic action in Iceland and to the earthquakes in Calabria."—"Kosmos," Vol. III, page 414 (German edition).

Some thought that this darkness was the result of the earth's having entered the tail of a comet. Others regarded these dark days as having been caused by an eclipse, while others have suggested that the darkness may have been caused by smoke from forest fires. Thus we see that there is no agreement among scientific writers as to the real cause, and Humboldt admits that "for such phenomena no general satisfactory explanation has been assigned."—Ib.

We can only conclude that be the cause what it may, supernatural or natural, these dark days were, like the great darkness which enshrouded Egypt, a manifestation divinely foreseen and divinely foretold.

Thus it will be seen that there seems to have been a period of a few years, beginning with the darkness of May 19, 1780, in which the inhabitants at least of the Christian portion of the globe witnessed the sign in the heaven that reminded them of the words of Christ.

The Falling of the Stars

The same conclusion may be reached regarding the falling of the stars, which was the next sign foretold by Christ after the darkening of the sun and moon. The first star shower of the magnitude that has been witnessed within these last days was on the night of Nov. 12, 1799. It was described by Alexander von Humboldt, who with Aime Bonpland, a French scientist, was then traveling in Venezuela. Their statement, as recorded by Amedee Guillemin, is as follows:—

"Between the hours of two and five in the morning, the sky was covered with innumerable luminous trains, which incessantly traversed the celestial vault from north to south, presenting the appearance of fireworks let off at an enormous height; large meteors having sometimes an apparent diameter of one and a half times that of the moon, blending their trains with the long, luminous, and phosphorescent paths of the shooting stars."—The Heavens, translated into English by Norman Lockyer, page 166.

In his "Kosmos" (Vol. I, page 115), Humboldt says that by the observations he had brought together, this fall of meteors was shown "to have extended simultaneously over the new continent, from the equator to New Herrnhut, in Greenland, . . . and from 46° to 82° of west longitude from Paris."

For further statements regarding the splendor and extent of this celestial exhibition, see Humboldt's "Relation Historique," Vol. I, pages 519-527; also Andrew Ellicott's "Transactions of the American Society," 1804, Vol. VI, page 29.

Star Shower in Europe

A splendid meteoric shower was witnessed in Europe on Nov. 12, 1832.

"This phenomena was seen in England, France, Switzerland, southern Germany, Belgium, on the Rhine, in Berlin, Warsaw, Riga, St. Petersburg, and at Odessa. At Suczowina, in the Bukowina, according to Dr. Rohrer's observations, the stars were so many and fell so thickly that they resembled a heavy rain of fire."—Poggendorff's Annalen der Physik und Chemie, Vol. XXIX, page 447.

In the United States and Canada

"But the most sublime phenomenon of shooting stars of which the world has furnished any record, was witnessed throughout the United States on the morning of Nov. 13, 1833. The entire extent of this astonishing exhibition has not been precisely ascertained; but it covered no inconsiderable portion of the earth's surface."—Burritt's Geography of the Heavens, page 163, edition 1854.

A Sign of the End

As was the case during the dark days, many who witnessed these brilliant spectacles thought of the words of the Scripture referring to the event, and were filled with fear and apprehension. The following statement, which appeared in the Old Countryman, New York (quoted in the Portland Evening Advertiser, Nov. 26, 1833), no doubt expresses the conviction of others besides the writer:—

"Many things now occurring upon the earth tend to convince us that we are in the latter days. This exhibition we deem to be a type of an awful day fast hurrying upon us."

The World's Armageddon Battle in Prophecy

R. C. PORTER

WHEN Turkey is finally driven from Europe, he will plant his temporary capital in Jerusalem. He will there come to his end, with none to help him. Dan. 11:45. The overthrow of the Ottoman dominion in Asia is the sign that the Armageddon battle is about to break upon the world.

The River Euphrates Dried Up

In the book of Revelation the scene of this great conflict is thus described: "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared. And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame. And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon. And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done. And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great. And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath. And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found. And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great." Rev. 16:12-21.

When probation for sinners closes, Christ comes to minister in the heavenly temple, and the seven last plagues are poured out upon the earth. Rev. 15:8. The restraining Spirit of God ceases to hold in check the war spirit among the nations. Rev. 7:1-4. The spirits of devils then take complete control of the nations of earth and lead the whole world into the Armageddon battle, with which the history of the world closes. Christ comes as a thief upon the nations thus engaged in war and strife. From the throne he announces the close of earth's history. His voice scarcely ceases to reverberate through the earth when other voices and thunders and lightnings, followed by the most terrific earthquake of which the human mind can conceive, occur. Then comes the final hail-storm that shall sweep away every refuge of lies. Eze. 13:10-16. Every stone weighs about fifty-seven pounds. Rev. 16:21.

The overthrow of the Ottoman Empire in Asia does not mark the beginning of the Armageddon battle. It marks the beginning of a time of trouble for the nations, which, under the sixth plague, ends in the Armageddon battle. The Turkish dominion in Asia is overthrown before the first plague falls. Dan. 11:45; 12:1; 7:9-14. It is not until the sixth plague that the Armageddon battle is fought. Rev. 16:12-14. The river Euphrates is first dried up as a special judgment under the sixth plague. It is not a long process, it is the work of the sixth plague. This does not mean that the literal water shall be dried up, but that the power occupying the territory of the Euphrates shall be scourged and ravaged under the sixth plague until it shall no longer be an obstruction to the kings of the East when they shall gather in the Holy Land for the Armageddon battle. Rev. 16:12; 17:15. The Armageddon battle cannot take place until the power controlling the territory along the Euphrates is dried away like the drying up of a river, under the sixth plague. The Ottoman Empire has controlled the territory of the Euphrates for centuries. For the last seventy years the Ottoman Empire in Europe has been wasting away. In every war this power has lost a strip of its great possessions in Europe until it now stands in the ridiculous position of having a capital with practically no territory in Europe. This is not the drying up of the river Euphrates under the sixth plague, but a prelude to it. That drying up is the result of the sixth plague, and cannot take place until the time of the sixth plague; the same as the fifth plague falls upon the seat of the Papacy. Rev. 16:10-12.

Under the heading "Death Knell of Turkey," the London News of the World, Nov. 10, 1912, said:—

"With swift and overwhelming tragedy the Turkish Empire in Europe has been laid in ruins. The defeat of the Ottoman army at Lule Burgas, and the subsequent action, in which the Turkish rear-guard were cut up, forms one of the classic downfalls of history."

The Greatest War of the World's History

The Present European Conflict, Is It Armageddon?

By F. M. Wilcox

THE great war of the centuries is now being waged. Not within the history of the world have such gigantic forces of men and armament been pitted against each other on the field of mortal combat as are now engaged in the European conflict. At the time (August 22) United Germany and Austria are opposed to the combined forces of Great Britain, Russia, France, Belgium, and Serbia. Other powers have declared their neutrality; but as the conflict deepens and complications arise, these, too, may be drawn into the strife.

Practically all Europe is a great armed camp, a veritable battle field of contending armies. Before the beginning of actual hostilities, when efforts were being made to bring about a settlement of differences between Austria and Serbia, Sir Edward Grey declared that if these efforts were ineffectual, "the greatest catastrophe which can befall the concert of Europe will result, and its consequences will be incalculable."

The Conflict of Mighty Forces

Mighty forces are drawn up in battle array. Never has the world witnessed such an alignment of contending human elements. This is evident as we consider the strength of the armies engaged in the struggle for the supremacy.

The fighting strength of six nations engaged in this terrible conflict is given as follows:—

In 1815, when Napoleon engaged in his final struggle for European supremacy, there were pitted against the French emperor Austria, Russia, England, Holland, and Prussia. Napoleon commanded an army of 360,000 men. The forces arrayed against him amounted to 669,000 men. That indeed was a mighty conflict, a struggle of gigantic forces. But compared with the present conflict, it almost sinks into insignificance. In the present struggle the troops of Germany and Austria on a war footing comprise a total of 7,200,000 men. The forces arrayed against this dual alliance, those of Russia, France, England, and Belgium, make up a fighting army of more than 10,600,000 men. And these armies as no armies which have ever preceded them, are drilled and skilled in the science of war. They are supplied with the most modern and effective fighting machines and battle equipment.

Says ex-Pres. William Howard Taft of the present war:—

Nothing like it has occurred since the great Napoleonic wars; and with modern armaments and larger populations, nothing has occurred like it since the world began. It is a cataclysm. . . . The future looks dark indeed, but we should not despair.—Independent, Aug. 10, 1914.

Opposing Forces on the Sea

But the large number of soldiers is by no means the only important factor in the equation. There must also be considered the immense navies opposing each other on the high seas. The following comparison shows the rela-

The Battle in the Air

And there must be taken into the account not only the equipment of these nations on land and on sea, but in the air as well. Alfred W. Lawson, editor of Aircraft, makes the following comparison of the aerial strength of the powers engaged in this controversy:—

The Creation of National Debts

A backward glance at some of the great wars of history will enable us to measure more accurately all that is involved in the present conflict. The last ten years have witnessed an unprecedented increase in expenditure for offensive and defensive purposes. Ac-

France, Russia, and Great Britain approximate.

The aerial fleets of these nations form no unimportant factor in their operations. As never before through the aid of these airships, may the movements, position, and strength of the contending armies be determined.

"An Immeasurable International Catastrophe"

In the conflict of these mighty forces, who can forecast the outcome? Peasants and princes, kings and people, wealth and science, brawn and muscle, inventive skill and genius, all the forces of education, talent, and ingenuity, are cast into the balance. Well indeed does Mr. Asquith, the British premier, declare that Europe today faces "an immeasurable international catastrophe." In what condition will the nations emerge from it? What international boundaries will be obliterated? What changes will be made on the map of the world? What will be the cost in wealth and blood and human life, in ruined hopes and blasted ambitions, in heartaches and poignant grief, and wearing, grinding misery? God pity men in their blindness and madness!

cording to Edgar Crammond in the November (1913) number of the Nineteenth Century and After, "the debt of practically every nation has either originated or been built up by the processes of war." This writer gives the following immense sums of money which have been consumed in some of the great wars of the last century:—

It has been nearly a hundred years since Europe faced a similar situation.

tive naval strength of Germany and Austria compared with England, France, and Russia:—

"Son, give me thine heart;" "today if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart;" "acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace." Peace in the midst of the present strife and turmoil, peace throughout eternity,—this is the heritage of the child of God. To this satisfying, enduring peace he invites you by his Spirit.

"And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." Rev. 22:17.

Signs of the Approaching End

By W. A. Spicer

SEATED with his disciples on the Mount of Olives overlooking Jerusalem, Christ gave an outline of events reaching to his glorious appearing in the clouds of heaven. Looking down upon the city of Jerusalem, all careless of its time of visitation, Christ had foretold the destruction of the sacred temple. The disciples, astonished, said, "Tell us, when shall these things be?" and, evidently associating the end of the earthly temple with the end of the world, they added, "and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. 24:1-3.

The Saviour's answer is equally for us who live in these latter days. Briefly he sketched the scenes of confusion and tumult that were to quickly follow in their own time, as the doom predicted by the prophets of old should fall upon Jerusalem. The signs that he gave meant deliverance and escape to the Christian believers in the day of Jerusalem's fall. "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh," he said. "Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them which are in the countries enter thereinto. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled." Luke 21:20-22.

The unbelieving of Jerusalem and Judea could not conceive such a thing as the destruction of the favored city; but at the first compassing of Jerusalem by the Roman armies the Christians recognized the sign and knew that the fateful day was at hand; and when for a time the siege was suddenly lifted and the armies retired, the believers heeded the warning and fled to safety. Watching the signs of the times and being ready, they were delivered when the day of desolation came a few years later. Even so are we to watch the signs of our own times that we may escape the things coming upon the earth, and "stand before the Son of man."
